The wind is of great power, and so are the judgments of God. Hence observe, That the judgments of God upon wicked men who have been spared a long time, when they come, they come swiftly, violently, and suddenly: but of this before.

"And they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices." As long as they prospered in their course of false worship they were not ashamed, but gloried in it; and the ten tribes, Israel, rather despised and sought to east contempt upon Judah, who worshipped God aright, as appeareth plainly from Amos vii. 12; "Go," (saith Amaziah there to Amos scornfully,) "flee thee away unto the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there." They scorned and contemned Judah, and gloried in their own false worship. Hence,

Obs. 1. The superstitious and idolatrous look upon God's ordinances as vile, and their own inventions as glorious; but God has a time to honour his ordinances and to east shame upon their sacrifices. The true worship of God is often in such low esteem among men, that its servants are exceedingly vilified, and many are deterred from embracing it, because they cannot bear the attendant shame and ridicule: but God has a time to honour his ordinances, to manifest the beauty of them before all the world, and to east shame and reproach on all ways of superstition and idolatry; "they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices;" a time to make even those that gloried most in them, to be ashamed of them. Isa. ii. 20, 21, "In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats; to go into the clefts of the rocks, and into the tops of the ragged rocks." And Isa. xxx. 22, "Ye shall defile also the covering of thy graven images of silver, and the ornaments of thy molten images of gold: thou shalt east them away as a menstruous cloth; thou shalt say unto it, Get thee hence." They thought them curious ornaments, but the time shall come when God shall make idolaters see their impurity, and cause them to east them away with indignation, and say, "Get ye hence." That place in Isa. lxxvi. 5, bears on this point, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at his word; Your brethren that hated you, that east you out for my name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified: but he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed." There are some of you that tremble at my word, and dare not do any thing in my worship but what my word requires; others have looser consciences, and can venture on things that they have no warrant for in my word: but you that tremble at it, and are scorned for your scruples, whom your brethren east out because you will not be of the like judgment with them, and because your hearts and consciences are more tender than theirs; whom they would willingly be rid of, and think it would be better with the land when you are gone; and of whom they say, "Let the Lord be glorified," pretending that they desire nothing but the peace of the church and the glory of God; of whom they, even your brethren that east you out, say, "Let the Lord be glorified;" God shall appear for your glory and for their shame; the Lord will honour you in that his worship which you adopt according to his word, though you suffer at present much ignominy and contempt for it; and though they may for a while seem to carry all before them, having that which is countenanced more publicly, the Lord will appear at length to their shame, the Lord will make them ashamed of their sacrifices.

Four things principally cause shame.

1. Disrespect from those from whom we desire honour. When one comes to a superior, and expects respect from him, and finds that he is cast out, this is a great shame. So they shall be ashamed of their sacrifices; they think that they shall have honour from me by reason of their sacrifices, but I will cast shame upon them, they shall have nothing from me but proofs of disrespect. In 1 Kings ii. 16, when Bathsheba came to Solomon to ask a petition of him, "Deny me not," she said; the old Latin has it, Ne confundas faciem meam, Do not confound my face, do not make me ashamed; and the Hebrew is, Ne avertere faciem meam, Do not cause my face to be turned, that is, do not make me ashamed by showing me disrespect, when from you I expect honour. When God casts off the sacrifices of men and shows disrespect to them, that causes shame, it confounds, or should confound, their faces.

2. When a man takes a great deal of pains and it all comes to nothing. So all superstitious ways will bring shame at last; as in Col. ii. it is said of all superstitious ceremonies, that they "perish with the using," there comes from them no good result. Idolaters take a great deal of pains in their false worship, but all will come to nothing; in their utmost need all their modes of superstition and idolatry will leave them destitute and helpless, and so cast shame upon them.

3. Disappointment of hope. "Let me not be ashamed of my hope," saith David, Psal. cxix. 116. If I hope for good and be disappointed, this will bring shame. Many passages confirm this. So when those that are superstitious and idolatrous shall raise up their hearts with great expectation of good from God in their ways of false worship, and shall be disappointed of all their hope, in this God will cast shame upon them.

4. When God discovers that to be vile which a man glorieth in. So idolaters, that glory in their superstitious forms, the Lord in time will discover them to be base, and vile, and worthless things, for indeed they are all but poor beggarly elements, fitter to please children than God. God will make this manifest.

If it be objected, that they seem not to be such poor and weak things, but more glorious and pompous a great deal than the rites observed by the true worshippers of God; yea, even true worship of God in itself seems to be a poor and mean thing;

The answer is, the institution stamps a glory on the observance: now they never having been instituted, must be regarded as mean and beggarly elements. Besides, the promise and engagement of God's presence in his own ordinances puts an honour on them, which attaches not to the ways of superstition.

It is good for those who have defiled themselves with superstitious worship, to prevent God by casting shame on themselves; for if they do not, God will cast shame upon them, he will make them to be ashamed. It is our best way, to come in and to prevent God, to take shame unto our own souls and to lie down therein. God knows how we have polluted ourselves, even all of us, in the ways of superstitious worship; and the truth is, God is casting shame upon them all at this day. Happy are those that before these times took shame to their own souls for all these their defilements. Howsoever, before God doth yet further force it upon us, it will be our wisdom to humble ourselves on this account. Ezek. xliii. is very apposite: first in the 10th verse, "Show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed," show them the true form of my worship, that they may be ashamed. The truth is, if we did but understand the beauty and excellency of God's ordinances, in the purity and simplicity of the gospel, that were enough to make us ashamed, if there were nothing else; we would even be very vile in our own eyes, to think that, while our hearts have been taken up about such vain and vile superstitions, such glorious ordinances of God, and such beauty of holiness, have been neglected by us: Show them the way of my house, "that they may be ashamed." But further, in the 11th verse, "If they be ashamed of all that they have done, show them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof, and the goings out thereof, and the comings in thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and all the forms thereof," (again,) "and all the laws thereof: and write it in their sight, that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and do them." First, show them my house, let them have some kind of general knowledge of my ways and ordinances, perhaps that will make them ashamed: and at this day we know, though there be but a few rays shed upon us, to show us a little more of the ways of God's worship than we saw before, that we begin to be ashamed of what we have done: but now, if indeed we be thoroughly ashamed before God of all our false forms of worship of all our sacrifices, then mark what a promise is here; then saith the text, "If they be ashamed of what they have done, then show them the form of the house, and the fashion of the house," &c. Thus here is one word heaped on another to show, that it is a mercy of God to people when they not only understand in general God's worship, but know "the form, the fashion, all the ordinances, all the laws," and circumstances in detail. For we must regard nothing in the worship of God as to be neglected, but must have respect to all the forms and ordinances of his house; and it is his great mercy to reveal them to us in all their fulness. True, man stands much on form, and God insists on it likewise. Many deny the power of godliness, but keep the form of it; they are much set on their forms, and God is much set on his. If you desire forms in God's worship, they are already prescribed by his own appointment. And mark, when we are ashamed of what we have done, then shall we understand the laws of the house, the right way of God's worship in his own temple; but first we must be ashamed and thoroughly humbled for our former superstitious sacrifices, we must not expect it before. Many people cry out, We are at a loss, we know not what to do; we have rejected indeed false worship, and in some measure see its vileness; but we know not the forms and fashions of God's house; and the hearts of people tremble to think of the result, fearing lest the acceptable forms be not discovered, and dissensions ensue. Would you understand the right worship and government of God's house? be ashamed of your sacrifices, be ashamed of what you have done, and they shall be shown unto you.

And those that are intrusted to find out the laws, and forms, and fashions, and ordinances of God's house, are, above all men, to be ashamed of what they have done, to be ashamed first of their sacrifices. And you should pray that God would humble them for all their former superstitious observances, that these things may be revealed to them; and being revealed to them, they may reveal it to you. There is a necessity for this previous repentance, let them be men of never such excellent parts and abilities, before they can expect to understand the ways of God's house in its forms, and fashions, and ordinances. In Ezek. xliv. 10—13, God threatens those priests that departed from him in Israel's defection to false worship, that they should bear their iniquity, that they should never come near to him; seeing they partook of the general departure, and did not keep close to the true worship of God, they must bear their iniquity, they must not come near unto God; only God would permit them to be employed in some meaner out-services: and therefore it may be that he will not use some men amongst us of choice parts, in any great work of his, to do him any great service; though they be employed in some meaner duties, yet, for their sinful compliances and conformity to superstition, they shall not come near him. Except there be extraordinary repentance and taking of shame to themselves, though they may be men of excellent parts, the Lord may remember what they did when our Israel departed from God, and what their compliances were; and though he may still make use of them in some ordinary service, yet he may lift up his hand against them, that they shall never be employed, never made a special blessing, in any choice work. God may justly leave them so that they shall cast themselves in a great measure out of the hearts of the saints, and their shame shall stick upon them while they live; and the more honour they seek, the more shame will God certainly cast upon them. In Jer. iii. 25, the church saith, "We lie down in our shame." There is cause indeed that such men should lie down in their shame; those that are of discerning spirits, and observe the ways of men and the ways of God, cannot but be sensible of this, for so long as yielding to superstitious vanities and submission to false power were useful to them to save their estates, their liberties and livings, they yielded, and submitted, and altered their judgments to suit the times, yea, and so altered it as presently to grow even bitter against their brethren who differed from them. Surely they, and we, and all of us, should take shame to ourselves, lie down in our shame a while, and act with all humility, and with all meekness, in suspicion of ourselves and of our own judgments, and in love to our brethren, remembering that we ourselves not long since held other views and other sentiments; therefore should our hearts, I say, be very low, gentle, and full of forbearance. But further,

Obs. 2. God has a time to make all idolaters ashamed of their sacrifices. We will raise our meditations somewhat higher on this, "They shall be ashamed of their sacrifices." All sacrifices, not only the superstitious and idolatrous, but all other sacrifices that come short of the rule, will at length cause shame. As carnal men that tender up many services to God, and lay such weight upon them as on their account to claim heaven and an interest in God, God has a time to make them ashamed of all these sacrifices. And now, as God shall discover the vanity of their services, if he would but show to us all here each other's hearts in time of prayer; when we have been offering up that sacrifice unto God, and have seemed very devout, yet, oh the vanity of our hearts, the vile, impure, foolish, and ungodly thoughts that have passed through them! If God should write our prayers before us, and interline them with all these, and then bid us read them, and bid others read our prayers thus interlined, would we not be ashamed of our sacrifices? The best sacrifice that ever we rendered up to God in all our life we would be ashamed of. God has a time (except all be pardoned in Christ and covered in him) to make men that lay such weight upon their prayers, discern such native deformity in them, as to make them lie down in their shame.

Obs. 3. Duties performed with a carnal heart are mixed with base ends. We seem to draw near to God, and would honour and worship him: oh, but the hypocrisy of our hearts! what vile and base ends are there, to give content to this and the other, to display our parts and abilities in services! These things have been manifest in God's sight, and except we be ashamed of them now, and repent, and get them pardoned in Christ, God will set all our base ends before angels and men; and shall we not then be ashamed of our sacrifices?

Obs. 4. Our sacrifices are defiled by the foulness of our hearts. Not only by actual sin mixed with them, by base thoughts and ends, but our services have come forth from unclean hearts, and it is impossible that out of the unclean there can come any thing that is clean. And when God shall show the infinite holiness of his majesty, and the extent of his justice and righteousness, and how infinitely worthy of sacrifices far other than ever we have tendered to him, oh then how shall we be ashamed!

How will our hearts be overwhelmed with confusion and shame, when, apprehending the infiniteness of the glory of the great God, we shall see how utterly unworthy all our duties were of that surpassing excellency and majesty! Men think highly of the sacrifices that they tender up unto God because of the ability they display in them, but they know not with what a God they have to do. When the Lord shall show unto us the lustre of his glory and the greatness of his majesty, (as it will be seen by us one day at the glorious appearing of the great God,) then we shall see how unworthy all our services were of such a God as he is, and that will make us ashamed if we have not been ashamed heretofore; nothing will be more grievous and more confound the hearts of men, than to be put to shame for their sacrifices.

You will say then, What are those sacrifices we should render God that we shall never be ashamed of? God will one day make all superstitious and carnal people ashamed of their sacrifices, this will be a dreadful thing when it comes to pass, what then are those sacrifices which the saints of God shall never be ashamed of? If you would offer such sacrifices,

1. Be sure they be his own, worship God in his own way. It is not what you think will please God, and will make an excellent appearance, but look to the word, be sure it be his own.

2. Let them come from faith; let your hearts be actuated by divine principles in whatsoever you tender up unto God; rest not in the action, but consider the source from whence it flows.

3. Let your ends be high; O take heed of base and low ends in all your sacrifices. It is too much that men should have base and low ends in their outward affairs, when even in them they should have their hearts high upon the glory of the great God; but when they come to their sacrifices and holy duties, then sursum corda, then lift up your hearts indeed, be sure then your ends be high and holy.

4. Let your whole strength be engaged in them so as to sanctify the name of God; let the whole soul be carried out unto God, for God is worthy of the whole; if you had ten thousand times more strength than you have, God is worthy that it should be put forth in the services you tender unto him.

5. Offer up yourselves as a sacrifice to God. Be not satisfied to offer up a prayer as a sacrifice, or alms, or such duties only, but be sure, together with these, to offer up yourselves as a living sacrifice to God; as the apostle saith, Rom. xii. 1, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God." God cares for none of your sacrifices except you offer yourselves. That is a very observable place in the latter end of 1 Kings viii., where you find that Solomon offered "two and twenty thousand oxen, and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep;" a great sacrifice indeed to be offered at once unto God! but mark what, notwithstanding, God saith to him in chap. ix. 4, presently after the sacrifice was done, "If thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart, and in uprightness, to do according to all that I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments," &c. God puts it to an if; Notwithstanding all these sacrifices, if thou thyself, in the constant obedience of thy life, wilt be a constant sacrifice, then will I do thus and thus. But ver. 6, "If ye shall at all turn from following me," if, notwithstanding all these sacrifices, thou at all turn from following me, I will do thus and thus. Many of us think when we have spent a whole day in fasting, and our hearts have been enlarged and have offered up a great sacrifice to God, that we may take the more liberty afterward: no, though you offer "twenty-two thousand oxen, and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep," yet, if after this thou shalt at all forsake me, all that thou hast done shall be rejected. Therefore those sacrifices that are not joined with offering up of ourselves, are such as God will make us ashamed of; but if together with our sacrifices we offer up ourselves, which is our reasonable service, we shall never be ashamed. Therefore, you that are poor and weak in parts, and have but little grace, yet, if that little be true, though your hearts are not so enlarged perhaps as others' in prayer, and you look upon your sacrifices as mean, and as unworthy to be tendered up unto the great God; but dost thou then offer up thyself to him as a sacrifice? It is true, my parts are weak, and my abilities are poor and mean, but, O Lord, what I am, and what I can, I tender unto thee; here, Lord, take soul, body, life, estate, liberty, and all I enjoy, I tender them all unto thee as a sacrifice: I say then, peace be unto thee, the sacrifices thou lightly esteemest God will not make thee ashamed of, but he accepts thy poor services when together with them thou offerest up thyself; whereas if thou didst not tender thyself as a sacrifice, though thy services were ten thousand times more glorious than they are, they would be all cast back as dung in thy face.

6. Be humbled after all your best services. Take no glory to yourselves, but be vile in your own eyes, when you perform any duty that seems to have any excellency in it, and which perhaps others regard as having much. If your hearts be elated with it, the glory of it is gone, and it is that which you must be ashamed of, though now you be honoured for it, and pride yourselves in it.

Lastly, Tender up all in Christ, in the worthiness of his infinite sacrifice. Christ is that sacrifice which is well-pleasing unto God, and all others are pleasing unto him only through the merit and worthiness of the Lord Jesus Christ, who has tendered up himself unto God the Father as a sacrifice to heal all our sacrifices, and to take away all their shame. 1 Pet. ii. 5, "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God;" how? "by Jesus Christ." Mark, you are as "lively stones," and lively stones "built up," not merely stones lying here one and there another, but "lively stones built up" in a holy communion, that is the meaning, built up "to offer sacrifices," and that "spiritual sacrifices." But mark, though our sacrifices be never so spiritual, yet they cannot be acceptable to God but by Jesus Christ; that is the sacrifice the saints shall glory in and bless God for to all eternity, which shall take away the shame of their sacrifices, and by its all-sufficient merit render them acceptable unto God. Thus, through the good hand of the providence of God, we are come to the end of this fourth chapter.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1. Hear ye this, O priests; and hearken, ye house of Israel; and give ye ear, O house of the king; for judgment is toward you, because ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor.

THIS chapter is the beginning of another sermon of Hosea, preached, as some think, in the reign of Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of Israel, whom you read of 2 Kings xv., probably toward the end of his reign, which was about the same time that Ahaz reigned in Judah, when that horrible confusion was brought into religion, he having placed the altar that he brought the fashion of from Damascus in the house of God; therefore the Lord here invigils by his prophet not only against Israel, but also against Judah. The sum of the chapter appears to be this:

I. A summons of all sorts to judgment, ver. 1.

II. Accusation and condemnation of Israel by themselves, ver. 2—5.

III. Judah brought in as guilty, and sentence passed upon her, ver. 5, 6.

IV. Israel and Judah conjointly arraigned and condemned, ver. 7—14.

V. The good effects resulting from the judgments of God, ver. 15.

I. In the summons remark these three several words.

"Hear ye. Hearken. Give ear."

"Hear ye, priests."

"Hearken, ye house of Israel."

"Give ear, O house of the king." Hence,

Obs. 1. When God comes in ways of judgment, he expects we should seriously incline our minds to what he is doing. We should not only "hear," but "hearken," and "give ear:" God then will force audience. We are bound to hearken and to give ear to God's commanding word; but if we refuse it, he will have us to hear and give ear to his threatening word; and if that be refused, he will force us to hear and give ear to his condemning word; for so it is here, "Hear ye, hearken, give ear," for judgment is against you all.

There are three classes named here, "priests, people, house of the king."

All sorts are cited to judgment, for corruption was gone over, and judgment comes against all. Hence,

Obs. 2. Generality in sins is no means to escape God's judgments.

With men this may be a means to escape punishment; One and all is a word of security. When soldiers combine in the same offence, and cry, One and all, they escape with impunity. But it is not so with God, he regards not the number of those involved in the offence. Men think, I do but as others do, and I shall escape as well as they. With men this is somewhat, but with God nothing; though all sorts offend, yet there is never a whit the more security thereby unto any. We have a notable scripture confirming that, Nah. i. 12, "Thus saith the Lord; Though they be quiet, and likewise many, yet thus shall they be cut down, when he shall pass through." Though they be many, yet thus shall they be cut down.

Obs. 3. The priests have usually been the causes of all the wickedness in, and judgments on, a nation. He begins with them, "Hear, O ye priests," as the principal cause of all the evil; first of the evil of sin, and then of the evil of punishment; calling them priests, not that they were true priests, for they were not of the tribe of Levi, but merely so reputed. So Jeremiah saith, chap. xxiii. 15, "From the prophets of Jerusalem is profaneness gone forth into all the land;" and there are many passages of Scripture which plainly attribute the evil of nations to priests. And has it not been so with us? and is it not so at this day? There was never a more filthy sink of scandalous, superstitious priests in a kingdom than of late amongst us, as has begun, and will yet further appear to you. There has been an accusation against our parliament, that orthodox, grave, godly divines have been ejected. I suppose you begin now to see what kind those grave, orthodox, godly divines were: evident and plain proofs exist, but it shall yet be made much more manifest in the eyes of all.

Obs. 4. The people will go the way the king and priests go. "And hearken, ye house of Israel." By the "house of Israel," is meant the common people. "Priests" first, the "house of Israel" next, and the "house of the king" last. And the house of Israel is set between the priests and the house of the king, because by these two, the corruption of the priests and of the house of the king, all were influenced: the evil of the people came from them both, partly from the priests, and partly from the house of the king, and between them both the people were undone. If but one of them be right there is great hope of much good; but woe to a people when both of them are corrupt, both priests and the house of the king! Though the house of the king should be corrupt, yet if the priests and ministers kept up the truth, and vigour, and life of religion, things would go reasonably well in a kingdom, and though religion might be persecuted, yet its life would not become extinct. Whatever laws magistrates may enact against the ways of God, except ministers yield compliance, those laws will not be brought to prevail with the consciences or practice of the people. Jeroboam and the other princes saw it was in vain for them to think to prevail with the people except they could gain the priests, therefore it was the great design of Jeroboam to get them over on his side, which he easily did, because all preferment came from him, he raised whom he would.

But mark, might not the people excuse themselves and say, What should we do? On the one side authority enjoins us, on the other side our ministers teach us to do thus and thus, what shall we do? might they not think to excuse themselves?

No, judgment is against you, O "house of Israel;" notwithstanding the example of the priests and the house of the king, yet you are not to be excused. A great many reasons may be given why sinful compliance in the people may not be excused. I remember Arias Montanus, on this scripture, lays down this for a rule, That no king can make any law but by the people; they cannot, saith he, make laws by themselves alone, the people must consent to them some way or other; therefore the people are involved in all the wicked laws in a kingdom. It is not enough therefore for you to say, Such and such laws are made, and we cannot help it; we are to know, it is not merely the will of a king that is a law to a kingdom, but laws enacted imply the sanction of the people. This answer he gives, and quotes a heathen in support; and although in Scripture and elsewhere, there are instances of absolute authority, yet many kings are limited in their power; and in these times especially the people are not to be excused in their evil.

Now this shows evidently that God would have every one examine what is taught and commanded him by his superiors. The people are here cited to judgment, and placed between the priests and the king's house; though the priests taught, and the king's house enjoined, the observance of superstitious rites, yet they must be judged. It is then, I say, clear, that God would have every one examine what is taught and commanded him by his superiors, and judge himself of the rule of his actions, for they must each give an account unto God.

But you may say, Shall it be left to every one to judge of the truth of what is taught, and of the lawfulness of what is commanded? If so, what order can there be?

To answer that, Whatever inconvenience may result, it appears evidently to be a truth, for we must answer unto God for our actions, therefore we must know the rule of our actions; therefore, first, let the inconvenience be what it will, the truth is good. But, secondly, I say this, that every one must judge so far as concerns his own act; he cannot judge as far as regards the magistrate's act, what is fit for him to command, nor with respect to the minister, what is fit for him to teach, but he may and ought to judge so far as his own act is concerned. As I must answer before God for what I do, I must so judge it, but if I be taught and commanded by authority one thing, and I judge another, I go on mine own peril, that is, if I do not judge right, I sin against God, and incur punishment from him, and I must run the hazard; but to judge that which must be the rule of my act, is a certain right belonging to every man.

Obs. 5. Kings and princes must have sin charged upon them, and be made to know that they are under the threats of God, as well as others. "Give ye ear, O house of the king." There is here an "O" prefixed, "Give ye ear, O house of the king," for though it comes in last, yet it is the principal; for what harm can superstitious and idolatrous priests do, except they be countenanced by the "house of the king," that is, the king himself, and his courtiers; "Give ear," therefore, "O house of the king."

"For judgment is toward you." Mark, he does not attribute all this evil to wicked counsellors that got into the house of the king, but charges it directly upon the house of the king itself. Evil princes may be as great a cause why there are evil counsellors, as evil counsellors why there are evil princes. Evil counsellors usually see what the design of a prince is, and what is suitable to his disposition, and they cherish that with their wicked counsels. But were the designs and dispositions of princes right, they might have counsellors about them to further that which is right too. Certainly it is no excuse for princes to countenance the evil, and then to say they were advised to such and such courses; for if the teaching of the priests, and the commands of princes, do not excuse people, but they must judge as having to answer for themselves, then counsellors about princes cannot excuse them. It is the unhappiness of princes to have none about them to charge them personally with their guilt, I mean, to show them, in the name of God, the evil and the danger of their sins. It was wont to be said, (as I have before told you.) Da Ambrosios et plures habebimus Theodosios, Let us have Ambroses and we shall have Theodosiuses, because of his freedom of spirit with that emperor. And to another emperor, Valentinian, he said, Noli te extollere imperator, si vis diutius imperare, esto Deo subditus, Do not lift up thyself, O emperor, if you will be emperor longer, if you will reign longer, be willing to be subject unto God. And we know with what freedom of spirit the prophets in former times spoke even to kings' houses. As Samuel to Israel, 1 Sam. xii. 25, "If ye shall still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both ye and your king." So Elijah to Ahab, Thou art he that troublest Israel. So Elisha to Jehoram, 2 Kings iii. 13, 14, "What have I to do with thee?" (and yet Jehoram came to the prophet in a humble manner;) "What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophets of thy father and the prophets of thy mother." And, "Were it not that I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat the king of Judah,

I would not look toward thee nor see thee." This he said to a great king. Others, in the primitive times, have addressed princes with similar boldness; and a great cause of the evil of these latter days has been the flatteries of courtiers, therefore, saith the prophet here, "Hear ye, O house of the king." Kings are great indeed above other men, but what are they before the great God? "He shall cut off the spirit of princes; he is terrible to the kings of the earth," Psal. lxxvi. 12. "When they were but a few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in the land. When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people; he suffered no man to do them wrong; yea, he reproved kings for their sakes," Psal. cv. 12. He reproved kings for the sake of his own people, when they were but few in number, and went wandering from one nation to another, and said, "Touch not mine anointed;" that is, touch not my saints. He gave kings warning that they should take heed how they did so much as touch his church, touch his own people; God's people are there called his anointed, and it is said unto kings, that they should not touch his anointed that were so few and wandered up and down from one nation to another. Say thus even to the house of the king. But observe further,

Obs. 6. Though kings are to be reprov'd for sin, some due respect ought to be shown to them. The house of the king is named last here, is named after the house of Israel. Why so? Not that the house of Israel were more guilty than the house of the king, but because the house of the king could least endure reproof, could hardly bear reprehension, therefore, in wisdom, so far the prophet would go; he would begin with the other, and in his censures of it introduce the house of the king.

"Judgment is toward you," saith the prophet. הַיָּשֵׁב here is taken either actively or passively. Actively, pro actu judicii, so Junius, it was their part to judge out of the law; and he would read it thus, Judgment is yours, O house of the king; you ought to judge the people in righteousness. But I rather think that it is here to be taken passively; that is, that God calls you to judgment, to suffer judgment, judgment is toward you, or against you. And observe, I beseech you, the difference between the beginning of the 4th and 5th chapters. In the 4th, it was but a controversy, a strife that God had with them; "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel: for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land." But here it is come to judgment; that which before was but a contending with them, is now come to a judgment of them, to a passing of sentence upon them, judgment is against you, sentence is out upon you. The former was God's pleading against them, and this now is God's judging of them. Hence,

Obs. 7. When God pleads against us, let us not disregard. If we do so when he begins to plead his cause with us, if we neglect it because judgment is not upon us, it will proceed to a sentence. God has laid his plea against many a man in his word, and perhaps some of you see and know it; and God lays his plea against many a man in his conscience; but he neglecting this plea of God laid against him in his word and in his conscience, has afterward received the sentence of death in his soul, which has sunk his heart into despair. Many a man has had God speaking against him in his word and in his conscience, I say, and there has been God's controversy; he has been laying his plea there, and thou hast gone on in thy sin, and at length, it may be, there comes the sentence of death on thy soul, that thou dost as it were feel, as some have said they have felt, God passing a sentence of death upon them in this world which has sunk them into endless despair; it has been a day of special judgment to them, they have heard, as it were, God delivering from his throne this sentence against them, Thou art a dead man, a lost man. Oh take heed of neglecting God's pleas, lest they come to judgments.

"Judgment is against you." Why? what is the cause?

"Ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor."

Mark, God passes not judgment but he gives the cause for it. Men are rash, and will pass judgment on persons and things that they know not. Sometimes you hear men railing against some: ask them, Do you know them? No. What have they done? Neither do they know that, only it is generally reported that such men disturb the peace of the kingdom. But in this they deal not righteously. God passes not judgment without giving a full and sufficient cause why he does it; "Ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor."

There is much of the mind of God in these words. Some take "Mizpah" appellatively, pro speculatione, you have been a snare upon the watch, for so צִפָּה (speculor) from whence the word cometh, signifies; and speculatio they take to be those over whom they should watch, as congregatio pro congregatis, circumcisio pro circumcisus, so speculatio pro custoditis. As if God should charge them thus, You should have been watchmen, you priests, and you of the king's house, but you have been a net to insnare them; you should have been speculatores, but you have been venatores et aucupes, you have been fowlers and hunters of my people. Theodoret reads it pro speculatoribus, that is, you spread a net for the watchmen, you superstitious priests, you house of the king, and you people generally; you spread a net for your faithful watchmen; if you have any watchmen that are more watchful than others, you seek, if possible, to insnare them. So they understand it, and though it does in some measure express the meaning of the words, yet I think it cannot be received here, for as the word Tabor is taken properly, not appellatively, so I think ought the word Mizpah. Mizpah and Tabor were the names of two mountains in the land of Israel, the first signifying a watch, and the other, Tabor, a high place, so called by way of eminency, because it was a famous and high mountain.

Now both these mountains were very eminent among the people of Israel. Mizpah some think to be the mountain where Laban and Jacob met, Gen. xxxi. 49, and that it was so called by Laban, "for he said, The Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another." And in Judg. xx. 1, we find, the children of Israel gathered together as one man, unto the Lord in Mizpah.

So of Tabor, Psal. lxxxix. 12, where it is joined with Hermon, which was famous also, as Cant. iv. 8, "Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amanah, from the top of Shenir and Hermon." Hermon is but badly designated in the versified translation of the Psalms (and a great many similar mistakes occur): "The little hill Hermon," Psal. xlii. 6; whereas the truth is, Hermon was a high and famous hill. In the Psalms it is, "I will remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar." Mizar, indeed, signifies small, but they make it as if it were an appellative to Hermon. But the Psalm is rather to be interpreted thus, I will remember thee, O Jerusalem, wherever I am, in all quarters of the world, from Jordan, which lay on the east of Jerusalem, from Hermon, a high mountain in the north, and Mizar, that is, the south, because the mountains of the south were small; as if he should say, Whether I be east, or north, or south, from the temple, I will remember Jerusalem.

So that the Psalm should not be rendered as if Mizar were a more appellative to Hermon, "the little hill Hermon;" for Hermon was a high and eminent hill, and is joined with Tabor, Psal. lxxxix. 12, which was so famous, that it was a proverbial speech among them to say, As Tabor amongst the mountains. To the Christian too it is full of interest, as being the mount of transfiguration. Josephus, in l. iv. cap. 21, of the Wars of the Jews, saith it was 30 stadia high, and on the top, 20; now a stadium is 125 paces, or 625 feet; and the summit lay as equal as if it had been made by the art of man, and was very fertile and full of trees, and altogether a very pleasant and delightful place.

Now God chargeth them, that they had "been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor." According to some, these mountains are taken synecdochically, for all high places, and these metonymically, for all the superstition and idolatry committed upon them; and then the meaning is, Your idolatry upon these high places has been a net and a snare to the people.

But I rather think the sense to be metaphorical, thus, These mountains were places very delightful, which the gentry of the kingdom frequented much in hunting, and where they were wont to spread their nets and set their snares for fowls and beasts. Now saith God, You "have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor;" that is, You watchmen, and others that join with you, have been as huntsmen that have laid snares for the souls of my people, as they lay snares on Mizpah and Tabor; God thus charging them with laying snares for the souls of his people, and hunting them and catching them in their ways of superstition and idolatry. The gospel is called a net in the Scripture, and the ministers of the gospel are to spread it, but the cords and twists of that net are precious, they are the blessed truths, the holy mysteries, of the gospel; and happy are they that are caught in that net. Superstitious priests and governors have their nets too, that they spread and catch the souls of the people in, but their nets are made of other manner of stuff. So Jeroboam and the rest of the princes would not at first attempt to force the people by violence to adopt a false religion, but artfully sought to allure their hearts into a love of it, and would spread for the people unawares their nets, whose meshes were woven with the threads and lines of such cunning devices as,

1. The plea of authority. Does not authority command you to do thus and thus?

2. The sanction of the priestly office. Do not the priests, the holy fathers, do thus and thus? and have you more understanding than they; more wit than all the statesmen and the king's house, and more than all your teachers too?

3. We do not alter our religion, we hope we worship the same Jehovah that you worship.

4. The things required of you are not of much importance, mere circumstances of place: you worship at Jerusalem, it is but worshipping at Dan and Beth-el here before these two images; you shall not worship the images, but worship in this place.

5. All we aim at is your own good; for that was Jeroboam's pretence: It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem, to go twice a year so long, and tedious, and dangerous a journey; no, saith he, I tender the good of my people more, therefore let them worship here.

6. The example of the majority. The ten tribes, the multitude, adopt these rites, Judah and Benjamin only differ from them, why should you desire to imitate their fastidious scrupulosity?

7. Their long-continuing prosperity. Has not Israel prospered as much as Judah? Has not God been with us as much as with them? Judah pretends he worships God aright, we are sure God is with us.

8. Reproaches cast on the true worshippers of God; as in the 7th chapter of this prophecy, ver. 3, "They make the king glad with their wickedness, and the princes with their lies." That is, this was their cunning device, to raise all the reproaches they possibly could against the true, forward, and zealous worshippers of God, especially against the prophets and ministers; and therefore in Amos, who prophesied at the same time, you find that Amaziah said, the land could not bear his words; they were even enough to excite sedition among the people, yea, what are these that oppose the king's laws but rebels? These were the snares which they set to catch the people, to make them out of love with the true worship of God. Thus they were "a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor."

Thus it has been with us; how cunningly have men laid their nets amongst us to catch souls! They say, it is but yielding a little to a thing enjoined by authority, besides, it is really unimportant, and is countenanced by the example of many learned and godly men; yea, and why should you hinder yourself of the good you may do? It is after all a mere matter of circumstance, connected with decency and order, and consistent with much devotion, and by yielding as far as we can, we may gain papists; none but a company of simple people oppose these ancient customs, which can plead the precedent of the fathers of the church, yea, of many martyrs who have shed their blood. Thus many souls have been caught as a bird in a snare, with these lines and twigs thus cunningly twisted together; and so caught that they could not tell how to get out, but being once involved in the meshes, were insnared more and more: as a bird once caught in the net, by its very flutterings is the more entangled; so men when they yielded a little, could not tell where to stop, but at last have gone so far, and been so completely insnared, as to be wholly unable to extricate themselves, but by their very efforts have become more deeply involved; and, the truth is, at length even their consciences have ceased to disquiet them: as a bird, that is perhaps at first alarmed when the net is but stirred, but after a little loses its fear; so many men of tender consciences have at first shrunk from superstitious vanities, but being caught by cunning arguments and devices, have, after a few faint efforts to disenthral themselves, succeeded in quieting their consciences, and calmly acquiesced in their captivity. Oh how many have been thus led captive! This was the design of the adversary amongst us, if possible to subdue the consciences of men; a design worthy of the father of lies, from whom it emanated. Even in their taverns and feasts, they were plotting and studying what it was that would best overcome the scruples of such and such men, and endeavoured to suit the temptation to the character and circumstances of each. It may be the old ceremonies would catch some; others perhaps would break through the old, therefore there must be new ones devised; these again might not suit others, but the book of Liberty on the Sabbath, that would be a proper bait; if it failed, then the oath of canonical obedience. Thus they laid nets for the consciences of men, knowing that if they could but once silence them, they might do with them what they would; certainly they saw that there was no way to make them their own, to make them filii ecclesie, sons of the church, as they called it, but by first giving a sop to their consciences. Many men have found this to be true by experience, and we have seen it: they have come with all the flatteries they could to some, that have stood out many years, and by whose ministry perhaps God has done good; and having but once induced them to yield a little, though with fear and trembling, yet have they presently concluded that certainly they were secured, and then heaped all their injunctions upon them in rapid succession, until their consciences were altogether subdued. And as it is with some birds and beasts, that when caught are presently fatted up; so it was with some ministers and others, when once insnared in their nets, they presently had livings and preferment, bishoprics, chaplaincies, and the like: and as some other birds when caught are forthwith nipped in the head, or have their limbs broken; so they dealt severely, maliciously with others, and ceased not until they entirely crushed them. Thus acted those amongst us that have been "a snare on our Mizpah and a net spread upon our Tabor;" but blessed be God that their snare is broken, and our souls are escaped as a bird out of the hands of the fowler, Psal. cxxiv. 7. My brethren, do not you think you would have been all involved one after another in these their superstitious ways, seeing how in a few years they have prevailed? But God looked from heaven and pitied the souls of his people, and heard their groans and sighs. Oh, many a poor minister has gone home to his wife, and having no other way of maintenance, has, out of fear of losing his living, yielded to their superstitious injunctions; but think you how he has wrung his hands, and could not sleep that night, but lay tossing on his bed with a dismal conscience. Well, the Lord has heard these cries and broken our snares, and our souls are delivered. God forbid such a judgment should ever befall us again, and that God should bring these fowlers amongst us to insnare our souls as they have done.

But there is another interpretation of this text which well consists with this, and I think is agreeable to the mind of the Spirit. Mizpah and Tabor I take in their own proper sense; "You have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor," that is, that they really did spread snares and nets on those very mountains, which stood between the two chief cities of Israel and Judah, Samaria that belonged to the ten tribes, and Jerusalem that appertained to Judah and Benjamin. Now Jeroboam and the other princes, his successors, placed watch-towers on these two mountains, and there set men to be as spies, to see who went from Israel to Judah. There were some conscientious persons that would not be contented with that worship which was set up by authority, but must now and then be stealing to Jerusalem at the times appointed: now the priests counselled those that were in authority, saying, We shall never have peace till we catch these men, who must be going to Jerusalem, therefore let there be some device to apprehend them: then others suggested, that as most of them, when going, passed by Mizpah and Tabor, those two places would serve to set towers on for watchers, who might surprise every one of them. Now this counsel pleased the princes very well, and thereupon, (as I find in Arias Montanus, who cites it out of the Jewish histories,) there were two towers set upon these mountains for this very purpose. This God charges them with, and for this, judgment is out against them. Oh, this is that which provokes God exceedingly, and will bring fearful judgment upon a people, when magistrates and ministers will seek to catch poor souls that would worship God in his own right way.

And has it not been so in our late High-commission court? when there was but a mere reader in a country town, that could do nothing else, if there were any eminent preacher near, and poor souls that were hungering after the bread of life would go to hear him, they would set men on purpose to note down the names of such, just as Jeroboam did here. The Lord has a special eye on poor souls thus oppressed and insnared, to relieve them in due time; and blessed be his name, he has done much for us, in relieving and delivering us from these men, against whom the judgment of God is this day gone forth. What is become of their proctors and summoners, and of all that rabble rout that were catchers and hunters of such poor souls as were desirous of worshipping God in his own way?

Ver. 2. And the revolvers are profound to make slaughter, though I have been a rebuker of them all.

The Lord by his prophet proceeds in his charge against Israel for their idolatry.

"The revolvers." The apostates, those who once rendered me the worship I required; but they are revolted. The brand of a revolter is an ignominious brand, especially when God himself charges this upon any; Once you were full of zeal in the ways of God, but you are revolted, you are apostates. There can be no blacker brand on a people or a man than this is, He is an apostate, a revolter. We must understand this their revolting especially in reference to their falling off from the true worship of God to their idolatry.

"Are profound;" העמיקו they are grown very deep in this their way of idolatry. At first they began but with a little, but by degrees they reached the very depths. When men enter on the ways of idolatry, they know not whither they shall go. They think perhaps, at first, to go but thus and thus far, but before they are aware they are sunk into the very depths.

Obs. 1. It is a dangerous thing to venture on the beginnings of false worship, especially when the tide is flowing in. If a man stand on the shore of the sea when the tide is coming in, and thinks, The water is but shallow now, I may venture to stand here; still it comes insensibly on, and he thinks it is not much deeper than before: but if he venture too long he may soon be swallowed up and sunk in the very depths of the sea. Thus it has been with many; they have been beguiled, have thought they might yield thus and thus far, but little thought of the tide that was coming in. It is true, if it had been going out there had not been so much danger. They truly are deceived in their opinion of the first Reformers, who say they were wont to yield somewhat for peace sake; but then the tide of superstition was on the ebb; and yet it was not without danger that they yielded so far as they did: but of late the tide has been coming in, and these gradual compliances have drawn many into the very depths of superstition, where they have been irrecoverably lost.

"Are profound," they are grown Calvin in loc. profound, that is, their hearts are got very deep in these ways; (so I find some interpret it, and not improbably;) they are grown deep; that is, they are deeply rooted in these ways, so that there is little hope of ever drawing off their hearts from them; they have continued in them a great while, and now they plead antiquity and custom.

Obs. 2. It is a dangerous thing to be deeply rooted in superstitious ways. What a great deal of stir is there in dealing with them that are deeply rooted in false ways of worship! By custom they become deeply rooted.

"Are profound," they are grown "profound," that is, they have revolted from God exceedingly much, deeply revolted. It denotes the greatness of their revolting. In Isa. xxxi. 6, there is such an expression, "They have deeply revolted;" they have not only forsaken somewhat of my worship, but they have deeply, exceedingly revolted from me. So in chap. ix. of this prophecy, ver. 9, "They have deeply corrupted themselves;" they have very much, exceedingly corrupted themselves.

"Are profound," they are grown deep, that is, (as some would have it,) they grow deeper in their ways of idolatry than God does in the ways of his worship: as thus, They will punish more the breaking of any of their rules in their invented worship, than God punishes the breach of his commands. So I find Mercer, that learned interpreter, quoting Rabbi Jarehi as having this expression, Qui non ascendit transgreditur: qui offendit occiditur: He who ascends not (to the feast) transgresses; he that offendeth (so) shall be slain. God only accounts him a transgressor that comes not up to the feast at the appointed time; but they say, whosoever doth not come shall be put to death. They will go further in the punishment of the breach of their superstitious enactments, than God does in punishing of the breach of his holy law. So they are grown deep. Yea, they would seem to go further, to be more zealous and earnest for their ways of idolatry, than God himself is for his ways of holy worship.

And have we not found this, that revolvers, superstitious idolaters, have grown deep thus? that is, they will punish the breach of their superstitious ways more deeply than God punishes the breach of his law; they will insist more on time, and will be more eager to have their laws fulfilled abundantly, than the true worshippers of God are eager to have the law of God fulfilled.

But though I think the Holy Ghost hath a reference to these things, the main and principal scope of the word I conceive to be this, according as you have it in your translations, They are grown "profound;" that is, They are very subtle in their ways of idolatry, they lay their snares deep.

We spake before of the snares of idolaters; now here the Holy Ghost charges them with being profound, that is, They are subtle, they lay their snares very deep: as fowlers and hunters (to follow the metaphor) will go into low places and ditches, that so the birds may not perceive them; so the Holy Ghost here saith, these are content to go deep, they are deep in their plots, they will deny themselves in any thing almost, and will be content to lie very low, so be it they may further their own ends. You find in many great promoters of superstition and idolatry, that they will crouch and seem to be very affable and courteous, and in many things even deny themselves, and all to further their own ends; thus they are profound in their subtily: according to that expression we have in Psal. x. 9, 10, "He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones."

This should teach us to be willing to deny ourselves in our own ends that we may promote the true worship of God; for idolaters will crouch, and bow, and deny themselves in many things, for the promotion of their idolatry. There are many depths, many subtleties in their ways; their powers are strained to the utmost to maintain their superstition; and men that have strong parts and good wits, what a gloss are they able to put upon the worst things in the world, especially when aided by the father of lies! The Scripture tells us of "the depths of Satan," Rev. ii. 24. Satan in his instruments has deep arts, and goes beyond many poor weak and simple people. And we have in Scripture the "devices" of Satan, 2 Cor. ii. 11, τὰ νοήματα, the reasonings of Satan. And then the methods of the devil, Eph. vi. 11, τὰς μεθοδίας, the deep policies of the devil; and in nothing more exercised than in the maintenance of false worship; gravity and seeming profound learning appear to countenance it. This was just the way of idolaters at these times, they were grown profound in their way. Hence,

Obs. 3. The hearts of apostates are the most deeply rooted in wickedness.

No men are so deeply rooted in wickedness as apostates. The revolvers are grown deep, that is, are deeply rooted in this their way of wickedness, and amongst other wickedness, above all in the ways of superstition and idolatry. Apostates, if they grow superstitious and idolatrous, are the most deeply rooted in those ways, yea, and the most profound and subtle in them. Hence you might observe in your own experiences the practices of our prelates, they would choose to themselves chaplains of such as had fallen off and apostatized from that strictness which they seemed as puritans to profess in former times; they thought their choicest and best men were such as arose out of the ashes of a puritan, as they themselves were wont to express it; knowing that those that were formerly seemingly strict in their practice, were best acquainted wherein the consciences of godly men were most tender, and most familiar with their habits and places of resort, and therefore the most likely to prove the fittest agents.

Obs. 4. Idolaters, especially apostates, are profound and deep.

We had need therefore to beware of those that are superstitious when they come with the greatest show of arguments: they are deeply rooted, and can hardly be got to abandon their superstitions; we had need likewise be deeply rooted in the truths of God, or they will certainly undermine us. The Scripture tells us, that "the Spirit of God searcheth the deep things of God," 1 Cor. ii. 10; revealeth the mysteries of Christ. Those that have that Spirit of God that searcheth those deep things of God, are the only persons that are likely to stand out against the deep policies of idolaters. And the truth is, every godly man and woman, though never so meanly gifted, yet are more profound than the greatest scholar in the world that is wicked and superstitious; for they have the Spirit of God, that searcheth the deep things of God; and this it is that keeps their hearts from being insnared by all the profoundness of false worship.

Obs. 5. Idolaters are deep in their policies.

It should teach us then to labour to be wise in the worship of God. When we would maintain God in his worship, it should teach us to learn to seek to out-plot them: they are full of their plots; why should not the Spirit of God teach us wisdom as well as the spirit of Satan teaches them? Why should we not exercise our parts energetically in the true worship of God, as they theirs in the way of superstition and idolatry? But we see it ordinarily otherwise, "The men of the world are wiser in their generation than the children of light," they are deeper in ways of policy, and so deceive such as are simple. If you take them on the first show of things, they will seem to come with such colour of arguments as will certainly deceive you. Therefore you should beg wisdom of God, that you might not be deceived through the subtlety of Satan in these men.

I find divers of the ancients have other interpretations of these words; I will not, however, spend further time in discussing them, because I think we have already had the meaning of the Holy Ghost in these words; therefore we will pass on. They "are profound "To make slaughter." To make slaughter! what does God intend by these words? He means by their making "slaughter," their sacrifices to their idols; and so by the sacrifices, which was the principal part of their false worship, he includes all their false worship; they were deep in all their false worship, naming the chief for the rest.

But why does he call their sacrifices, making "slaughter?"

In way of reproach. God will not honour them by saying, They offered me sacrifice; no, but it is, "to make slaughter." As if God should say, I regard all your sacrifices as no better than slaughter, your temple no better than shambles, and your priests no other than butchers. Thus contemptibly doth God speak of the sacrifices of those that choose their own superstitious ways. Isa. lxxvi. 3, "He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood:" and yet there God speaks of the sacrifices of Judah, not of Israel. Let the sacrifices be for the matter of them what God requires, and offered in the place which God has appointed; yet when men make their sacrifices their own righteousness, and think to put off God by them, I regard them no more, saith God, than the cutting off of a dog's neck. But these sacrifices of Israel had a twofold error in them: First, they were not offered in the place that God would have them. Secondly, they rested upon them likewise; therefore are they called no other than slaughter. Hence observe,

That whatsoever worship is tendered up to God, if it be not his own, or if in that worship (though it be his own) we choose our own ways, God accounts it an abominable thing, whatsoever show of devotion it may have.

The words "to make slaughter," God uses not merely to show the contempt he has of all their sacrifices, but by that he secretly insinuates the cruelty of the priests and of the princes to those that would not yield to their idolatries, their grievous persecution of them, even unto blood. They "are profound," saith God, they are grown deep in their idolatry, they are grown to the depth of malice, so that their hearts are enraged against those that will not conform, even unto blood: No matter what becomes of them, no matter if they were all hanged, a company of precise and scrupulous fools, that pretend conscience, and do nothing else but trouble the state. Do not Jeroboam and the council command these things? The kingdom can never be well till it be rid of them.

"Though I have been a rebuker." Though I have been an instructor, or corrector; so the word may be rendered, as well as a rebuker. And "have been," or am, or will be, you may put it which way you will, is not in the text, but simply, "though I יִבְרַח a rebuker," eruditor, corrector of them all. As if God should say, They cannot plead ignorance; indeed, were it that they never had any means, then they might have some pretence for what they do, but I have been an instructor and rebuker of them all.

This participle, "I," hath reference either to the prophet, or to God himself.

1. The prophet: and then, either actively or passively.

יִבְרַח "I have been a rebuker," or I have been rebuked; so some render it.

1. "I," the prophet, "have been a rebuker." From thence the note is,

Obs. 6. The ministers of God must rebuke sin.

2 Tim. iv. 1, 2, "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ," saith Paul to Timothy. And among other charges, this was one, that he should rebuke the offenders. And Tit. i. 13, "Rebuke them sharply," ἀποτόμως, cuttingly, so the word signifies. Tit. ii. 15, "Rebuke with all authority."

This is the work of the ministers of God, to rebuke "with all authority," to rebuke "cuttingly," when there is cause for it.

And, indeed, the spirits of sinners are base and vile, and a minister of God, coming in his Master's name, is above the highest of them. And if the rebuke be administered in a gracious manner it will make the proudest sinner tremble. Let them seem never so scornful outwardly, yet, I say, let a minister of God come in God's name, and speak as the oracle of God, he may make the proudest and stoutest sinner to quail under his rebukes; for their spirits are vile. And though it seems grievous for the present to those that are rebuked, yet they will bless their reprovers afterward, if God bless the rebuke; and others will curse that would not rebuke them in their evil ways.

2. If we refer this to God himself, "I have been a rebuker;" that is, not I the prophet only, but I the Lord have been a rebuker of them all; the observation is,

Obs. 7. When the ministers of God rebuke according to the oracles of God, God rebukes. And if there be any means in the world to humble the heart of a sinner, it is this, to see that God rebukes him in his word. You may put these two notes together: 1. God rebukes in his word; and 2. This is a great means of humbling the heart of a sinner. Thou comest to the word, and findest thyself rebuked for such and such evils that thou art conscious to thyself of; know it was God rebuked thee that day, and he will call thee to account for those rebukes which he there gave thee. Thou comest, perhaps, to hear what the minister would say, but thou foundest before thou wentest that thou wert rebuked for such and such secret evils thou art conscious to thyself of; know, I say, God rebuked thee at that time, and look to it, God will call thee to an account for his rebukes.

But God rebukes not only by his word, but sometimes by his works too; when he manifests himself against sinners, suiting his works so as to show evidently that he sets himself against them, then, I say, God rebukes them for some special evils, although they will not see it. Isa. xxvi. 11, "Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see: but they shall see." God lifts up his hand to rebuke wicked and carnal men, and evidently sets himself against them, and they will not see: but they shall see. Hence,

Obs. 8. Idolaters' hearts are stubborn. They were profound to make slaughter in their ways of superstition, though I was a rebuker of them all; they cared not for my rebukes, they regarded not my words, their hearts were stubborn and stout against them. Verbi contemptus, idolatriæ comes, saith Mercier upon the place, The contempt of God's word is the companion of idolatry. Common experience tells us how your superstitious, false worshippers slight the word of God; they are above it, they speak jeeringly of the Scripture and of warrants from God's word; and extol the fathers and antiquity, and such and such writers, but the word of God they usually contemn and scorn.

Thus it was here, they regarded not what God said in his word. Idolaters are very stout against the word of God, and contemn it. None of its commands nor rebukes but they withstand. Poor vile worms that they are! who are they, that they should dare to resist the rebukes of the infinite holy God? Know, however thy spirit rises against his word, it will certainly cast thee. The psalmist, in Psal. lxxvi. 6, saith, "At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep." And so Psal. lxxx. 16, "They perish at the rebuke of thy countenance." And Psal. civ. 7, "At thy rebuke they fled." And Psal. xviii. 15, "The foundations of the world were discovered at thy rebukes." The rebukes of God have a great deal of power in them, heaven and earth cannot stand before them; how then can that stubborn heart of thine succeed in its opposition?

Let us not be troubled, my brethren, nor discouraged, at the stoutness of idolaters. They have always resisted the rebukes of God in his word, and therefore let us not think it much though they now withstand the evident truth of God, and the works of God, that apparently make against them. They were tormented with the wrath of God, but "they repented not to give him glory," Rev. xvi. 9. Many men are ready to think their cause is good, because their spirits are so resolute to slight all that appears against them. Let not us have higher thoughts of them because of this, for it has always been the course of idolaters to stand out stoutly against all the rebukes of God in his word and works, because the Lord has an intent to destroy them. Hence,

Obs. 9. Sin after rebukes is exceeding sinful. It is too much to neglect God's commands, but to stand out against any intimation of his displeasure is a greater evil. God expects that the heart of sinners should in such a case melt before him; and it was the commendation of Josiah, that when the law was read, his heart melted; and indeed an ingenuous spirit is soon rebuked. But when the heart of a sinner is got above all rebukes, then it hardens exceedingly, and treasures up wrath against the day of wrath. We ourselves cannot bear others to be insensible to our rebukes, we cannot endure them to be disregarded by a child or a servant. How shall the infinite God bear our slighting of his rebukes?

O let us charge this sin upon our souls. How often has God rebuked me in his word and in his works, and yet, the Lord knows, this wretched and stubborn heart of mine has stood out against it all! Certainly this resisting of the Holy Ghost will lie one day heavy upon thy conscience. Nothing will increase the burden of sin more than this, that I have sinned, and that in my sin I have stood out against the rebukes of God. As in Prov. v. 12, 13, "And thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed, and say, How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof!" The words are spoken of one gallant, a brave young gallant, that blustereth it out in the world, and carries all before him, and cares for nothing that is said; but when the hand of God is upon him, and his flesh and body are consumed, then he begins to lament his condition, Oh, how have I despised reproof, and have not inclined mine ear to them that instructed me! This is the aggravation of sin indeed.

And that we may humble our souls for our standing out against God's rebukes, add but this consideration, that God has such rebukes in reserve as will force us to yield. If we stand out against his rebukes in his word and lesser chastisements, against his loving rebukes, let us know that God has "furious rebukes;" so they are called in Ezek. v. 15; xxv. 17. When thou comest to the word, or when thy parents, or thy governors, or thy friend, rebuke thee for thy sins, God rebukes thee in them, and these are loving rebukes; but if thou rejectest these, know, God has "furious rebukes" for thee one day, yea, "rebukes with flames of fire," Isa. lxvi. 15.

"Of them all." This (if you apply it to the prophet) shows his impartiality. And thence,

Obs. 10. Prophets' rebukes must be impartial rebukes: not like cobwebs, to take small flies and to let the great ones go through; they must be impartial. Oh how many prophets have sharpened their rebukes against those that have been truly conscientious, and have saddened their hearts even out of their pulpits; but have let those that are loose go quiet away; nay, not only quiet, but rejoicing! When the hearts of the saints have been saddened, they have sharpened their rebukes against these; but the looser of the parish, or, many times, the great ones, have gone away rejoicing. Thus, if you take the words, "I have been a rebuker of them all," actively.

But if passively, as some do, They have rebuked the prophet; as if he should say, They have been profound in their idolatrous ways, and I have been faithful in preaching to them, and what has been my recompence?

All of them have rebuked me. All of them; not only their priests, not only their chief and great men, have rebuked me, they indeed might with some show of reason bitterly inveigh against me; but all the people have done it too. I have been a rebuke to all the people, they have all been bitter against me, and sharpened their very tongues against me; Oh, say they, here is one that likes not our manner of worship, he must have another kind of religion, he tells us that we must all go up to Jerusalem and worship there, and nothing but that will be accepted. Thus they scorned and rebuked him, and even flew in his very face. Hence,

Obs. 11. It is a hard thing for a few men to stand out against a state in matters of religion.

If there be but some few unto whom God hath shown another way, and the generality differ from them, certainly those few are likely to meet with hard treatment, and to be a rebuke, not only to ministers, but generally to all the people; they must expect to be under the rebukes of all sorts. Thus it was with the prophet, and with all that went his way, he was a rebuke unto them all.

Ver. 3. I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me: for now, O Ephraim, thou committest whoredom, and Israel is defiled.

"I know Ephraim." This is Notitia judicialis, non approbationis, A knowledge to judge, not a knowledge of approbation.

"I know Ephraim;" that is, I know all his shifts, all his evasions and his cunning devices, all his plots, pretences, and base ends. These may be hid from men, but I know them all, they are not hid from me. Mark, first, "I know Ephraim," and then, I know Israel.

First, "Ephraim." By "Ephraim," as you have heard before, we are to understand the princes, the great ones, amongst them, because Jeroboam was of the tribe of Ephraim. "I know Ephraim," that is, I know the politic ends of all the great ones amongst them: they profess to man that they desire to worship me, and say, God forbid that they should change religion; and they cry out against all that would excite such suspicions of them amongst their good people. But "I know Ephraim," saith he, I know what his aim is, I know what his thoughts are, and what was plotted at such a time, and what his chamber counsels with certain priests were; I know what correspondence he has with some that corrupt my worship, and all that follow him and favour him, I know them thoroughly, all their devices and depths. I know what has been working these many years; how he seems as if he would serve me, but I know that what he does is merely to serve his own ends. I know how the poor are deluded by his fair and solemn protestations, they think he means nothing but well, and that none but a company of precise people are jealous of him; but I know what they intend, and what their ways are, whatsoever colour they put upon them. "Ephraim," that is, the great ones, the princes, persuade the people that Jeroboam and his successors aim at nothing else but to reform things for the best, but I know that matters are far otherwise; "I know Ephraim."

"Israel is not hid from me." That is, the people; they pretend that they do but as they are taught, and that they merely submit to authority, and would rejoice indeed if things were otherwise, and matters reformed more in accordance with the word of God; yet some things must necessarily be yielded to for peace sake. True indeed, they say, these prophets of the Lord, and some others, are good and honest men, and would have us to do otherwise; but things are not yet clear, and the course they recommend, though in apparent conformity with the Scriptures, may bring us a great deal of trouble and inconvenience; for peace sake then we must be contented to yield to the judgment of such and such learned and wise men; and though we yield in these matters, yet our hearts are right for God. But saith God, "Israel is not hid from me.

"Israel." That is, the base, temporizing, revolting, superstitious spirits of the people, they are not hid from me; their unwillingness to yield themselves to my government, their love to their ease and estates, the reluctance of their carnal hearts to venture and suffer any thing for my truth and ordinances. Israel, in these his distempers of heart, is not hid from me; all these things are plain before me; he may blind men and deceive his own conscience, but he cannot hide it from me, saith God. From whence the observations are these:

Obs. 1. God's eye is upon the secrets of men's hearts. Certainly, therefore, hypocrites must needs be atheists; they that think to put off God with outward shows, must needs deny God, as if God did not see the secret turnings and windings, plottings, contrivances, and aims of their hearts.

And then, oh the patience of the infinite God! that notwithstanding he sees what villany there is in the world, coloured over with religious protestations and professions, yet he bears with it. I know, saith he, I know what all their ends and aims are, and what kind of success they desire; although they colour and cover them all over with such protestations of religion, and a professed for its establishment. Oh the infinite patience of God, that can bear with men who attempt to veil their iniquities under solemn protestations and professions of religion! At this exhibition of his patience we must needs wonder.

Again, God knows all the hearts and secret aims of men; let us then pray to him to make our own hearts known to ourselves. He knows them, and except we be upright in our wish to know, and unfeignedly desire of God that he would show us, our own hearts, we possibly may, after many duties performed, perish for some secret sin that we were ourselves unconscious of. I say, it is possible for persons to go on a long time in the profession of religion, and to make conscience of all known duties, yet to perish at last for some sin that they know not to exist in themselves.

You will say, This is a hard thing; what shall become of us then?

To mollify this therefore a little, take this along with it: Except thou hast a heart unfeignedly willing to know and search itself, and earnest with God that he who knows thy heart would make it known to thyself: if, indeed, thy heart be thus upright, that thou canst appeal to God and say, Lord, I know that I have a vile, false, and hypocritical heart, and much evil may lurk secretly in it, that I have not known all this while, an evil such as I may justly perish in; but, good Lord, make it known to me, let me know the worst of myself, let me know the evil that is in me, and my purpose is to resist it: if thou hast such a heart, thou hast no cause to think that thou shalt perish for any evil ways in thee. But if thou hast any secret evil in thyself, and dost not in the uprightness of thy heart unfeignedly desire to know it, that so thou mayst forsake it, and get thyself rid of it, and canst not appeal to God that thou art willing to have it made known unto thee, thy condition may be dangerous, notwithstanding all the duties thou performest.

Obs. 2. God's eye upon our hearts and ways, is a special means to humble us. "I know Ephraim," is brought in as a means to humble Ephraim, to humble Israel.

No more powerful means in the world to humble the heart, than to remember that God looks upon our hearts and ways. The discovery of our evil to others may be some means to humble us. Oh how it would abase men, if God should discover to their friends and acquaintance all that evil that is in their hearts! And hereafter, at the great day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, how will the wicked and ungodly be abased before men and angels! We read of the adulterer in Job xxiv. 17, that the morning is to them even as the shadow of death; and if any recognise them, they are then as in the terrors of the shadow of death. Wicked men (especially adulterers, for it is spoken of them) hate the light, and the morning is unto them as the shadow of death. Now I argue, if the knowledge that men have of our secret wicked ways is so terrible to a guilty conscience, what is it then when this guilty conscience shall have real apprehensions of the infinite God! He has seen thee when thou hast been such a wretch in such an inn, in such a tavern, in such a secret place. He has seen what thou hast said and plotted; yea, what thou hast thought and plotted. Look upon God thus seeing thee, and try if it will not humble thy heart. O labour to humble thy heart by this, How unwilling was I to know such a truth! how glad when I got a thing out of my conscience, that would have forced me to measure I was reluctant to adopt! and whatever I pretended, love to myself, to my ease, to my estate, made me decline this truth of God; and God saw all this. When we feel such base workings within, such plottings and contrivings of our hearts for our own selves and for our carnal ends and aims, let us consider that the eye of God is upon us. Let us conceive we hear the voice of God from heaven saying to us, I know what you are plotting, I know what your aims are, I know the base workings of your spirits. Did we but apprehend God thus speaking from heaven to us, as here he speaks by the prophet, "I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me," it would be a special means to humble our hearts for evil present, and to prevent evil for the future.

"Now." There is in this word a great emphasis: Even still Ephraim goes on in wickedness; he has gone on a great while, and even now when I am coming against him, he continues still in his wickedness. Hence,

Obs. 3. God will deal with men according to their present ways.

In what he finds them for the present, he will deal with them for that especially. Not but that when he finds them in evil for the present, he will call them to an account for all things that are past too; but he especially suits the punishment to their present iniquities.

I note this the rather, to show to sinners this useful lesson: Whatsoever thou wast before, though thou hast continued a long time in thy wickedness, yet if thou hast but now a repenting heart to return unto God, there might be hope and help for thee. O consider this, thou wretched sinner. As if God should say here, Ephraim has continued wicked a long time, but if he had now a heart to return to me, it should be well with him; but even now, to this very moment, "Ephraim committeth whoredom:" so say I to the vilest sinner in this place, whatsoever thou hast been, here is salvation, if now at this instant thou hast a heart to turn to God: thou canst not tell whether God will ever give thee another now: if thou return now unto him, and repent and believe, thou mayst be saved; but if God come upon thee after this exercise, and find thee continuing in thy sinful ways, and say, Even now, yet for all this, this sinner continueth in his sin, this will be a heavy thing indeed. So here he comes to Ephraim, "Now, O Ephraim!" He makes an exclamation against him; O Ephraim, after all the means that have been used to recall thee, yet still, O Ephraim, thou continuest in thy idolatry.

And, "Ephraim, thou committest whoredom," thou doest it; thy sin is greater in this, for thou carriest the people with thee, and there is little hope of reformation till the great ones reform; if Ephraim commit whoredom, Israel must needs be defiled; so it follows:

"Israel is defiled." There is a twofold defilement of the people of Israel.

1. Defiled morally; that is, by their wicked works: as here, by their murders, and thefts, and adulteries.

2. "Israel is defiled;" that is, they defile my worship, and that defiles them. They have defiled my worship, and consequently are defiled themselves. And that I take to be especially meant here. "Israel is defiled;" that is, among other ways of defilement, they mingle with heathens, and bring them in to defile my worship. In Isa. xlvii. 6, God threatens to defile his sanctuary, and to pollute his inheritance: that is, when he suffers, by his just judgment, idolaters and heathens to come into his sanctuary, to mingle with his inheritance.

And then, Israel is defiled another way; that is, Israel mingles his own inventions with my worship; and Israel brings in, or suffers the heathen to come in to my worship, and so my worship is defiled, and they are defiled in consequence. Whence,

Obs. 4. Defiled worship exceedingly defiles the souls of people.

Nothing defiles the souls of men more; and, among other defilements in worship, the mixing with wicked and ungodly men, with such as God would not have come into his sanctuary, is especially injurious.

But you will say, Does the mixture of the wicked and ungodly defile the worship of God, or defile others in it? Is the sacrament of the Lord's supper the worse if wicked men partake of and unite in that rite? Am I the worse for it, or is the sacrament the worse, is that worship defiled? How may we refer this defilement of Israel to our defilement at this time? Is there any church in the world but has wicked ones in it? And will you say that they are defiled, and that the worship is defiled, because there are wicked amongst them? Then we can go no where in the world but we must be defiled, and the worship must be defiled.

Many think they may from this argue fairly, that there being a mixture in the best churches, therefore if mixtures make the communion defiled, then all are defiled. It comes fully in my way to speak to this point, and I shall do it briefly.

First, I know none who hold any otherwise but that, the best church in the world may have wicked men creep in and continue amongst them. Who knows the hearts of men when they come in? and therefore the best churches may have wicked men amongst them. This, I say, all men grant; therefore this objection, Will not there be wicked men in the best church? can have no strength in it, for no one denies it; and therefore they that make it, fight with a shadow.

But, secondly, I lay this for another position, which I think all will grant also, That the sacrament is not defiled to the receivers merely by the presence of the wicked. I verily believe every one will grant this; for my part I know none who denies this to be a truth, namely, that the sacrament is not defiled to the right receivers of it, merely because of the presence of wicked men. No one affirms the contrary to this, but all that I know of, even those that are the strictest in church order and discipline, will grant this to be a truth.

But then you will say, How shall we distinguish mixture of communion, or mixture of worship?

Not merely because wicked men are there. But, first, a congregation is then defiled, if they do not use the power that Christ has given to every church, of casting out all the scandalous persons that are amongst them. Now if any church shall (under what pretence soever, as saying they have no power, or that the power is taken from them, or the like) neglect this duty, viz. to cast out those that are unworthy, then the church is defiled, and their communion is defiled. So that their communion is not defiled because the wicked are there, but because they neglect the duties of casting them out. For let a man be a hypocrite, it is not the duty of the church to cast him out till he discover himself; but if then the church perform not its duty as it ought in his expulsion, then it is defiled. And the example of the incestuous Corinthian, in 1 Cor. v., plainly proves this. "A little leaven" (saith the apostle) "leaveneth the whole lump." What is that lump there? The church communion; and the leaven is the incestuous person; and the apostle gives order to cast him out, lest the "whole lump," the whole communion, should come to be defiled. So churches come to be defiled.

Again further, Not only churches come to be defiled, but, secondly, particular persons and communicants come to be defiled, if they neglect the duty that belongs to them as Christians. That is, Christ requires this, If thy brother offend thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more; and if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it to the church. Now if thou hast done this thy duty to all scandalous persons in the congregation, then the sin rests on the church, thou mayst receive the sacrament with comfort, though wicked men be admitted to it: so that though the communion be defiled, that is, defiled to those that are guilty, to those that have neglected their duty; yet, if you but do your duty, then, though wicked men may be there, you may receive the sacrament with comfort; for though the communion may be defiled in respect of others who have neglected their duty, yet to you it cannot be defiled. Now then, to conclude this with that place in Psal. cxix. 1, Blessed is the man that is "undefiled in the way." Blessed are those men that in their way, in the course of their lives, keep themselves from defilement, and especially keep themselves from defilement in the ways of God's worship. Blessed is he whose heart is cleansed from secret filth, that does not defile himself in the vain, carnal plots and cunning fetches of wicked men.

Obs. 5. A defiled nation is near to ruin.

"Israel is defiled." He speaks of Israel that is ready to fall, for so it follows, ver. 5, "Israel and Ephraim shall fall;" and here just before he tells us, that Israel is defiled. When clothes are so defiled that they cannot be purged, we usually cast them out; so when there is defilement and filth amongst a people and they will not be purged, the Lord utterly rejects them. While God is indeed purging a nation, there is hope. As for example, though a garment be much defiled, yet if you see care taken and cost bestowed to cleanse it, that proves that there is an intention to preserve it. So while the Lord is adopting means to purge a nation, there is much hope that the Lord intends to save that nation. And we may comfortably hope that this is God's intention toward us. God knows, we have been a defiled people, and have defiled ourselves; never a one of us but may lay his hand upon his heart, and say, I have been defiled, and so may deserve to be an outcast. But behold, the Lord is bestowing cost upon us, and he is cleansing and purging us, and therefore we may hope that the Lord will not utterly reject us.

But no marvel that the Lord lets us and our brethren lie abroad in frosty nights. Many complain of much hardship, many of our brethren are sent from their comfortable houses, and are now fain to lie in the fields in the cold. No marvel, I say; this nation has been defiled. When clothes are much defiled, it is not enough to wash them and rinse them, but you lay them abroad in frosty nights. Yea, there are some defilements that cannot be taken away but by fire; and if the Lord will not only wash us and rinse us and lay us abroad, but put us into the fire for to cleanse us at last, blessed be his name.

Ver. 4. They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God: for the spirit of whoredoms is in the midst of them, and they have not known the Lord.

Here lies the evil. Though we be defiled, if God be about to cleanse us, there is hope; but if the words that follow in this 4th verse be applied to us, then we are a lost people indeed. Israel is defiled indeed, but Israel may be brought back again to the true worship of God. No, saith God, Israel is not only defiled, but he will not frame his doings to turn unto his God.

"They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God." The words in the original are very elegant, לא יתנו מעללהם לישב אל-איהיהם Jerome and Vulg. render them, Non dabunt cogitationes, They will not give themselves to think of such a thing as turning unto the Lord. Mercer and Castellius, Non dabunt operam, They will not do their endeavours to turn unto the Lord. Tremellius, Non adhibent actiones, They do not apply any action of theirs any way to turn to the Lord. Drusius and Pagninus, Non permittunt opera, et factu sua, Their custom in their ways of sin will not suffer them to turn to the Lord. And the Septuagint and Calvin, thus, Οικειδωσαν τα εταβοδια αυτων, They give not their counsels, their studies, to turn to the Lord. These several translations I find of the words. And by all these conjoined, we may arrive at the knowledge of the meaning of the Spirit of God here; for the words are somewhat strange, therefore we need all the light we can get to find out their sense.

"They will not frame their doings." They will not give their mind to turn to the Lord, they will not put forth themselves into any posture that way. It is true, we can do nothing without the Lord, but yet the sin lies in our wills rather than in our power, therefore the will is charged by God. They cannot turn unto God of themselves, but yet they may do somewhat, they may bend their thoughts upon it, they may think of it, they may attend upon the means. But, saith the Holy Ghost, they will do nothing tending that way, they will not so much as set themselves into any kind of posture of turning unto me. This is to show what little hope of good there was in them for time to come. They are far enough from turning unto me, saith God, there is no such inclination in them, they are fully bent another way; though they cannot do it of themselves, yet they will not so much as give their minds to think of the means. Israel will not frame his doings to turn unto his God.

1. He will not so much as set his heart to think of any thing that will bring him unto God. Not so much as to think, Are my ways right or not right? What if it should prove that my ways are not right, what shall become of me then? This were one step God-ward, if a man but thus framed his doings to turn unto God; if he had but such thoughts as these, Lord, what am I doing? What is my way? Am I right or no? What if it should prove that my ways are not right, what will become of me? This were somewhat. But, saith God, these are far from any such hesitating thoughts in their sinful course, they run on violently and heedlessly, and will not so much as frame their minds to turn unto me.

2. Though a man cannot turn to God, yet through the common work of God's Spirit he may do this, he may be willing to hear and consider what is said for the ways of God. But, saith he, they are carried on with prejudice against the ways of God; let what will be said, they will not frame themselves to consider.

3. They will not wait upon God in the use of means.

It is true, we are poor, weak, and ignorant creatures; but if we would wait upon God to know his mind, if we would set our faces that way, it may be God will reveal himself more clearly unto us. In Jer. 1. 5, when God intends good to a people, it is promised, that "They shall ask the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward." True penitents will be inquiring after the ways of God with their faces standing thitherward. But, saith God, they will not do this, they will not set themselves to inquire thus after the mind and ways of God.

4. They will not apply the rule of the word to their actions. Whatsoever they see will make for their own ends, that they will follow, but they will not frame their doings so far as to take the rule of the word and apply it to their actions.

5. The light and power they have they will not use. They will not break off even gross offences, things that they cannot possibly but see to be evil. Though they cannot fully and immediately turn to God, yet there are some things so gross that they cannot possibly but see they are evil; yet, saith God, they will not so much as discontinue them, they will not use their power to reform them; and if they thus will not use that light which they have, what should they have more?

6. They will not join in with the work of God. When he is in his way toward them, when he himself is about to frame them, when he has them in his hand, they will oppose his work, they will not join in with it to frame themselves to turn unto God. But, Rom. viii. 7, it is said, "The carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Therefore, in 2 Chron. xxx. 8, Hezekiah exhorteth the priests and the people, that they should not be "stiffnecked," but "yield themselves unto the Lord;" mark, the yielding of themselves unto the Lord is contrary to stiffneckedness. But now this people are stiffnecked, they will not yield themselves unto the Lord; though by his gracious dealings with them he is framing them to turn them unto himself, they oppose and stand out against God's work. Just as when you have a child that you would fain frame to such a gesture, and you take him and put him into such a way; but now he is so far from doing of it, that he wriggles up and down and will not suffer you to frame him. Why, saith God, I have been framing them myself, I have not only shown them what they should do, but my works have been so toward them that I have been framing them, but they are stiffnecked, they will not be framed, they will not join with my work in framing of them, they will break out in their wicked ways even at the very time when I am framing of them to turn them unto myself; according unto that expression you have in Hos. vi. 1, "When I would have healed Israel, then the wickedness of Samaria was discovered;" that is, when I was about to turn them unto me, then, even at that time, they break out in their violence and wickedness.

7. They will adhere to their old customs, to their former ways, to what they have received from their forefathers, and been trained up in, these they will keep to; but to frame themselves to turn unto the Lord, that they will not.

8. They will take and improve to the uttermost every advantage they can have against the ways of God. Those that are against framing of themselves to turn unto the Lord when God is about to turn them, discover it in this, that if at the time there be any advantage that their corrupt hearts can possibly take of the ways of God, they will take that and improve it to the uttermost: just as a child, if untoward, will take any advantage of you; so it is with those people who have no heart to turn unto the Lord. There is no preparation of their hearts, what then shall I do with them? saith God: if their hearts were in any preparation it were somewhat, but they are not. We read in 2 Chron. xx., that the high places were not taken away, because the people had not prepared their hearts to turn unto the Lord. It is similar to this expression in the text, the people were not in a teachable, in a convertible frame of mind. The Lord grant that this Scripture may not be true of us at this day; that the reason why there remains so much evil in God's worship is, because the people have not prepared their hearts, they do not frame their doings to turn unto the Lord. It was a charge upon Rehoboam, in 2 Chron. xii. 14, that "He did evil, because he prepared not his heart to seek the Lord." But you will say, What power had he to turn unto the Lord? he was a wicked man. Yea, but this wicked man, though he had no saving grace, yet is charged for doing evil in that he did not prepare his heart to seek the Lord. God therefore expects that a people, though not able to turn to him thoroughly, yet should have their faces Zion-ward; and as a people in general, so every soul in particular.

Some that are not yet turned to the Lord, yet are in a way of turning, in a readiness to receive what God shall reveal. This is a happy condition. If God shall see a nation, though it be not fully reformed, ready to receive what he shall reveal, oh, this is a happy thing. As the Scripture saith, John iv. 35, "the fields are white already to harvest," that is, there was a preparation in the hearts of people to receive the gospel; they are ready to embrace what the mind of God is, when it shall be revealed unto them. Oh that this might be said of this people, they are willing to hear, consider, and observe, what God shall speak.

God is about to bring us out of superstition, both his works and word are tending that way; but there are multitudes of people that will not frame their doings to turn unto the Lord, their spirits are perverse, they are full of prejudice, froward, and reluctant to be convinced. The apostle Peter bids the saints, in Acts ii. 40, save themselves from that untoward generation. O, let not this charge be upon us, that we are an untoward generation, that God is framing us for good, but we will not frame our doings to turn unto the Lord. As we see a workman, when he has a piece of timber that is knotty and will not work in his hand, he casts it into the fire; or as clay that is not well tempered, will not work in the hand of the workman, he many times casts it away in anger, it will not work in my hand, what shall I do with it? The Lord is hewing of us by his prophets, and seeking to frame this nation to his will; O, let us work in God's hand, let us join in his design, and yield ourselves to the work of God, that the Lord may not cast us into the fire.

If we will not frame our doings to turn unto the Lord, he may break us, break that frame that we raise in our own imaginations. Perhaps we are framing to ourselves a strange kind of commonwealth, to enjoy our ease, and honours, and prosperity, and so we build castles in the air. O, but let us rather frame our hearts to turn unto the Lord. If we will not, God may put us into the fire again. A workman, you know, puts the iron into the fire that it may be worked into the form he wishes; and still the iron is hard and it will not frame to his hand, then he subjects it to the fire and hammer again. So the Lord hath begun to put us into the fire that we may frame our doings to turn unto him; and if these we have been in will not bring our hearts to a framable disposition, the Lord may return us to the fire again and again. And let not us complain of the heat of God's fire, but rather let us complain of the waywardness of our own hearts, that we do not frame our doings so as to turn unto the Lord.

But yet, through God's mercy, we cannot say that there are many of every rank, here and throughout the rest of England, that are framing themselves to turn unto the Lord. Let us take notice of God's goodness, therefore, and enlarge a little on the proofs of this.

1. They have abolished what is sinful. It was a great plea among us, First let us know what we shall have, and then we will cast out this that we have. This was a plea fomented by the antichristian party; but, certainly, it was the way of God; and we have cause to bless God for it, that it put into the heart of the parliament and of the kingdom, to be willing to put down, and to cast out, and that by a solemn oath, by lifting up hands unto the most high God, whatsoever was naught.

2. Their willingness to be directed aright. The parliament has called an assembly, such as I believe never yet was in this nation, nor scarce in any other, men of gravity, judgment, and holiness, such as they thought might best direct them in the ways of God; and they profess that whatsoever shall be revealed to be the right way, they will walk in it. This is a good frame of heart.

3. Their solemn day of humiliation. The assembly has begun with such a day to humble themselves before God, that the Lord may guide them to direct aright those that had them. There was never such a work in England before that was begun with such a day of humiliation. Did your convocation ever keep such a day unto God, to beg of him directions in the work?

Let not people be discontented, or cast any slanders or calumnies upon them, because of some particular failings: for you must know, when God looks upon kingdoms and states, he does not so much regard particular actions as the general tendency; now that there is so much done in a public way, that there is so much framableness, though there be much failing in particulars, yet we have cause to bless God. It is true, those that would fain have a perfect reformation, would have men thoroughly frame themselves presently, and set up all presently without any more ado, and banish all presently. I suppose this results from a good intention, from love to Christ and his ordinances: but we must know it is not so easy to reform a whole nation that has been so corrupted and defiled; therefore, though there be not so perfect a reformation at present, yet let us bless God for what is done, that there is so much framing of the doings of the nation to turn unto the Lord, and not murmur and repine because all is not done that we desire.

And though perhaps they may never bring the work thoroughly to the pitch we desire, yet I make no question but what the parliament and assembly have done, will be enough to lay a foundation for another generation, if they bring it not to perfection themselves. Oh that the Lord would yet further frame our hearts and doings to turn unto him!

Has God at any time put into your heart a framable disposition to turn unto the Lord? Has God begun to make you think of your ways? Has he begun to excite fear in your hearts concerning your eternal estate? Has he wrought in you some desires to know him, to attend upon him in the use of means? Make much of this framable disposition, for it is very pleasing unto God; God complains where it is not, therefore he likes it where it is; and improve it: oh happy had it been with many had they improved that framable disposition that God had wrought in them! Cannot you remember, when sometimes you came to the word, what a melting frame of spirit you had? and in such an alligation you were as iron put into the fire, fit to be moulded into any form? But what is become of this disposition? Is it not worse with you now than before? Have you not lost it? The time was when the word excited in you good desires and dispositions, and you have thought, Oh, now I hope God will turn me to himself; I hope I shall never be at such a pass again as I have been: and thou didst begin to abandon such and such a corruption. This was a good frame, and if you had gone alone and sought God, and prayed of him to advance and perfect this work, it had been well with you; but you have fallen upon other business, and gone into company, and, it may be, on the next temptation have been overcome, and your hearts have been hardened. Iron, you know, when it has been once in the fire, and is grown cold, is more unamalleable than before: so it is with many, after they have been in some measure wrought upon by the word, and broken down by affliction, they have been more unframable than they were before.

And let us make much of it likewise in others. Is there any friend, or child, or kinsman, or acquaintance of yours, brought into this framable disposition? does the Lord begin to melt and soften their hearts? Is the Lord, by such a sermon, or by such an affliction, beginning to work upon them? Oh let me advance it as much as I can. The devil does so, when he sees us in a framable disposition to sin, he sets tempters on work to improve it; and we know it was the way of idolaters, when they saw England in a framable disposition to idolatry, what abundance were sent amongst us to improve it! Oh the mercy of God toward England, that when we were framing our doings to return to idolatry, the Lord comes and puts the frame of England more from thence than before it was! O let not us lose this framableness; though it is not so much as we desire, yet let not us lose what it is. England would be in a lamentable condition if it should lose what it has got from God already. Yet further on this,

Obs. 1. Apostates seldom have any inclination to turn unto God.

No meltings of spirit, no yieldings, but their hearts are hardened, and they depart further and further from God; for so he speaks of Israel as an apostatizing people. I dare almost challenge you all, when did you ever know a notorious apostate turn unto God? Very rarely. I will not say it is impossible, but with respect to apostates that are men of parts, and have gone far from God, if they have but proceeded so far as to be persecutors or contemners of the truth, as these Israelites here were, when did you ever know any of them to turn unto God? "They will not frame their doings."

"Their God." Their God: 1. By profession. 2. Their God who has showed much mercy to them, and has done them much good. 3. The God who is yet willing to be their God. They will not return unto him.

This is the aggravation of their sin, that they will not turn to such a God. What! not turn to him whom they profess to be theirs, whom they flatter with their mouths, and say that all their good and happiness is in him? not to him who has so blessed them all their days? not to him who is yet willing to be reconciled to them? Oh this is a sore and bitter evil indeed, that they will not turn to this God.

But yet there is a further thing observable here.

Obs. 2. True repentance is not only to leave evil and to do good, but to turn unto God as our God: "Their God."

To turn to God as a God in covenant with us; as a God in whom is our portion and happiness; as a God willing to be reconciled. Here indeed is the very formality of repentance. A man may, by the terrors of the law, turn from the practice of a sin; he may, by the strength of natural conscience and self-interest, set upon good duties; but here is no true repentance. True repentance is this, when we look upon God as tendering himself to us as a covenant God in Christ, and so we turn unto him. In Jer. iii. 22, "Return, ye backsliding children," (saith the Lord,) "and I will heal your backslidings." Now mark the answer of true penitents; "Behold, we come unto thee; for thou art the Lord our God." So when God calls to a sinner, Return, O return unto the Lord, for he is willing to be your God in an everlasting covenant; he manifests his grace toward you in his Son, and offers you mercy there; yea, he is willing to heal all your backslidings and forgive all your sins; and a sinner answers, "Behold, we come unto thee; for thou art the Lord our God:" true, indeed, we have sought after vanity, but now our good, our happiness, is in thee; "we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God:" here is true repentance.

"For the spirit of whoredoms." Here is the reason why they turn not unto the Lord, "The spirit of whoredoms is in the midst of them."

1. Many understand by this, that evil unclean spirit that possessed them. And then the observation is, Obs. 3. It is God's just judgment to give men over to the devil to be blinded and hardened, when they forsake him and his truth.

Do not excuse thy sin by saying it is the devil that tempts thee, for this may prove its aggravation, that by the just judgment of God thou art now given up to be under the power of the devil, and to be acted upon by him. As in Eph. ii. 2, the Scripture speaks of the miserable estate that men are in by nature, dead in sin, the children of wrath; and amongst other aggravations of their misery, this is not the least, they walk according to "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." The word translated "worketh," ἐνεργουτος, implies an effectual, internal activity; and this is an aggravation of their misery, and not any excuse to them for their sin. Thou hast rejected the good Spirit, the holy Spirit of God; and now the spirit of whoredom, an unclean, vile spirit, works in thee.

2. By "the spirit of whoredoms," others understand a violent inclination to uncleanness, both spiritual and bodily, confirmed by indulgence. We have had this phrase before, in chap. iv. 12. The spirit of fornication. So then, saith the prophet, they will not turn to the Lord, for there is a violent inclination of spirit, an impetus with which they are carried on in the ways of wickedness, that there is little hope of turning them to God. "The spirit of whoredoms," that is, the efficacy that there is in that wicked disposition of their hearts to carry them on so violently. In 2 Thess. ii. 11, the Scripture saith, that because men love not the truth, the Lord gives them up to the efficacy of error: "And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie;" so it is in your translations, but the words, ἐνέργεια πλάνης, signify the efficacious inworking of error, to carry them on irresistibly from error to error. We find sometimes, in men carried on to erroneous opinions, such an impetus of spirit, such an efficacy of the error in them, which so hurries on their hearts, that they cannot calmly or quietly listen to any thing calculated to undeceive them. That is a spirit of error; God gives them up to the efficacy, the spirit, the activity, the power of error, to believe a lie.

"Is in the midst of them." That is, it is come into them, and sitteth as a king and ruler in their hearts. An evil spirit may beset the godly, may compass them about, but it gets not into their midst, they keep it out from the throne, it does not reign over them. The coming into the midst of them, denotes the full possession that this unclean spirit, this impetus and strong inclination of mind, has over them. And therefore you find, in Prov. viii. 20, that it is said of wisdom, "I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment." That is, wisdom not only brings men to the verge of God's ways, to be a little taken with their outside, but brings them into "the midst of the paths of judgment;" that is, they come wholly into them, so that they even take full possession of them. So in 1 Sam. iv. 3, "Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us." The force of the Hebrew is, that it may come into the midst of us, and there have full power to do us good and save us. They depended much on the ark, and yet it failed them. By the way, we may depend too much on a good cause; the cause may be good, and yet, depending on it, and neglecting to reform our own lives, we may fail as they did here.

Many men receive an evil spirit quickly into their midst, when, God knows, the good Spirit of the Lord stands knocking at the door of their hearts, and cannot have entertainment even in the outer room.

"And they have not known the Lord." That is, they know not my greatness, my holiness, they know not what a jealous God I am. Idolaters have low and mean apprehensions of God. The right knowledge of God will lead the heart to seek after the worship acceptable to him; but when men know not God, and discern not his glory, greatness, and excellency, they think to put him off with their own devices and will worship, their own fancies and conceits. A soul that rightly apprehends what God is, dares not tender up to God any worship but his own.

Now from the connexion of these words, "The spirit of whoredoms is in the midst of them, and they have not known the Lord," a specially important observation flows.

Obs. 4. Impetuosity of spirit blinds the mind. "The spirit of whoredoms is in them;" and then follows, "they have not known the Lord." Whatsoever is said then against their way cannot convince them. Men do not consider how they come to be blinded, although ordinary experience points out the manner: when the mind is possessed by passion, love, fear, sorrow, or any other strong affection, and carried out powerfully to the object which excites them, it will not listen to, will not understand, any thing urged against it; the voice of reason is unheeded, charming never so wisely. Some have a spirit of sluggishness, and they love their ease; a spirit of covetousness, and they must have their estates; a spirit of ambition, and they must have their honour and respect; a spirit of pride and self-love, and they must not on any account grant that they are ignorant and mistaken; therefore they cannot see the truths, the ways of God. But now let God humble such men, let the edge of their spirits be taken off, let him come and but mortify these their prevailing lusts, and then they with ease begin to see that which they could never see before; then a mere hint of any truth moves their hearts; whereas before, all the means of conviction were unavailing.

O my brethren, when we come to examine truths, let us look to our spirits. "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord;" him will the Lord teach in his right way. When a man, humbling his soul before the Lord, and being jealous of his own spirit, examines a truth, and cries to God to subdue what is evil in him, and to give him a teachable heart to discover the truth; suppose that yet he cannot find it; let such a man walk according to the light wherunto he has attained, and he may rest in hope that God in due time will show him more. But that which is evil in God's eyes, and in the eyes of the saints, is, when men are hindered from seeing a truth by a spirit of opposition to it. No gracious heart can take it ill, if he see one that has a spirit subject to God, a spirit wherein the fear of God appears, in an unfeigned desire to know what the mind of God is: suppose that for the present I cannot make such a man understand what I would, yet so long as his spirit is thus submissive to God, I have no cause to be provoked against him, but to treat him with all love, meekness, and gentleness, and expect that God in due time will reveal himself unto him. But when one professes to desire to know the truths and mind of God; and yet there appears a spirit of opposition, pride, and vain-glory; oh, this it is which is grievous in the eyes of God, and wearisome to his saints.

Ver. 5. And the pride of Israel doth testify to his face: therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity; Judah also shall fall with them.

Mark, as there is a connexion between a spirit of whoredom and not knowing God, so there is a connexion between not knowing God and the pride of Israel. They know not the Lord, and the pride of Israel doth testify to his face. From whence,

Obs. 1. Ignorance and pride usually go together. There are no men so conceited of their knowledge as the ignorant. For where there is knowledge, there a man sees that he knows but little, and is able to discover his own deficiency; but an ignorant man is not able to discover his own ignorance, and therefore usually he is proud. You shall have many men, and women too, that will pretend such abundance of knowledge, and their hearts are puffed up, because they have got some expressions more than others have, as if they were somebody, and had some manifestations of things to them more than others have; yet come and examine things at the bottom, and the truth is, they are ignorant of the very principles of religion. 1 Tim. vi. 4. "He is proud, knowing nothing," saith the text; and yet he speaks of those that are full of vain questions and janglings about matters of religion, that will come with such objections and curiosities of questions, yet the Holy Ghost saith, he is proud and knows nothing. And certainly, the man that is there spoken of is a man as much conceited of his knowledge as you can conceive a man to be, as appears plainly in the text.

But now, wisdom and humility, they likewise go together too. "With the lowly is wisdom," Prov. xi. 2. If the heart be brought under God, put in a gracious, humble, lowly frame, with the lowly there is wisdom, the Lord delighteth to reveal himself to the humble.

"The pride of Israel." The Seventy read the words otherwise: The injury and the wrong that Israel has done unto God, shall be <sup>ταπεινωθήσεται</sup> brought down, shall be humbled: for I suppose their meaning in that translation is, that whereas Israel by his wicked ways has wronged and been injurious to God, he shall be humbled for it, he shall be brought down and made to know what it is for him so to wrong God. And indeed, those that corrupt God's worship are the greatest wrongers of God in the world, they do the greatest injury unto God.

But we may safely keep to the translation in your books, as more suitable to the original than that of the Seventy, and then the observation is,

Obs. 2. Idolaters are proud men, and idolatry is a proud sin.

The scope of the prophet here is chiefly to rebuke them for their false worship; though he speaks of other sins, yet that is the main. "The pride of Israel doth testify to his face;" Israel will have their own way of worship and forsake God, O proud hearts that they have! Idolatry is a proud sin. In all disobedience against God there is much pride: pride of the heart is manifested not only in clothes and in fine things, but in disobedience against God; and as in all sin there is pride, so in a more peculiar manner in the sin of idolatry. For,

1. Idolaters regard the true worship of God as a mean thing, as a thing beneath them. Their way of worship is pompous, fine, and splendid; but the true worship of God is poor, low, and mean. All your superstitious and idolatrous people look thus on the simplicity of the ways and worship of God.

2. They presume to put more dignity on a creature than God has, to put more honour on places than God and nature have imposed. God has made them thus and thus, but I will exalt them higher, and put an excellency, a spiritual, yea, a divine excellency upon them; for so idolaters take upon themselves to do, and this is horrible pride.

3. They prescribe the form of God's worship. The worship of God is the dearest thing he has in the world; and for any creature to take upon him to prescribe which way he shall be worshipped, is the most notorious pride in the world.

4. They honour what is a man's own because it is his own, rather than what is God's. Do not you see it plainly in all superstitious, idolatrous people? As in that one thing of days? God has set one day apart for the honouring of himself, and for the celebration of the birth, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, and of the whole work of our redemption: how is that day slighted and neglected! But what a horrible wickedness is it accounted not to keep that which man sets apart by himself, that day which is of man's appointment! Men will set apart a day for the honour of Christ, and insist that Christ is quite forgotten if that day be forgotten, and Christ is much dishonoured if that day be not regarded. I appeal to you, who sets it apart? whose is it? Is it God's, or is it yours? God's? Certainly, if such a thing were so acceptable to God as men conceive it to be, we should have some little hint, somewhat in the book of God regarding it. We have the story of all the acts of the apostles, what they did in several places, and there is not the least mention of any such thing of their honouring Christ, by setting a day apart for the celebration of his nativity: we have the epistles to several churches upon several occasions, and we find no notice taken of any such thing in any church they established. Surely therefore it is men's own, there is nothing in God's word for it, how highly soever it is honoured. But we have enough in Scripture for God's own day, the Lord's day; it is appointed by God himself to be a day of thanksgiving for the birth, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and for the whole work of our redemption: but man, out of his pride, will have another day, and so set his post by God's post; he thinks it is not honour enough to Christ to put the celebration of his birth, death, resurrection, ascension, all together in one day; no, he thinks it conduces more to the honour of Christ to have several days, one for his birth, another for his resurrection, and another for his ascension; whereas God hath put all into one, and would have his Son honoured by the observation of that one day.

"Doth testify to his face." In the original it is, answereth to his face. When any thing is returned suitable to the work expended, that is said to answer that work: as, when the ground brings forth corn for the husbandman, then it answers to the seed and labour of the husbandman; Gen. xxx. 33, "So shall my righteousness answer for me," saith Jacob to Laban, I shall have that which is suitable to my righteousness. So here, The pride of Israel answereth to his face, that is, the fruit of their pride shall be, in the punishment of it, fully answerable to its sinfulness: so I find many render it. Micah i. 2, "Let the Lord God be witness against you," testify against you, (it is the same in Hebrew,) or answer you according to your sins, in the way of punishment. When the Lord brings suitable judgments, full up to the measure of men's sins, those judgments do answer; yea, and witness against them, they witness to the faces of those men the guilt of those sins.

Well, but we will rather take it, and so it is to be understood I think, according to what you read in your books, "The pride of Israel doth testify to his face:" that is, the pride that appears in Israel doth fully testify the horrible wickedness and obstinacy that is in Israel, it testifies it to his face. It is true, you cannot see the heart; but pride in the heart seldom lies there long secret, for it is a sin that must be above-board; pride must vent itself, in that its glory consists. You could not see the vileness and wickedness that was in a sinner's heart before; but now this sin "pride" that is sent forth, is a loud witness against him of the evil that dwells within.

There is a secret pride, and a witnessing pride. Isa. iii. 9, "The show of their countenance doth witness against them; and they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not;" but manifest it outwardly in their very countenance: it is taken from harlots; some that are at first departed from their husbands keep things very secretly, and you shall perceive them demure in their countenance; but at length they come to be bold and impudent in their filthiness, and you may perceive adultery in their very countenance, and they witness openly in their words and looks the wickedness of their hearts. As that sin of adultery, so almost all sins are witnessed where pride is discovered. No sin disgraces men more than pride, and that is the curse of God upon it. Pride seeks for the greatest honour to a man, and there is nothing that doth more dishonour him. Why? Because pride doth testify that there is a woeful deal of evil in that man's heart: as I will instance a little.

A man that differs in judgment from his brethren in divers things, pretends this, he cannot see the truth of God, which he would fain see; he cannot do as his brother, for his conscience bindeth him otherwise. But, you will say, every man pleads conscience; how shall we know whether it be the stoutness of his heart, or the tenderness of his conscience? Thus, if this man behaves himself humbly, and the rather humbly in all other things, because he cannot see as his brother in some particulars, and so is in danger to be an offence to his brother, and therefore his soul is humbled;* this is a good witness that it is conscience, and not mere obstinacy, that makes him differ. But now, if his behaviour be high and proud when he differeth from his brother, and he does not consider it as an affliction to him that he cannot see as his brother, but censures him, and thinks that it is either through his weakness or his wilfulness that he will not see, and so carries himself high and proudly before his brother, this witnesseth to his face that it is stubbornness and singularity. Thus his pride testifies to his face the inward wickedness of his heart.

And as in a church, this is a principle, that though a man be guilty of many and great sins, yet he is not to be cast out but for obstinacy. You will say, How shall we know that obstinacy is in a man's heart? I know many observe such and such rules for it, as, if you do not reform when certain learned men tell you what they would do, &c. But we say, if, after an offence and admonition, any one in a congregation conducts himself proudly, this, his proud behaviour, witnesseth to his face, that it is not out of tenderness or scruple of conscience that he yields not to what his brethren would have him, but through the stoutness of his heart. His "pride testifieth to his face."

* Or, that his brother does not see what he does. This passage must be understood, 1. Of lesser differences. 2. Not absolutely nor always, but in things wherein one is not clear; for if he be, he cannot but think it is at least weakness in that particular, (though in others he may judge him stronger than himself, that he does not see the same with him.

The pride of men's hearts witnesses much against them. I remember I have read in Bede, a story of a synod or assembly of divines, held in England in the time of Austin, then bishop of Canterbury. On convening together they went to a holy anchorite, to advise with him, whether they should yield to what Austin desired to impose on them? and he replied, If he be a man of God, yield to him; if not, stand out against him. They answer, A man of God! how shall we know that, whether he be a man of God or no? Whereupon he said, If he be humble; for Jesus Christ saith, "Learn of me, for I am meek and humble in heart;" if he be a humble man, he is a man of God, and then learn of him. But how shall we judge of his humility? say they; and he replied, You shall perceive it by his behaviour: let him arrive at the place of assembly before you, and if then you perceive him behave himself imperiously, proudly, not so much as to rise to show you any respect, then take it for granted that he is a proud man, and reject what he imposes; but if he be meek, humble, and lowly in his demeanour to you, then regard what he saith. So when they came to the assembly, Austin sat in his chair, in a proud, imperious manner, and would not stir to any of them: upon that they rejected whatsoever he said, for according to the counsel of the holy man, his pride did witness to his face that he had a vile and a wicked heart, and did not come to them in the name of Christ.

That which comes from the humble and lowly is much to be regarded. Humility does witness to the face of a man, that he knows much of the mind of Christ; and pride witnesses to the face of a man, that he is not acquainted with the mind of Christ.

The word נָבִיחַ here translated "pride," I find that a learned interpreter, Livelius, because in itself it signifies excellency, thinks it refers to God, who swears "by the excellency of Jacob," Amos viii. 7; and so interprets it thus, That God who is the excellency of Israel, in whom Israel should glory, is he that doth witness against them. And I find some incline to this; but the other I conceive rather to be the scope of the Holy Ghost, taking the word as it is translated for "pride," and the "testifying to his face" for an open, apparent witnessing, so as to render it manifest.

"Therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity." Ephraim is the princes of Israel; they were proud because of the honour they had. And Israel, the people, they were proud because they had great men to bear them out, and they could plead authority for what they did. But they shall both fall, both Ephraim and Israel. Hence,

Obs. 3. The fruit of sin is a casting down.

It is here said, they shall fall, rather than that they shall be punished, in reference to what went before; for there he had spoken of the pride of Israel: and from thence further

Obs. 4. Pride goes before a fall. God will cast down the proud; and certainly, when those that are proud fall, they must needs fall very low, because a proud man lifts up himself on high, and you know, according to the height, so is the fall: now a proud man lifts up himself so high indeed, as even to exalt himself above God, therefore his fall must needs be very great. And upon this I remember Bernard remarks, Here is the reason why a proud man can have no grace from God. Why? God is the fountain of grace, and it is a rule in nature, that the stream that comes from a fountain ascends no higher than its source. Now God being the fountain of all grace, surely grace cannot rise higher than God himself; but a proud man lifts himself up above God, therefore he is above grace, grace cannot reach him.

1. A proud man goes from God, as if he could live without him; for that is the pride of men's hearts, when they have outward prosperity they go from God, as if they could live without him.

2. He goes against God, as if he were able to resist him.

3. He goes beyond God, as if he made himself the end of all his actions.

4. He lifts up himself above God, as if there were more excellency in him than in God. He lifts up his will above God, and that two ways:

(1.) He desires his will to be followed rather than God's.

(2.) Whereas God is contented to have his will only in just and good things; a proud man saith, I will have my will, whether it be just or not. Come and deal with a proud man and say, Do you well in this? is this fit? I will have my will, is the reply: this is more than God challenges to himself. God will have his will in nothing but what is good and just; thou wilt have thy will whether it be just or no: thus thou goest beyond God, and liftest up thyself above him, therefore surely thou shalt fall.

I need not show you any example of the fall of proud men; this our age manifests it clearly enough. How hath God cast a stain on proud, superstitious men! You know what a height they were grown to, two or three years since; and now two, if not three, kingdoms have lifted up their hands to the most high God to extirpate them. Their pride did testify to their faces, and no marvel that they are fallen; and the Lord cast them so far down, that they may never be able to rise up in their pride again.

"In their iniquity." The Hebrew בְּיַגְוֵם signifies for, as well as "in;" fall for their iniquity, as well as in their iniquity. But to keep to the word, they shall "fall in their iniquity." Surely they fall hard who fall in their iniquity, they fall so as to break their bones, yea, oftentimes to their utter destruction.

My brethren, these are falling times, and if we fall in our iniquities, great and grievous shall be our fall; but if our iniquities be removed by faith and repentance, though we should fall, yet we shall fall into the bosom of our Father, and into the arms of Jesus Christ. How much better is it, seeing that men are like to fall, to labour then to remove our iniquities beforehand, and not to fall in them! And if we fall not in our iniquity, but in the cause of God, and on account of the grace given unto us, then we may be of more use in our fall than we were in our standing. As it is with corn, which falling into the ground fructifies, and is more profitable then than when it was in the granary; so many godly men, many young ones, that are fallen within these two or three years, not in or for their iniquity, but in the cause of God, and in the exercise of their graces. They are fallen indeed, but fallen into the arms of God, and into the bosom of Christ; and they are as fruitful in their fall as they were in their standing, for no question but God will cause much fruit and a plentiful harvest for England to arise in consequence.

"Judah also shall fall with them." Mark, first Ephraim shall fall, and then Judah, for indeed Ephraim was first in sin. The ten tribes first forsook the true worship of God, and they brought in Judah together with them, and the text saith, that "Judah shall fall with them." This is here mentioned to aggravate Ephraim's sin, and the judgment attendant, thus; This shall lie heavy on Ephraim one day, that not only he has ruined himself, but ruined Judah too; brought Judah into his sin, and involved him in his plagues. Hence,

Obs. 5. It is a great aggravation for any one to think what misery he brings others into, when God truly enlightens his conscience. It may be God's hand is upon thee for thy sin. This is grievous. Oh but, together with the sin, have not I by my counsel, by my example, by my countenance, brought others into sin? And I have brought them into misery as well as myself: it may be there are many in hell at this time whom I have holpen thither. It is true, God's hand is upon me: I am falling, and whither I shall fall I know not; I see hell open, and I may fall into it; however, I am afraid of this, that there are some fallen into hell already, of whose sin I was the cause; and is it possible that I should be preserved out of it? must I not follow them and fall thither too, when they are there already through my wickedness? You, therefore, that have associated with, and led others to wickedness, many of your companions may be dead and gone, without any manifestation of repentance; you had indeed need to be thoroughly humbled.

Obs. 6. It is no plea, you see, for any one to say, I will follow the example of others. If you will follow the example of others you must perish with others. Judah follows the example of Ephraim, and Judah must fall with Ephraim.

Obs. 7. If God's people comply with wicked men, they must expect to fall with them in outward judgments. Judah was the only people God had on the earth, and as Israel is a type of the apostate church so is Judah a type of the true church; yet it seems that Judah, though the true church and the only people of God, very much complied with Israel; and complying with Israel in false worship, they must fall with them. Come out from amongst them, my people, lest, being partakers of their sins, you be partakers of their plagues too. And this, I make no question, is the reason why so many of God's servants fall at this day, they have conformed to the times and defiled themselves; though we cannot say so of every one of them that fall in this cause, yet it is to be feared it has been the case with many. And it may be, though we dare not determine of God's ways, for the thoughts of God's ways in mercy are higher than our thoughts, higher than the heavens are above the earth, yet we have cause to fear that many, if not most of this generation, shall fall before God brings forth this glorious work of his in saving our Zion.

But here is a difficulty; in the first chapter you heard that God, though he threatened Israel, yet said, "I will have mercy upon Judah;" but here he saith, Ephraim shall fall, and Judah shall fall with him. Now for the reconciling of that, we are to know that though Judah fall with Israel, yet there shall be a great deal of difference in their fall. Israel, the ten tribes, shall be brought into captivity so as never to return again; I mean, never to return from their captivity as Judah did; Judah was to return again after seventy years: so Judah fell with them, but they fell not as they fell. Though the saints therefore may be scourged with rods, yea, with scorpions, as they are at this day, as well as wicked men, yet the Lord does not, will not, take his loving-kindness from them.

There is yet one particular more to be observed, and it is from the Hebrew particule  $\text{וְ}$ , "Judah also shall fall with them;" and I question not but the Spirit of God holds forth this note from it.

Obs. 8. The falling of the saints with wicked men is of special consideration. There is much in it; some special matter to be considered of in the falling of God's people with the wicked. Indeed it is that which, in these days, puts us to a stand; we wonder at the ways of God, his judgments are past finding out: we must adore them in what we do not understand. That the hand of God should be stretched out against the wicked, against such as have corrupted his worship by their own superstitions, is no marvel; but that so many of his dear saints, so precious in his eyes, in all the surrounding countries, should suffer such hard things, and fall together with the wicked, we are at a stand, and know not what this means. What! Judah fall also with Israel, when God had no other people on the face of the earth? surely there is some great matter in it. It is, I say, of special consideration: and there are many things that God would have us seriously to observe in the fall of his people together with wicked men.

1. How holy a God he is. He spared not his own Son, and he spares not his dearest ones. He will give the dearly beloved of his soul into the hands of his enemies. God had but one Son that never sinned against him; but he has not one son that never was afflicted by him. And therefore we have no cause to wonder that the godly sometimes suffer, for his own Son did.

2. None must presume on former services. When Israel forsook God Judah did cleave to God's true worship, and in that God was much honoured. But Judah must not rely on that; Oh, I have done service for God, when others forsook him I cleaved to him; and so think to take more liberty afterward. No, saith God, though Judah has much honoured me, and adhered to my worship, when Israel, the ten tribes, forsook me, yet if Judah shall afterwards comply with Israel, Judah shall likewise fall. None must presume upon former services. It is customary with men, if they have been useful in some things, to begin to take liberty to themselves to do what is not convenient, thinking that because they have done some service they must not now be contradicted in any of their desires. Thus we find it often among men, and from this many amongst us have fallen. How many have there been, that in the beginning of this parliament, and at the commencement of these wars, have done good service for the commonwealth; and afterwards began to be high and proud, and they must have what they will, and none must contradict them, but every body must submit unto them! and so through their pride, though they have done good service, yet afterward they fall. Let every one take heed of this, both in regard of God, and also with respect to man. You that have been most forward in the public cause, never think to presume because of what you have done; but walk humbly now, and be serviceable still, for otherwise you may fall, notwithstanding your services, as Judah did.

3. God engages himself to no people if they transgress. "Judah also shall fall:" by that God declares that there are no men, though never so useful, but he can do without. Perhaps you may think, if you desert the cause, where will there be any to stand up in your room? Take heed, though you may think you are the most useful man, either in the ministry, or in the city, know that God can do without you, and you may fall as well as other men.

4. If his own people fall with the wicked, what then may wicked men expect? If such things be done to the green trees, what shall be done to the dry? If judgment begin at the house of God, where shall the wicked and ungodly appear?

Ver. 6. They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord; but they shall not find him; he hath withdrawn himself from them.

Shall they fall? No, they have a way to prevent it; they will pacify God with the multitude of their sacrifices, their flocks and their herds, they are content to spend those all in sacrifices unto God; and shall this people fall? There is much to be observed from every word here; the interpretation is not difficult, and the observations I shall pass briefly.

"They shall go."  $\text{יֵצְאוּ}$  Ibant huc et illuc, modo ad

hunc, modo ad illum montem, as interpreters render it; They shall run up and down, from one place to another, from one sacrifice to another, in a kind of hurry of spirit. And from that word there may be this observed:

Obs. 1. Those who depend on duties are in a distraction of spirit when their duties prevail not. They often change their duties, but they change not their hearts. Many think, Well, I have done thus; yea, but if I shall add this to what I have done, then I shall prevail: whereas those that do their duties in obedience to God, and go out of themselves and depend for their acceptance on a higher sacrifice, on Jesus Christ; these go on with much sweetness and quietness of spirit, though for the present they see not the thing performed which they aim at in their duties: their spirits are not in a hurry and in a distraction as the spirits of others that depend upon their duties.

Obs. 2. God contemns the services of hypocrites, of superstitious and idolatrous apostates. "With their flocks and herds." He means, with their sacrifices, but he gives them not the name of sacrifices, but only "their flocks and herds," for they are not worthy of that name.

Obs. 3. It is a sad thing when God will not own as his what we tender up to him. "Their flocks and their herds." Mark, they make use of their own, according to their own mind, in their own ways, to worship me as they list; and therefore God doth not call them his, doth not own them as his, but he terms them "their flocks and their herds;" What they do, saith God, what they offer, is their own, their flocks and their herds, I will not own them: so in our sacrifices of prayer and praise, typified by those legal sacrifices, in which we seem to tender up ourselves wholly unto God; for God to say, All that you have presented all this while in your prayers, I own not, these are none of mine, they are all your own; this were indeed a sad thing.

There is no such way to put an excellency upon any thing we have, upon our parts, abilities, or estates, as this, to tender them up first unto God; and if God shall please to own them, then to receive them again out of his hands; we shall then receive them with abundance of sweetness and excellency. But here he calls them, "their flocks and their herds;" though they were tendered unto God in sacrifice, yet he will not say they are his, but their own. Thus it is with all hypocrites, and formal and superstitious persons, in their services. Self is the principle of what you do, and therefore all your services remain your own, you serve yourself rather than God in them.

Herein lies the sweetness and true comfort of a man's estate, or of whatsoever he possesses, when he shall consecrate and devote them all to God so that they remain no longer his own. This is a sacrifice that God is well pleased with. These are my talents, saith God, this is my estate, here I return to you again: and when a man shall take what he has as having first consecrated and devoted it to God, and receiving it out of God's hand again, O, this adds a sweetness and a blessing to it. All we have is God's, as he is the first cause of all; but mark, God rejoices as much, if not more, in a second right that he has to our possessions, namely, by our tendering up all to him in a gracious manner, as he does in the first right of being the cause of all. I beseech you observe this, God has a twofold right to the estates, parts, and abilities of his people. First, he has a right to them as he is the cause of them; I gave them to you, therefore they are mine. But secondly, when his servants by an exercise of grace shall offer them up again to him, Now, saith God, they are mine by a second right; and this second right to them, they being tendered up to me in a holy manner, is the right that I rejoice in; and this will be most comfortable to you. O my brethren, let us not deprive God of this second right to all we have, or are, or can do, for this will not at all weaken our right, but strengthen, sweeten, and bless our possessions abundantly.

Obs. 4. Superstitious and idolatrous people are abundant in their services. "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds."

They are content to go with all their flocks and their herds to seek after God; thousands of rams and ten thousand rivers of oil, any thing to offer up unto God; but mark, it is in their own form, and on their own ordinances, men will expend in abundance; on God's, as little as possible, as might be again instanced in in regard of setting of days apart for God.

Natural conscience tells us, that when we have to do with God in our services, great things are suitable to a great God. Your papists, in times of straits, have a kind of praying which continues for forty hours together; but it is in their own way, they will be abundant enough in that. Many of you think much to spend a quarter of an hour in a morning or in an evening in seeking God in your families; when superstitious and idolatrous people are abundant in those services, in seeking God in their own way.

But observe, though superstitious and idolatrous people be abundant in their services to their idols, yet they are not infinite in them. But the saints of God, if their spirits be right, are enlarged to a kind of infiniteness in God's service. As thus, they would still know more of God's mind, do more, and are never satisfied with what they do. There is no idolatrous and superstitious person, but confines himself within some limits, and thinks that when that task is over, when the forty hours are elapsed, the work is done: but now here is the difference between a natural work and a spiritual; a natural work is always a limited work, but a spiritual work has always an infiniteness in it; thus, though I am not able to do what is actually infinite, yet my heart is infinite in this, that it is never satisfied, but it would fain have more, and if I were able to do ten thousand times more than I do, yet my heart would be as eager to do more as it was at first; I should not think I am any nearer to the end of my journey than I was at the first day; for I am to deal with an infinite God, therefore let my services be never so great and many, yet still my ardent desires are to rise higher and to do more. Here is the supernatural work of grace, which goes beyond all the idolatry in the world.

Obs. 5. Superstitious and idolatrous people will spare no cost in their worship.

They will go with their flocks and with their herds, bestow all their estates on the service of their idols. How shameful is it for us to be so niggardly in the true service of God! Never men had larger opportunities to honour God with their estates than at this present time. And certainly men should rather rejoice that they have an opportunity to serve God with their estates, than murmur that his service requires the sacrifice.

"They shall go with their flocks and with their herds, to seek the Lord."

Obs. 6. There is a time when vile and wicked men shall see a need of God. "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord."

Though wicked men, when they have all about them suitable to their carnal desires, slight and neglect God, yet there is a time when they shall be brought into such a condition that they shall see their need of him. O, let us remember this in the midst of our prosperity! We find by experience that God does bring men to times where-in they see need of him; oh, therefore, now the love and mercy of God, the pardon of our sins, and peace with God, how precious should they be in our eyes!

It is good to make God our friend, whom we are sure we shall one day have need of. We all conclude that it is a point of wisdom to make such a man our friend, of whom we can certainly say, we shall one day have need of him. O, let us be sure to make God our friend, for certainly one day we shall have need of him. Blessed are those souls who have an interest in that God whose friendship all the world shall one day require.

Obs. 7. All pretend to seek God. "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord."

Whatever they do, they do it for the honour of God, and for the service of God, and out of respect to him; and why should not we do this and this? we have good aims and good intentions, do we not seek to honour God in what we do? When those idolaters of Israel set up the calf, they proclaimed a day to Jehovah, a day for the honouring of God, and pretended that what they did was out of respect to God, and to honour him. The worst men and the most superstitious will yet profess to honour God. So it is again in regard of those days that men have set apart for God, and it is that which has settled men in the superstitious observation of them, that it is for the honour of Christ; What! (say they,) shall we not honour the birth of our blessed Saviour? what profaneness, what a disrespect is this to the Lord Christ! Well, let others do what they will, for our parts we will observe it, for hereby we shall do honour to our blessed Saviour. So the papists, for the adoration of images, say, What! not regard nor reverence the image, the picture of our blessed Saviour, and of the holy saints? And the truth is, if it be duly weighed, there is the same reason for images of Christ and his saints, as for days set apart to the honour of Christ by man's invention; and there is as fair a pretence for honouring Christ by setting up his image before me to remind me of him, as by keeping a day of mine own appointment for the same purpose. There is (I say) the same reason for both, and whatsoever argument any man shall bring me against the one, I dare undertake to prove it good against the other.

We are, my brethren, to take heed of men that pretend to honour God. These here will seek the Lord, though in a false and superstitious way. But those that pretend to honour God, prevail much with weak and scrupulous minds. As the greatest heretics that have ever been in the church have been great pretenders to godliness, many there are at this day that, out of pretence to honour Christ, have leavened the hearts of people with dangerous errors, and especially corrupted the young converts; for as soon as ever God is pleased to work upon any, to convert them unto himself, they love Christ, their hearts are taken with him, and they honour free grace that has pardoned the sins of their youth, of which they have such a fresh sense. Now, false teachers take advantage of this, and, therefore, if they bring any thing to them that hath the name of Christ, and the gospel, and free grace, they know they will greedily imbibe it; and many dangerous errors sweetened with such pretences are strongly maintained. By this means their leaders attain their own ends, and they see it not.

Obs. 8. Superstitious and idolatrous men are most abundant in their services in the time of affliction.

"They will go with their flocks and their herds:" when in extremity, then God shall have any thing from them. Self-love drives men far and enlarges them much. Men in a storm are content to cast out much of that which is precious to them; "They poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them," Isa. xxvi. 16. They are straitened in prayer, it comes out by drops, before, but when thy chastening is upon them, then they pour it out. And this is the baseness of our hearts, that we can find enlargement for God only when it is suitable to our own ends. Those whose hearts are more enlarged in adversity than in the enjoyment of mercies, had need of self-examination.

Obs. 9. Carnal professors think to make God amends for former and present evils of their hearts and lives by outward performances.

If they bring their flocks and their herds, much sacrifice, they think that will suffice. But let us learn to take heed of this vanity, of thinking to make God amends for former or present sins by any sacrifice we can perform to him thus. Some of you, perhaps, that are negligent in your relative duties; servants, children, stubborn and perverse against parents and governors; wives and husbands mutually neglecting their duties; and you think, though you indulge yourselves in those things, yet, if you pray much, and hear much, and speak of good things, and be forward in the profession of religion, that will make amends for the neglect of your duties. O take heed of this, you that are forward in your profession, and abundant in the performance of holy duties; take heed of this deceit of your hearts, to think to put off God with these things, and thereby to compensate for the neglect of your duties. Some are accused of injustice, uncleanness, and great wickedness, and yet they think to put off all this, by going with their flocks and their herds. Herein consists their sinfulness, they rest in the bare duties. But the saints have a further sacrifice to offer to God, to be a sweet savour before him. They have first the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, which these sacrifices typified; and then they have their souls and bodies, which they tender up to God as a reasonable sacrifice.

"But they shall not find him." From hence,

Obs. 10. If God be to be found any where, he is to be found in his ordinances. "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds, but they shall not find him."

These sacrifices were materially good, but yet they should not find God in them. When the Lord appointed the tabernacle to be erected, (a type of the ordinances we now enjoy,) he said, "Where I will meet you;" and again the second time, "There I will meet with thee," Exod. xxix. 42, 43. If God be to be found any where, it is in the performance of holy duties.

Obs. 11. To find God in them should be the end of all holy duties.

It should be so, and they pretended that end here. When either God is coming unto us in mercy, or when we are drawing near to God in duty, we must be restless till we find him, especially in the latter. Many, I beseech you observe this, many perform duties, but do not look at finding God in them. They do not examine after the duties are done, Have I met with God in this or that duty? Have I met with God this day in the word? I have been in my closet, and there I have prayed; have I found God in prayer? Found God! what is that? You should never be quiet in the performance of holy duties till you meet with God one of these two ways; 1. Either by finding God coming to you in the communication of himself, and the sweetness of his love and mercy; or, 2. Your own hearts drawing nearer unto him. And in either of these ways we find God.

Obs. 12. God will not be always found when sought. "They shall go with their flocks and with their herds, but shall not find me." Thus men are never like to meet with God:

1. When they seek him in any superstitious way. These kind of formal, superstitious worshippers of God, did much, spent much time in God's worship; I appeal to their own consciences, and to all that knew their lives, did any thing of God appear in them? It might be manifested from their frothy, vain, and carnal conversations, that they never met with God in those services. When God is sought, but not in his own way, he will not be found.

2. When we seek ourselves rather than God, then he will not be found.

3. When we do not seek God as a God; that is, when we tender him only external, and not soul services; when we seek him not with uprightness and in the integrity of our hearts; when we seek him not with those high and reverent apprehensions of him, with that fear of his name suitable to such an infinite God as the Lord is; then God will not be found.

4. When we seek him too late. There may be a seeking of God too late. Seek him while he may be found. Oh then, we had need lose no opportunity of seeking God, for he will not be always found. And this is just with God; for God often seeks us when we will not be found, and therefore it is just that he should not be found when we seek him.

"He hath withdrawn himself from them." When the saints of God seek him in a holy way, he is presently found. "Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am," Isa. lviii. 9. Perhaps they do not take notice of God; he is many times with us and stands by us, he is present, and we know not that he is there. But now, that we may know that he is there, he makes that promise, that when we seek him as we ought to seek him, he will say, "Here I am."

The word הִסְתִּיר here translated "withdrawn himself," may be as well rendered, divisit se, or eripuit se; he has divided, yea, snatched himself from them; that is his force: they go to seek him, and cry after him; God snatches himself from them, as one that refuses their friendship. Hence,

Obs. 13. God delights not in the services of superstitious and formal professors; but with the humble and contrite heart is his delight. The flocks and the herds of the wicked are rejected, and God withdraws himself from them, but small things from the saints are accepted. As in 1 Sam. vii. 9, when holy Samuel there offered but a sucking lamb for a burnt-offering to the Lord, presently "the Lord thundered with a great thunder on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them; and they were smitten before Israel." Here are herds and flocks, and yet God withdraws himself; but Samuel there offers but a poor sucking lamb, and presently the Lord thunders with a great thunder upon their adversaries. So in Rev. viii. 4, 5, after the incense, with the prayers of the saints, were offered up, there followed "voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." Great things are effected by small services of the saints when offered in uprightness, but the greatest services of hypocrites and formal professors God regards not, but withdraws himself from them.

Obs. 14. It is a sad thing when God withdraws from the creature, when he seeks him in distress. As in 1 Sam. xxviii. 15, when Saul was seeking God, and God was departed from him, mark what Saul saith, "I am sore distressed; for God is departed from me." And in chap. ix. 12, of this prophecy, "Yea, woe also to them when I depart from them!" saith God. Oh, that is a sad condition! It is a sign that, of the temple shall be howlings in that day, saith the Lord God." As if he should say, The songs of the temple were loud, but I will take more pleasure in their howlings than in their songs. And Isa. xxix. 1, "Woe to Ariel, to Ariel, the city where David dwelt!" &c.; and ver. 2, "Yet I will distress Ariel, and there shall be heaviness and sorrow: and it shall be unto me as Ariel." The text seems to be obscure at the first reading, but the meaning is this: By Ariel is meant Jerusalem, the city where David dwelt, the place where the sacrifices were offered unto God; Ariel signifying an altar of God, God's altar that did devour the sacrifices like a lion. Now, saith God, thou shalt be to me as Ariel; thou Jerusalem, where my famous altar was, where so many famous sacrifices were offered, thou shalt be to me as Ariel; that is, you, indeed offer many sacrifices unto me, but yet continue in your hypocrisy, and in your wickedness; know, saith God, I will make that city as an altar on which your blood shall be offered, and I will take as much pleasure in the sacrifice of your blood offered on this altar, as in all the sacrifices that were offered on the altar from whence the city had its name; your name shall be Ariel, that is, your city shall be stained with your blood as the altar was with the blood of the sacrifices. God rejects and casts out the services of such as are superstitious and ungodly.

1. God puts dishonour on a people, as I showed you more largely when I spake of the rejecting of their sacrifices. What greater dishonour can it be to a people, than for God to take more pleasure in their howlings under his wrath, than in their cryings to him for mercy? And yet to such a condition may a people, nay, your own soul, be brought. I say that God may take more pleasure in your howlings under his wrath, than in your cryings to him for mercy, and that in your temples, if you do not reform as well as cry to him; and this is confirmed by Amos viii. 3, "And the songs

2. No creature can help us; they will say, How can we help when God will not? he has withdrawn himself.

3. Some great judgment must then be expected; as when a poor petitioner goes to the prince with a petition, and the prince turns his back upon him; Surely, thinks he, now some evil is nigh me.

4. No protection from any evil can then be expected; God has withdrawn himself.

5. Then conscience flies in one's face: Oh, the blessed God is gone, and mercy is gone, and Christ is gone, and that for those sins of mine, those lusts of mine, that lay so near my heart. Oh how terrible will it be to conscience, when God shall appear to withdraw himself!

6. It is a forerunner of God's eternal withdrawing himself from the soul, and from the body too.

The saints had rather have God's presence, though angry, than God withdrawing himself from them. When God withdraws himself but a little, they can never rest till he has returned again: "O cast me not from thy presence," saith David.

My brethren, when we perceive God withdrawing himself in any degree from us, let us stir up ourselves, and cry mightily, as the church, when apprehensive that God was leaving her, Jer. xiv. 9, "Leave us not." God goes by degrees from a people; first, it may be, to the threshold; and Jeremiah, a holy prophet, saw him withdrawing from them. Carnal hearts do not perceive how God withdraws himself from a people by degrees, but those that are acquainted with the mind of God, and search into the word, are able to discern this, and they cry, Lord, leave us not, if thou be gone, all is gone.

Yea, but does not God withdraw himself from his saints? how then is this a judgment peculiar to idolaters, and wicked, superstitious persons?

The answer is this, God indeed withdraws himself sometimes from his saints, but not in the same manner as from the wicked. For in his withdrawals from the saints,

1. They yet retain good thoughts of him in his absence, whereas the wicked pine, and vex, and fret against him. As, in the absence of her husband, a faithful wife still retains good thoughts of him as of her husband, and continues to love him, whereas with the adulteress it is far otherwise: so wicked men do, upon God's withdrawing of himself in judgments and afflictions, begin to have hard thoughts of God, and to say, If this is to serve God and to walk in his ways, what good have we got by all that we have done? But now you shall observe in the Canticles, when Christ had withdrawn himself from the church, she still calls him her King, and her Beloved, still gives him honourable titles.

2. He draws their hearts to cry more earnestly after him. As a mother will playfully withdraw and hide herself from her child, loving to hear its cries after her, and to witness its anxiety to come into her arms; so the Lord loves to hear his children cry after him, to come to him. The Lord shall hear none of our cries in heaven, for there we shall always be with him; but here he sometimes withdraws from us, that he may hear us cry after him.

3. He leaves some light behind him, that they may see which way he is gone. As when a torch or candle is taken out of a room, yet you may see some glimmering light which way they went; so when God withdraws himself he is wont to leave some glimmering light, that his people may see which way to follow him.

4. His bowels yearn toward them. Jer. xxxi. 20. "Is Ephraim my dear son?" &c. I thought of him and my bowels yearned, saith God, or "my bowels were troubled." He has an eye towards them for much good in all his withdrawals.

5. Nothing then will satisfy them till God return. When God withdraws himself from others, they will seek after vanities to make up the want of his presence, as an adulteress in her husband's absence will seek other lovers. But the language of the saints is, If God be gone, I will enjoy nothing else, at least I will be satisfied in nothing else, till I have his presence again.

6. He yet does not utterly forsake them; as David prays, Psal. cxix. 8, "I will keep thy statutes: O forsake me not utterly." It seems that then God had somewhat withdrawn himself from David, yet mark, his heart was toward God, "I will keep thy statutes;" thou hast forsaken me in some degree, yet I will keep thy statutes still, "O forsake me not utterly." If thou canst say thus, Indeed God has withdrawn himself from my soul, yet, though I have not that comfort in him that my soul desires, I will keep his precepts as long as I live, I will do what I can to honour him; thou mayst pray with comfort, Lord, "O forsake me not utterly."

As those that are godly may depart from God, but yet, as in Psal. xviii. 21, "I have not wickedly departed from my God," they do not depart from God as other men do; so God may depart from the godly, but yet not so as he departs from the wicked.

Let us take heed of withdrawing from God, of withdrawing our souls from any way of truth. If in prosperity we withdraw from God, and think we can live without him, he will make us know in adversity that he too can be blessed without us. It is usual for men in prosperity to get on without God well enough; but when thou comest into adversity, the Lord will make thee know, though thou perishest as dross and dung from the earth, yet he will remain a blessed God without thee to all eternity. God has no need of us. If thou dost think thou canst do well enough without him, he will show that he can do well enough without thee.

Ver. 7. They have dealt treacherously against the Lord: for they have begotten strange children: now shall a month devour them with their portions.

In the words before, the Lord threatened to withdraw himself from Israel. When they shall seek him with their flocks and herds, they shall not find him. A dreadful sentence! but what is the cause? Why will God in a time of mercy withdraw himself from his creatures, though they seek him with their flocks and with their herds?

There is reason enough for it, and it is given here, "They have dealt treacherously against the Lord."

The word כזרי here translated, dealing treacherously, signifies perfidere agere, to deal perfidiously, they have been perfidious; and likewise decipere, to deceive, they deal deceitfully; but it especially means that fraudulent dealing that takes place in breaking of covenants, and is often applied to men violating the marriage bond, as in Mal. ii. 14, 15.

I find Luther translates it, they have contemned the Lord; and so, according to some, it is often rendered; and thence takes occasion to ask, What! do they seek the Lord with their flocks and herds, and yet despise God? how can these consist? They seem as if they would greatly honour God, yet here they are charged with contemning and despising him. To this he answers, Whatsoever pretences men make of honouring God, yet, if they do not obey and keep to his word, and that especially with respect to his worship, they are guilty of contemning and despising God. We may abound in outward services, and yet, in the mean time, our hearts despise God, contemn his authority and majesty.

But the word ordinarily is used according to our translation of it here, "They have dealt treacherously," they have been false with me.

And mark the connexion; they come to seek me with their flocks and their herds, but I have withdrawn myself from them, for "they have dealt treacherously." Hence we would briefly

Obs. 1. When the ungodly come to seek God, God looks on the wickedness of their hearts.

"They have dealt treacherously." As if God should say, Here comes a company of base, false-hearted hypocrites, ungodly wretches, to seek me, with their flocks and herds. Are they like to be heard? are they like to be regarded in all their services? no, they are base and perfidious, they have vile, wicked, and cursed hearts.

O consider this, you that have not yet washed away your sins in the blood of Christ, and made your peace with God: the guilt of your sin is yet upon you, and its filthiness yet adheres to you: you come to God in prayer, and seek him, and cry unto him for mercy: know, that all the wickedness that ever you committed in the whole course of your lives, is fresh in the presence of God; God looks upon all as if it were now present. O, learn therefore to cleanse thy heart in the blood of Christ, by faith in him, and by repentance; and then, though thou hast been vile heretofore, when thou comest to seek the face of God, thy sins shall not be remembered before him. So much for the connexion.

But for the words themselves, and first, in their proper signification, "They have dealt treacherously;" the meaning is, they make a great show of religion, but it is only for their own ends, and under that show they do that which dishonoureth me, they betray my glory. Here is treacherous dealing indeed, treachery against the God of heaven; these are treacherous spirits, to make professions and protestations of religion, to make any use they can of religion, so far as it will suit their own turns, but when it proves unprofitable, to cast it off; yea, if it prove contrary to them, to persecute it. This is treachery against God in a high degree.

Again, "treacherously," in that they break their covenant with God; that is the special treachery here intended, they have broken that covenant in which they were engaged. They gave up themselves to be the Lord's, but they have basely forsaken and dealt treacherously with him. So that this treachery relates either to the oath of allegiance to God as our King, or to the covenant that we make with him as our Husband. And thence,

Obs. 2. The sins of such as are in covenant with God are sins of treachery. They are sins of a deeper dye than other men's sins. Other men's sins are transgressions against, and disobedience to, the will of God; but they are not so properly treachery; but the sins of those that are engaged to God in covenant have another impress upon them than the sins of other men, their sins are treachery against God. And we know there is nothing accounted more vile amongst men than treachery; it is the highest possible expression of our indignation against a man to say, Such a man take heed of, he is a treacherous man. Certainly the sins of those that have engaged themselves unto God, go nearer to the heart of God than other men's sins do; they are more dishonourable to him, they provoke the eyes of his glory more.

O let us then look back to what we have done ever since we first entered into covenant with God, ever since we first gave up our names to him; and let us charge our souls with this aggravation of our sins: O my soul, what hast thou done? Thou hast not only trespassed and disobeyed as others, but thou hast been treacherous against the Lord. Let us keep ourselves from sin, and awe our hearts and strike fear into our spirits with this meditation, What! shall I, that have so deeply engaged myself to God, now forsake and deal treacherously with him?

Let us take heed of this evil of dealing treacherously with God, not only in regard of the particular covenants between God and our own souls; but, in a more special manner, let us take heed of breaking our public covenants. England has been guilty of great sins against God, but England never entered into such solemn covenants with God as of late; therefore, if we keep not our covenants with God now, England's sins will prove to be greater than they were before, they will prove to be treacherous sins. Do not account your entering into covenant with God at any time to be a slight matter; do not trifle with him: when you come to the sacrament, there you renew your covenants; perhaps in your closets in the day of your affliction you renew your covenants; but especially when you come in a solemn way to join with the people of God, to bind yourselves in a covenant with God to amend your lives, and inquire after the true worship of God, and to conform yourselves according to his word; O now take heed what you do; to walk now as you formerly have done, this is a treachery against the God of heaven. Certainly God expects much from us after such a covenant as we have lately entered into, one of the most solemn covenants that ever was made; and a national covenant too, and therefore more to be regarded than a private; yea, a uniting covenant, that unites two nations, if not three, together; and a covenant that is more for the kingdom of Christ, and more directly against the kingdom of antichrist, and the antichristian party, than ever yet was made since the world began. Antichrist quickly arose, and made much opposition; but for two nations so solemnly to lift up their hands to the most high God to oppose all antichristian government, is that which, if it be kept as carefully as it is made solemnly, is the greatest honour that Christ ever yet had in regard of his government here upon earth. And we had need look to it, because it is such a mighty work that it should engage our hearts, and make us thankful that we ever lived to see God bring about such a strange thing in our generation. I appeal to you, was it possible four years ago for any man in the world, yea, for an angel, to conjecture such a thing as this, that two nations should join together, that the representative body of the kingdom, and the assembly of divines, in one day should be lifting up their hands to the most high God, to do their utmost to extirpate prelacy, that is, government by archbishops, bishops, archdeacons, deans, &c. Now the more miraculous the work of God is in bringing this strange thing about, the more bonds lie upon us to keep that covenant with God. O, therefore, let us not now add treachery to all our former apostacy, for our sins now will prove sins of treachery.

But if it be such an aggravation of our sins, to be covenanters with God, if we neglect our engagement, then it were better (perhaps some will say) never to enter into covenant; for it seems, if we had not taken the covenant there, our guilt would not have been so aggravated.

The answer to that is this, A carnal heart alone is sorry for its engagement to God, either because of afflictions that are in the ways of God, or because the obligations of obedience to God are stronger, or because the danger of breaking them is greater. Perhaps, when thou art engaged to God and his ways, thou meetest with many afflictions in those ways; take heed of repenting of thy engagement because of them. Perhaps thou seest thyself so strongly bound that thy conscience will now fly in thy face on the slightest transgression; O, take heed of receding from thy engagement notwithstanding. For one whose heart is gracious, certainly will never repent of his engagement, though there be more danger attendant on his sin now than before; why? because he hates his sin. Now let there be never so much danger to keep me from that which I hate, I will never be sorry for that: as for instance, suppose there be a deep gulf, that if I fall into will destroy me, I tremble to come near it; but there is a fence to keep me off full of sharp iron spikes, which, if I should but try to get over it, will gore and prick me; shall I be sorry that such a fence exists, when it is but set there to keep me from destroying myself? So a gracious heart will never be sorry that it is engaged in the ways of God, and that if it should break the engagement there would be an aggravation of its sin; for why? the very engagement is but as a strong fence to keep me from that which I would be loth to come to, which would destroy me. And those that begin to think their engagement to God and his ways to be a hard thing, and could wish for more liberty, will certainly deal treacherously with God, yea, their hearts are even already departing from God. Take heed of this, it is a step to apostacy, (remember it, my brethren, it is an important caution.) it is, I say, the first degree of apostacy, for any man to begin to be sorry that he is so deeply engaged to God and his ways. All the true saints of God, when they are engaged, bless God that ever they were engaged.

"Against the Lord." Against Jehovah. This is the vileness of man's heart. Though God be never so gracious, so merciful, so faithful; though he be never so blessed, so glorious in himself and worthy of all honour; yet so vile is man's heart that it will deal treacherously with even God himself. To deal treacherously with a friend, with a fellow creature, is an evil; but to deal treacherously with the infinite and blessed God is a far greater evil. When vexed yourselves with the treachery of others, O, consider how treacherously God is dealt with in the world. Thou dost think none was ever so dealt with, ever so wronged, as thou art; God is more wronged, more contradicted, more treacherously dealt withal, than any ever were. And how many are there that think it a dishonour to them even to be suspected of treacherous dealing, and will often say, What! deal treacherously with my friend? I were not worthy to live if I should! yet these men deal treacherously with God every day.

Thus much for this charge, For "they have dealt treacherously against the Lord." Next he shows wherein.

"For they have begotten strange children." That is a further aggravation, that they have not only sinned themselves, but have sought to propagate their sin and their wickedness: for it might otherwise be said, True, Israel has sinned very grievously against the Lord, but may there not be hope of the generation succeeding? No, for they bring up their children in the same superstition, idolatry, and wickedness, that they themselves walk in. That is the meaning, "They have begotten strange children;" they should beget children to God, but they beget them to idols, and so this wickedness, this treachery against God, is propagated from one generation to another, there is a succession of it; as are the old, so are the young.

When any draw others to evil ways, they are said in Scripture to make them children of the devil, to beget them as children of the devil. Matt. xxiii. 15. "Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte; and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves;" you beget him to the devil. So parents, first, by way of natural generation, beget children to themselves, and then, by educating their children in ways of wickedness, beget them the second time to the devil. And they are called "strange children," because God will not own them: They are none of mine, saith God, they are strangers from me, I will have nothing to do with them. The words being thus opened, the observations are these:

Obs. 3. Parents have the charge of their children committed to them by God.

It is implied here, that it is their duty to look to beget their children to God, and to take heed that they be not begotten to the devil. For Ephraim, the ten tribes, are here charged, that whereas they should have brought forth their children for God, and so they should belong to God's inheritance, and God should have owned them; now they beget them to their idols, and they are strange children. God certainly does not give you children to beget them for the devil and for hell. It should be a sad thing to parents to think. Here is a child coming from my loins, conceived in my womb, an enemy unto God; what! shall such come forth out of my loins? shall a firebrand of hell be conceived in my womb? Certainly it should go to the heart of a parent to see his child estranged from God, though he were not the cause of it; but much more when a parent shall come to be convinced, this child is thus wicked and ungodly, and as he has received the seeds of his corruption from me at the first, so those seeds were nourished up by my example and encouragement, I have led him to such wickedness. Woe to such parents! and such children may even curse the time that they were born of such parents, and rather wish they had been of the generation of dragons and offspring of vipers. When God gives you children, he expects that you should labour that there may be a succession of godliness in the world, that not only you should be godly, but that you should bring up your children to be so too. "He established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers, that they should make them known to their children: that the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born; who should arise and declare them to their children," Psal. lxxviii. 5, 6. This is the way of God, he commands you to make known his statutes and laws to your children, that the generation to come might know them, and not that you should bring them up in wickedness and superstition. I have read that the Romans were wont to sue such parents as were not careful of the education of their children. Therefore Cicero, inveighing against Verres, saith, Quod filium tuum, &c., "You have not only done thus and thus yourself, but you have educated your son among the intemperate, in riotousness, in feasting, in drinking, amongst wantons and unclean persons, and by this means you have not only wronged your child, but the commonwealth. Thus he laid his action against him. Now how might heathens shame us in this, who account those to deserve punishment not only from God, but from men, that are not careful of the education of their children! There is a great deal of reason for it, and it were very good now that there were a law of a similar nature enacted on this ground, because the commonwealth has a part in the children as well as the parent; and the parent not being careful to bring up the child in the fear of God, wrongs the commonwealth as well as the child, and therefore ought to be punished by the commonwealth.

Obs. 4. Children are usually as their parents and education are. The parents were idolaters, they were ungodly and strangers from God; their children are so too. In many families we see that the father is an enemy to God, and the son an enemy to God, and the grandson the same, and so there goes on a line and a succession of wickedness, profanity, and enmity against God. It is usually so.

Therefore let those children that are born of and brought up under godly parents, bless God for such a mercy. It may be, if thou hadst been born and brought up of papists, thou wouldst have been a papist thyself. If thou hadst been born of a malignant, of one that is a stranger to and a contemner of God, thou wouldst have been so too.

And seeing it is thus usual for children to be as their parents, oh, then, what a mercy is it for God to work by his grace in any child born of wicked parents! This is not an ordinary mercy. Some born of godly parents bless God that by that means they are kept from wickedness; but there are some born of and brought up by wicked parents, to whom God is so gracious, that, in a more than ordinary way, he goes further in mercy to them, and works grace in their hearts notwithstanding. This is his extraordinary mercy, a mercy that thou art to admire at throughout all eternity, that notwithstanding thy birth and education, yet God should reveal himself unto thee.

But how vile are they that, being born of good parents, are yet wicked! It is customary for such as are born of wicked parents and have wicked education, to be wicked, to be strange children; but for those that have godly parents and godly education, for them to be wicked and strange children, this denotes wickedness in the extreme.

Obs. 5. It is a dangerous thing for children to follow the example of their parents in wickedness. It is from hence that they are called "strange children," they are strangers to God. It is not enough for them to plead, I did as my father or as my mother taught me. No, if thy parents be wicked and superstitious, and they bring thee up accordingly, and so thou art wicked and superstitious thyself, know that, notwithstanding this excuse, God looks upon thee as a strange child, thou hast no part nor portion in him, thou art an alien, thou art estranged from God.

Children therefore had need to examine their parents' ways and actions; and above all, the children of superstitious people, for nothing is more naturally handed down in succession, than idolatry and superstition. Never plead then, We do but as our forefathers have done. That place in Peter one would think should for ever stop the mouth of that plea, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19, "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." Mark the text, that the being redeemed from our vain conversation, received by tradition from our fathers, is so great a mercy that it cost the blood of Jesus Christ. If God accounts it such a mercy, that he is willing to lay down the blood of his Son to purchase it for a poor creature, shall not this creature prize this mercy? And yet you think it rather to be a mercy to go on in the ways that you have received by tradition from your fathers, and you conceive their example a strong plea. Mark what you do; you do in effect say, We look on the blood of Jesus Christ as a common, as a worthless thing. He shed his blood to redeem thee from that which thou thinkest is worth nothing to be redeemed from. Thou thinkest it a good thing to go the way of the traditions of thy fathers; and Christ saith, I account it so great an evil, that rather than any that belong to me shall go on in that way, I will lay down my blood, my life, to deliver him from it.

Obs. 6. When succeeding generations are wicked, there is little hope of a people. I have withdrawn myself, saith God, I have done with them; and afterward he tells us, that they shall be desolate, "for they have begotten strange children;" the children, the generation that is rising up, are idolaters too, they go as their fathers did; and what hope is there of them? When in a vineyard, or orchard, not only the old trees are rotten, but the young are likewise corrupted and blasted, then there is little to justify the bestowing of any great cost on it.

Much care is to be had therefore of the succeeding generation. And there is no better criterion, whereby we may divine (as they say) what God intends to do with a nation, than this, the state of the children: look at the young that are rising up in that nation, and by that you may come to divine what God intends to do with the next generation. Here we have much cause to bless God for his mercy toward us, in that with regard to this particular, he has in a great measure (we hope) taken away the sign of his dreadful wrath. I say, in a great measure; for we still have a great many of the young generation prepared and ready to make riots and tumults to maintain their fathers' or their masters' old superstitions; and if ever there be any stir in a kingdom about such things, (as superstition and idolatry can seldom be banished from a kingdom without them,) they are usually begun by the young; what, if you take away their holidays from them, you take away their lives. I make no question, but, so far as is fit, times of recreation will be allowed them; and there is good reason for it, though such superstitious days be taken from them. But because many of their masters and parents who adhere to the old superstition, still countenance their observance, and they obtain consequent liberty in them, therefore they had almost rather lose their lives than lose them, and being heady and naught, are easily induced to raise tumults and make seditions for them. But though there are many that are very vile in this respect, and, such as they are, are the saddest omen of God's displeasure against a nation; yet, on the contrary, we should wrong the grace of God, if we should not observe his goodness towards us in the workings of his Spirit on the young amongst us. Yea, many whose parents and masters have been superstitious, wicked, and ungodly, have, we find, been delivered by the Lord, and are now not willing to sully themselves with the "vain conversation received by tradition;" they begin to know the Lord, and to inquire after God. And blessed are you of the Lord; you are our hope, that God intends us good, and that he will not let out the wild beasts to devour us, but will rebuke them for your sakes. And although, perhaps, many of these gracious young ones may perish, yea, many have been slain already in this cause, yet let not others that remain behind be discouraged; for it is not an argument that God intends for us some great and special mercy, in that he is willing to venture such precious ones for the procuring of t. We may well reason thus, that if so much precious young blood, that might have lived to serve God, be shed in this cause, when God comes to grant to England mercy, he will grant such mercy as will be worth all their blood; and that mercy must needs be great, that shall be worth all the blood of those that are so precious, who might have lived so many years to serve God in this world.

They who have defiled themselves with superstitious vanities, are not likely to share in this mercy, nor to be employed by God to prepare it for the succeeding generation. But because God has a love to the young generation that are godly, therefore he has reserved much mercy for many of them to see and enjoy; and others of them that are not likely to see it, yet he will be so gracious to them, that he will employ them in ushering in that mercy; and whether it is better to be made instrumental for the glory of God and the good of another generation, or to live to see the fruit of this, is hard to determine. Certainly, those that in one generation are made so instrumental, as to lay the groundwork of mercy for another generation, are as happy as that other generation that comes to reap the fruit of their labours and sufferings; and those that do come to reap the fruit of their labours shall bless God for them, and when they enjoy the good and liberty of the gospel, they will bless you to all generations. Therefore, let there be no discouragement to godly young ones, though it pleaseth God to cut off many by death in this cause, for God hath some excellent end in it beyond all our reaches.

Obs. 7. God takes it exceeding ill at men's hands, that they should corrupt the young. This note is as full in the words as any other. God takes it exceeding ill, it is a part of treachery against God, for any to be a means to corrupt the young. Take heed what you do in this matter; those young people that are rising up, and beginning to inquire after godliness, take heed that you hinder them not, especially parents and governors; O let your consciences fly in your faces, when you begin to curb them for their forwardness. Many times your minds cannot but misgive you, when you think, I have been wicked and evil most part of my days, I spent, God knows, many of my years in vanity and profaneness; here are young ones that begin betimes to inquire after God, and yet, wretch that I am, my heart rises against them.

And as those that hinder the young are to be rebuked, so such as seek to corrupt them by false opinions. Certainly it is that by which God is much provoked at this day; and as, on the one side, there is hope of mercy because so many of the young begin to inquire after God, so I know no such dreadful proof of God's displeasure against this nation as this, that as soon as the young begin to know Jesus Christ, there are presently corrupt errors infused into them, and that under the notion of honouring Christ, and free grace, and the gospel, so much the more; whereas indeed they are none other than principles of libertinism and looseness, and such as will even eat out the heart of godliness. Certainly, the Lord has a quarrel against such as corrupt the young by their false principles: for there are none so ready to imbibe errors as they, especially young converts, who begin to inquire after the ways of God: and these their corrupters have this advantage, they come not to them to persuade them to profaneness, but they come with seeming pretences of giving honour to Christ, and of magnifying free grace, and in the mean time sow amongst them seeds destructive of the power of godliness. To corrupt the young, and, when they begin to inquire after and to know God, to do that which may estrange them from him, excites the wrath of God; and it is a greater proof than any other of God's displeasure against us, that it is so common and frequent at this day.

"Now shall a month devour them with their portions."

"A month." I find interpreters much perplexed about this expression. Many think that God aims at one special month, and they tell us, that in one month in the year, which answers to our July, there were many grievous things to befall the Jews, both in former and in latter times, as if that were a more ominous month than any other. I will not spend time to speak further of that.

But there is certainly somewhat else in this expression. I find a parallel passage to this in Zech. xi. 8, where the Holy Ghost speaks of three shepherds that God will cut off in one month; "Three shepherds also I cut off in one month; and my soul lothed them, and their soul also abhorred me." This is the most exact description of your superstitious idol shepherds, even such as we have at this day amongst us in many places. "My soul lothed them," saith God, "and their soul also abhorred me." Who more hate the power of godliness than such men? and whom does the soul of God more abhor? "I cut them off in one month," saith God. By "month" I conceive two things meant.

1. The Jews in those times were wont to have their days of reckoning with their workmen and with their debtors usually at the beginning or ending of every month, and this expression seems to allude to that custom of theirs; "now shall a month devour them," that is, the time of their month shall come when I will reckon with them, and when that fixed time shall come of my reckoning, they shall be undone, they shall be devoured and destroyed. Hence,

Obs. 8. God has set a time to reckon with sinners. Though he be patient for a long time, yet he has a month, a set time appointed, and he will not go beyond that time.

Obs. 9. The time of reckoning with sinners, is the time of their destruction. The time of their reckoning will be the time of their destruction.

2. Many interpret it thus, a little short time shall devour them; it shall not be long, it shall not be a hundred and twenty years, as it was when he threatened the old world, but it shall be very speedy; as if God should say, When once I begin with them, a month shall make an end of the work. And indeed what will a month do when God lets the sword (for that was the judgment here threatened) come upon a nation! What a great deal of havoc have the enemy made in a month, in many parts of England! Into what a miserable condition have many that were rich, and had great estates, been brought within that time! so that God seems to refer to the Assyrians that were let out upon them; Let them but once come, saith he, and they will not be long about the work, a month's time shall devour them.

Luther, and some agree with him, thinks that by the "month" is here meant their solemnities and new moons, and that so it has reference to their superstition and idolatry. But that I think to be too far from the meaning; I rather conceive that by "a month" is meant the short time of their destruction, when once the adversary comes in upon them.

"With their portions." I find the Seventy translate הַלֹּקְתָּ אֶת הַחֵלְקִים אֲשֶׁר אָמַרְתָּ, their lots. And it may be so rendered, because in the division of the land of Canaan, that which they had for their estates was given to the ten tribes at first by lot. Well, saith God, I gave you your estates by such a special providence of mine, by lot; but though I did thus measure them out, otherwise than the estates of any men on the earth, yet a month shall devour your lot, all that you had in that appointment of my special providence shall now be devoured. From thence an observation arises of exceeding use to us:

Obs. 10. The more special the providence of God is toward us in mercy, the more grievous are his judgments if subsequently provoked.

That mercy I had by such a special hand of God's providence, that I can relate from point to point, how strangely the Lord wrought to bestow it upon me. Well, thou canst speak of God's providence and bless his name, and thou dost well in so doing; but then, take heed thou dost not abuse that mercy that thou enjoyest by the special hand of God's providence; take heed of provoking God to come and devour that mercy. So it is threatened here, "a month shall devour their portion," their estates that they had by special lot shall now be destroyed because of their sins.

But further, if we take it according to the translation in your books, which is likewise suitable to the original, "a month shall devour their portion," that is, all their outward estates, all their riches, all their outward comforts, all that they have, and account as their portion, a month, a little time, shall destroy. And from thence there are these two observations:

Obs. 11. A carnal heart has his portion in this world only. Here is his portion, he has his portion in this world.

Obs. 12. The poor condition of the greatest in the world; his portion is no other, but a month may devour it. If thou hadst the whole kingdom, and many kingdoms, for thy portion, and this were all, thou hadst a poor pittance for one who has an immortal soul, for one made for eternity, a month may devour it. That man is but a poor man who has no other portion but that which a month may devour. But now, the saints have God himself for their portion, a portion which neither month can devour nor time destroy, but which they shall enjoy fresh and green, lively and full, and that to all eternity; a portion which lives for ever, and secures their everlasting life too.

Ver. 8. Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah: cry aloud at Beth-aven, after thee, O Benjamin.

The prophet, seeing how little impression his denunciations made on the hearts of this people, therefore, in the name of the Lord, assumes another character, and speaks in this verse as a general commanding an immediate alarm, as if the enemy were already at the gates; "Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah." As if he should say, You have often heard that the Lord would bring the sword upon you, now it is come, it is come; the enemy is even ready to break into your cities, to rifle your houses, to ravish your wives, to murder your children: "Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah: cry aloud at Beth-aven, after thee, O Benjamin." It is a summoning of them, as if one should come to the city and cry, The enemy, the enemy is at the gates, arm, arm! so the prophet here, that he might rouse the hearts of those that are stupid and senseless, saith, I have often in the name of God threatened that he would bring the sword upon you, but you continued insensible; know, that the Lord is now upon you in wrath, the enemy is come, now is the time for your destruction; blow ye the trumpet, set yourselves in battle-array, make what resistance you can, for now wrath and misery are upon you. That generally is the scope of the words, but there are yet three things to be considered for their further explication.

I. Why Ramah and Gibeah are particularized.

II. Why "cry aloud at Beth-aven."

III. The meaning of the words, "after thee, O Benjamin."

I. Ramah and Gibeah. I find many take these words not as proper names for cities, but to signify the hills and high places of the country. And the Seventy indeed translate them, ἐπὶ τοῖς βουνοῖς, ἐπὶ τῶν ὄρηδων, upon the hills, and upon the high places; for Ramah signifies a high place, and Gibeah, by way of excellency, a hill. And they would interpret it as if the Lord should say to the prophet, Go to the highest places in the country, the highest hills, and there let the cornet and the trumpet be blown, as an alarm to awaken the whole land. And then the observation would be,

Obs. 1. When a people is in danger of God's wrath, it is high time for them to be awakened.

It is then fit that it should be made known to them. Not only that they should go to the governors, and those that are in high places of authority, but go where they may make known the danger to all the people of the land. It is true, it is fit the governors should be awakened in the first place, but if they be awakened and not the people, it will prove to little purpose. Many men of late of vile spirits could not endure that ministers should warn people of dangers, or tell them of the forerunners of God's displeasure against a nation; at such things being preached in public auditories, their spirits were mightily incensed: but it is the way of God, in times of public dangers, to have the people made acquainted.

But further, Ramah and Gibeah were two eminent cities, and belonged both to the kingdom of Judah. They were indeed in the tribe of Benjamin, but Benjamin and Judah were joined in one kingdom under the house of David, and the other ten tribes separated under Jeroboam. Now these two cities were of some eminence in the kingdom of Judah, and it is likely were strongly fortified. Now God is here threatening judgment against Judah, as he did before, when he said, "Judah also shall fall with them;" therefore saith he, "Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah," in the most eminent places of Judah, in the most fortified, and let us see how they are able to resist the misery that is coming upon them.

But further, I find the Chaldee paraphrast explains it as if the meaning were, because that Gibeah was the city of Saul, and Ramah the city of Samuel, therefore God threatened judgment for their making of a king against his will, and for their disobedience to the words of Samuel. But I think this is somewhat too far-fetched.

II. "Cry aloud at Beth-aven." Beth-aven I believe to be the same city as that Beth-el where was one of the calves, and which belonged to the ten tribes; and the majority of interpreters confirm this opinion.

Now this Beth-el, which signifies the house of God, is called here Beth-aven, the house of vanity, because of the idol that was set up there. Therefore mark the emphasis, when he speaks of Ramah and Gibeah, he saith, Blow the cornet and the trumpet: but when of Beth-aven, הריני "Cry aloud," howl out, O Beth-aven, for that was the great place of superstition. He nameth this city rather than Dan, (where the other of the two calves was placed,) because it was so near to the kingdom of Judah.

III. "After thee, O Benjamin." That is, Benjamin was close to this Beth-aven, and adjoining the kingdom of Israel. Now, saith God by the prophet, the wrath of God shall come out against Israel, Ephraim shall be left desolate, and Beth-aven shall howl and cry out, and you, Benjamin, that are so near them, take you heed to yourselves, "after thee, O Benjamin," thy turn will be next. You have reason to look to yourselves when your neighbour's house is on fire; so saith God here, Howl, Beth-aven, "after thee, O Benjamin:" Benjamin lay near Beth-aven, and when Benjamin saw the wrath of God against the ten tribes, and in that city of Beth-aven, Benjamin should look to itself. That is the meaning of the Holy Ghost in these words. Now for the notes of observation.

Obs. 2. When danger is apprehended as present and real it affects the heart most.

The Lord had threatened the sword many times by the prophet, and their hearts were secure and insensible; but now he comes and presents it as present and real to them, "Blow ye the trumpet," the danger is now at hand, it is here, saith the prophet. There is a great deal of difference between men's hearing of wars and rumours of wars, and the very reality of the evil itself when it comes before their eyes. This judgment of war, of the sword, has been threatened against this nation long ago. I dare appeal to you, who for twenty years remember the common strain of almost all the godly ministers in the kingdom, was not their usual theme this, to show what were the forerunners of God's judgments against a nation? Ever since I was a youth, and took any notice of sermons, I know nothing that sounded in mine ears more frequently than that. In almost all places in the kingdom, it was the usual custom of all your eminent ministers to search into God's word to see what were the sins that brought public judgments upon a nation, and to apply them to England. But this was ordinarily slighted. Some indeed of our brethren that feared the Lord and his judgments, and thought that they foresaw a storm, withdrew themselves, and were scorned and contemned for their labours. But now we see the thing that was feared and threatened is come, it is upon many countries, and do we not now form far different conceptions of it than when we only heard of it? In those countries where the sword has been raging, do not they apprehend the evil of war in another manner than they ever did when they heard it merely threatened in sermons? Oh when it indeed comes in its real form, it affects men far otherwise than the rumour of it. Those men that continually have their ears filled with the noise of the drum and trumpet, with the neighing of horses, and roaring of the cannon, will tell you that war is a dreadful thing indeed. So it is in all other afflictions that are threatened; how little is the threat regarded! but when they come indeed, oh then how do the hearts of men sink within them! Now God is coming against me, now wrath is upon me, saith the guilty soul, how far it may go I know not; I heard often of such things, now it is come, it is come! Oh the dreadful apprehensions that are in men's hearts of the wrath of God when it is come! whereas before, when threatened, it is never feared.

And this is a rule, an everlasting rule, That the less a judgment is feared when threatened, the more dreadful apprehensions there are of it in the heart when once it cometh to be executed.

Obs. 3. Ministers of God must realize the things they preach to the people.

They should study all ways and means they can to make what they preach to the people appear real to them, and not mere notions. So the prophet here, he had preached often of the judgments of God, of the sword, but this would not do, therefore now he strives to make what he had delivered appear in the most vivid manner possible to the eyes and hearts of the people, as the only way to benefit them. It is not therefore enough for a minister barely to tell the people truths, to state to them what danger they are in, but by all conceivable means to make this stand out in bold relief before them. We know how Ezekiel acted when he threatened the captivity, he went and made before them a kind of siege to render it real to them. So Jeremiah and other prophets. Now though ministers cannot do as they did, yet they are to study all manner of expressions in their power to invest things with the greatest possible reality. And indeed this is a great part of the skill of a good minister. The art of preaching, I say, lies especially in this, to make things appear real to the souls of the hearers. As, when we come to tell you of the danger of sin and of the wrath of God due to it, we tell you this, and we quote Scripture for it, perhaps it stirs not the heart; but if we can so present God's wrath to you, hold it up so vivid and real before your eyes as to induce you to bethink yourselves in what a situation you would be if now all creatures were taking their leaves of you, if now you were standing before the great God to receive the sentence of condemnation, if God were now at this instant coming upon you; if, I say, we could so preach as that you should apprehend these things as real, more good might be so done in one quarter of an hour than perhaps in divers years before. The power of a ministry consists much in this. And I suppose some of you know by experience what it is that I mean by the ministers making things real to your hearts. Have not you sometimes found some truths made so real out of the word, brought so home to your consciences, that you have thought that you have even stood before the throne of God, and that God was even then pronouncing sentence against you? Some have expressed it thus, Such a time I went to hear the word, and methought that I were summoned before the great God to judgment, I saw the Lord God himself speaking to me, I had represented before mine eyes the wickedness of my life, my danger, the wrath of God, and I felt even the very flashes of hell-fire on my conscience. Now God was in the word indeed when the reality of things was thus presented to my soul. And certainly it is the aim and endeavour of godly ministers in their studies, not only to wear out an hour or two in speaking on a text, but, with the blessing of God, to present such and such truths in the greatest possible reality to the souls of their audience. Such was the prophet's method, who not only tells them of their danger, but speaks as if it were at hand, and makes it thus real before them.

Obs. 4. Ministers, if their embassy of peace be slighted, must denounce war.

For they know that God must have honour one way or other, either by people subjecting themselves to him, or by God's avenging himself upon them. Honour God must have; although you may think his word will pass unfulfilled, yet faithful ministers know God must have honour one way or other; either willingly you must come in and give it to him, or he will force it out from you. If the joyful sound of mercy be not received, the dreadful sound of war must fill your ears.

Obs. 5. God's displeasure against sin is the principal cause of war in a land.

So it is here, "They have dealt treacherously against the Lord: for they have begotten strange children: now shall a cornet devour them with their portions. Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah," &c.; upon this ground, because of their treacherous dealing with God, and bringing up of their children in idolatry. When indeed danger comes on a nation, the people of the land are ready to lay it upon those that are most free from it. To whom do men at this day attribute the troubles of this nation, but to those that have throughout stood in the gap to prevent danger, and that have with more prayers and tears besought God than those their ready accusers? But in all ages the saints have been made the troublers of a nation: But is it not thou and thy father's house? saith the prophet, speaking even to Ahab himself. The troublers of our Israel lie not in the prophets, lie not in the ministers, of whom men say, they preach sedi-

And indeed, in a singular manner, Luther, that great instrument of God, was called the trumpet of rebellion: no new thing therefore is it, for the ministers of God, that first preach the word of reconciliation, and then seek to show people their danger, to be accounted by them the causers of their troubles, because they will not let them go on quietly in their ways, but in the name of God oppose and reprove them. But we know where our trouble lies, it lies in those that are most superstitious and idolatrous, they bring the sword: attribute it not to any other cause, it is the provocation of the most high God that brought these wars upon us. If therefore we be weary of war, let us be weary of our sins. I remember Polanus on this text has this note, and indeed he hinted it to me; In Hungary, a place which is near the Turks, and infested by their frequent incursions, the Jesuits attribute all the evils to the gospel preached and received there. But the Lord knows where to lay the burden right.

Obs. 6. Superstitious places and persons are in the greatest distress in the time of God's judgments.

"Cry aloud at Beth-aven." According to the interpretation I gave you, it was, being the place where one of the idols was set, full of superstition and idolatry. Now mark the difference, it is only, Blow the cornet and trumpet in Ramah and in Gibeah; but, "Cry aloud," or shriek out, and howl, O Beth-aven.

When God's hand comes out against a nation, it will fall heaviest upon those that are idolatrous and superstitious. It is true, God's hand has hitherto fallen heavy, and very heavy, upon many of our brethren, his own dear saints; but has it not also fallen heavily on the idolatrous and superstitious? However, mark the end, stay till God has done, and you will find that the hand of God will be heaviest on them; Howl, O Beth-aven. Those places that have been the nests of superstition and idolatry, are the places that his wrath will be most against. And indeed they do begin to howl and cry out already: for though some of God's people have endured much, yet have two nations lifted up their hands to the most high God to extirpate God's people? No! but they have lifted up their hands to endeavour to extirpate the superstitious amongst us; therefore God's hand is heaviest against Beth-aven.

Obs. 7. In times of trouble the ungodly and superstitious are in the greatest perplexity.

Instead of repairing to God by faith and repentance, all that they have to do is to cry out and to howl. Howl, O Beth-aven: they were far enough from coming to humble their souls before the Lord, and graciously to accept of the punishment of their iniquity, and to bear the affliction laid upon them; oh no, their spirits were vexed and enraged, they could howl and cry out, and that alone. Is not this the way of many, apparently most diligent in their prayers and services, when they come into affliction? what do they then but vex and rage, howl and cry out? but are far from giving glory to God as he requires: They howled upon their beds, saith God, but they did not seek unto me. And God threatens this in Amos viii. 3, (who was contemporary with Hosea,) "The songs of the temple shall be howlings in that day." They had their singing service before, saith God, I will turn these into howlings; for their cries under affliction and trouble are no other before God. The Lord regards otherwise the cries of his people under oppression; they cry to God and send up their prayers of faith, and the incense of a broken heart, and God accepts them, and returns them answers of peace. But for the crying out of wicked and ungodly men under his hand, God regards it no more than howling. Thus it is here, Howl, O Beth-aven; much like those in Isa. li. 20, that, in the time of distress, are described to lie in the head of all the streets, as a wild bull in a net, filled with the fury of the Lord.

Obs. 8. It is an ill thing to have ill neighbours. "After thee, O Benjamin." Benjamin was near Beth-aven, therefore he must fare the worse for Beth-aven.

To dwell amongst ill neighbours is a dangerous thing, and we should take heed of it. I remember a commentator on this place gravely exhorts men, when they hire houses and farms, to inquire what neighbours were to be near them, and to take heed of dwelling nigh wicked men, for, saith he, when God's judgments come out against them you may smart, you being so near them they may singe you at least. I have often read of Themistocles, a heathen, that, having a farm to let, he published it, according to custom, at the market-place, and added, and there are good neighbours; thinking it were more comfortable for men to live near the good than the wicked.

Obs. 9. When the wrath of God is out against our neighbours, we had need look to it.

Though we have been in security before, yet if God's wrath come near to us we had need to stir. It is high time to look to ourselves when our neighbour's house is on fire. The truth is, we in England have been a long time in deep security, though Germany, though France, though the Low Countries, the Palatinate, Italy, and almost all the countries about us have been on fire, and the sword has raged amongst them, and it was threatened that it was likely we would be the next; and we were told that the sword takes its circuit, and that the Lord, going about to judge the nations of the earth, had already judged the surrounding ones; yet, because we felt nothing, though it was near us, we had no hearts to prevent it; therefore God is now come amongst us, even into our very midst. The truth is, we in England lay a great while as it were like a faggot on the fire: you know, when many faggots are on the fire the under ones become inflamed, and the faggots a little above begin to catch the fire, and the next above these grow black; now, if so be you would not have the uppermost faggot burnt, will you let it lie there, and say, Though the faggots below be burnt, yet this is not touched? is not that faggot, think you, in danger? So I compare several nations to faggots in the fire: it is true Germany was the under faggot, and was in the flame, and other faggots have been burning, and we in England lay as it were on the top of all, and it was a good while ere the flame reached us; and though we were warned to pluck ourselves as a fire-brand out of the fire, yet we through security lay still, and now the flame has caught us: yea, though we be now burning in many places in the kingdom, yet, because we find that the actual seat of the war is, it may be, twenty, thirty, or forty miles from us, how secure are we, as if God did not intend us at all, as if we had nothing to do to take notice of his hand upon our brethren! Wrath is pursuing, but because it is not upon us, oh the security and desperate folly that is amongst us! Just so it was in Germany, as travellers observed, if the wars were but a few miles from them they went on in their trading as quietly and securely as ever, till at length it came upon them and devoured them. Has it not been so in many places in England? May it not be said of many places amongst us, as here in the text, Ramah, and Gibeah, and Beth-aven, after thee, O Benjamin? So may we not name several towns, Banbury and Worcester, after thee, O Exeter, O Bristol? It may be, when the wars were in Shropshire, and Coventry, and other parts, those in Bristol and in Exeter thought they were free, and safe enough. And truly, though God has delivered us all this while, yet, if we be secure, it may be as well said of us, Exeter and Bristol, and after thee, O London.

But you will say, What shall we do when the hand of God is stretched out thus near us?

1. Humble our souls before God, go forth to meet this mighty God with repentance, cry mightily to him, that, if it be possible, his wrath may be appeased before it fasten upon us. As in Luke xiv. 32, it is said of those that are wise, when a great king came out against them with twenty thousand, they sent ambassadors to desire conditions of peace, when he was yet a great way off. Mark, when he was a great way off. So, we must not stay till God is come to our gates, till he be just upon us; but while this great King, the Lord God, is a great way off, at a distance, we must send to him, and meet him by repentance, by humbling our souls, and making our peace with him. Let not us think, It is true, the hand of God was against our brethren of Scotland, but they were quickly delivered; but I may say, After thee, O England. We have not done what our brethren did; for it is observed, that though the generality of that people were notoriously vile, wicked, and rude before these times, yet, partly through the covenant they have entered into, and otherwise, there is no question that, though much evil still exists there, and perhaps not the power of godliness so thoroughly as in many of God's people here, yet certainly a more general reformation has taken place among the common people than amongst us; which speaks hard things against us. O let us go forth and meet our God by repentance.

2. We should rise as one man, and help our brethren. For this has been our evil, that we have suffered the kingdom to moulder away, our brethren to be destroyed: Oh, saith one place, why need we trouble ourselves? and so the land is destroyed piecemeal. Certainly, it is the duty of the kingdom, and of those that remain, when they see their brethren, though at a distance, suffer so much wrong, to rise all as one man, to venture themselves for the relief of their brethren, and not think themselves secure because evil has not yet reached them. We see our brethren of Scotland were willing to come in with their help, and though the sword is far from them, yet, doubtless, some of them think of this very text; Now the trumpet is blown in England, in the northern parts, after thee, O Scotland: they think, after our turn is over, theirs is next, therefore they are willing, to prevent it, though it be in such a hard season as this, to help their brethren.

3. We should meet our danger before it comes. It is easier to keep an adversary at a distance than to repel him when he is closed with us. This has ever been the policy of wise men, rather to go out to meet an adversary than to think to have strength enough to repel him when he comes. Thus in general.

4. As kingdoms, so particular persons, should lay to heart God's impending judgments; as thus, Dost thou see God's hand upon thy neighbour? after thee, O sinner, thy turn may be next: is God's hand stretched out on your fellow servant, on your brother, on your dear friend? after thee, O sinner, thou art guilty of the same sin, thy turn may be next: is God's hand out upon thy companion? after thee, O sinner. O lay this to heart, think with thyself. It may soon come to be my turn. The very thought of this, when God has struck some with sudden death in a fearful manner. God has sanctified to some; What (thought they) if God strike me next? such a one is sent down, for aught I know, to his place, I may be the next! the thought, I say, of this has been so settled upon the heart of some, that it has been a means of their conversion. The Lord make it so to every sinner that sees his fellow, his neighbour sinner, struck before him.

Ver. 9. Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke: among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be.

In the words before, you heard that the Lord, by the prophet, did not only threaten war, but summon the cities of Israel, Judah, and Benjamin, as if war were at the gates. But what if troubles do come, said they, we shall do well enough, they will have an end, and blow over again, we shall wear them out; we have been delivered out of great troubles, and so we may be out of these. No, it is otherwise now, Ephraim shall now be desolate, Ephraim, that is, the ten tribes, shall be desolate לשמה. This word signifies something stupendous, the hand of God shall be upon them even to amazement, they shall come into desolation, in the time of his rebuke, in the day of his trouble. The words are plain; the observations from them are these:

Obs. 1. That the day of the afflictions of God's people is the day of their rebuke. See this proved in Numb. xii. 14, where Moses saith, "If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days." When God afflicts his people he, as it were, spits in their faces; and ought not they much more to be ashamed? Whatever that wanton generation think or say, that God never chastises his people for sin, there is no doctrine more evidently contained in Scripture. But they tell us it was in the Old Testament; and herein they show their weakness and disposition to cavil; but they add, which seems to have some show of strength,

That it derogates from the satisfaction of Christ.

But the force of this is nothing, for Christ satisfied for them under the law, as well as for us; they were saved by the same satisfaction that we are, therefore if it now derogates from Christ's satisfaction under the gospel, it did then also under the law.

Obs. 2. God hath his set times for rebuke. As they have their days of sinning, so God will have his days of correcting: you have your days of prosperity now, riches, honour, and plenty in abundance, but remember, it may be the day of rebuke is coming. It is good to put this very case to ourselves. I have mercy now both for soul and body, and oh how comfortable it is, and how happy is my condition! but is there not a day of rebuke coming, when all these mercies will be taken from thee, and then what wilt thou do, O my soul? "And what will ye do in the day of visitation?" Isa. x. 3.

Obs. 3. When wicked men stand out against lesser judgments, they have cause to fear greater. Ephraim had days of lesser chastisements, but slighting them, God would try him no more: there are times in which God will utterly pursue sinners to destroy them, not for instruction, but destruction. The Lord has his houses of instruction, correction, and execution; when the first cannot effect God's end, the third shall, and yet the Lord be just and righteous; for the Lord has no need of us; what is it to him if we should perish everlastingly? he can have his glory from us in our damnation.

Obs. 4. It is a dreadful time when God so rebukes a people that he destroys them. When the hand of God shall be so upon them that he is resolved never to take it off again, even as it was upon Ephraim at this time, I intend not to reform, but to ruin him; this now is a most dreadful time: for,

1. All that wrath which they have treasured up breaks in then upon them. As wicked men treasure up wrath, so doth God, Rom. ii. 5. Now God lets out the flood-gates of his wrath against such a people.

2. All their sins come together into God's remembrance. "In the day when I visit I will visit their sin upon them," Exod. xxxii. 34. It may be you are for the present spared, but the time is coming that God will visit, and then look to it.

3. The cries of justice then prevail against such men. I speak of wicked men mingled and intermixed with the godly. In this day God will not call back his anger. There are times in which God does not stir up all his wrath, as in Psal. lxxviii. 38. Many times God's anger is coming against a nation, family, or person, but he calls it back again; but in this day of rebuke, God will not restrain his wrath, but let it forth to the uttermost.

4. Mercy leaves such a people. "An evil, an only evil, behold, is come," Ezek. vii. 5. But the place most remarkable for this is Ezek. xxii. 20, I will bring you into the furnace, and there I will leave you. God brings his people into great trouble sometimes, but never leaves them there. But there are some whom mercy leaves and forsakes in their troubles; and this is a most sad condition, for by this God shows that he will no more honour himself by their services, but by their sufferings. God saith thus, Seeing they would not give me my glory in a way of duty, I will extract and force it from them in a way of suffering.

5. The Lord then intends hurt to such a people. The Lord perhaps brings you out of an affliction, but in that deliverance he intends your hurt and not your good, Jer. xxiv. 9. I intend nothing but hurt to such a people in all my dealings.

6. All creatures desert such and dare not own them. God being against thee, the creatures cannot help in the least.

7. All their services are rejected. God will be no more entreated for them; now conscience smites and torments the spirits, and all the miseries that come upon them are but the beginnings of eternal sorrows; and this is a most sad case: therefore let us pray with David, Psal. vi. 1, "Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger;" and as the prophet in Jer. xvii. 17, "Be not a terror unto me." But now, because tender consciences are ready to think when God rebukes them, or lays any affliction upon them, that it is to ruin and destroy them; as the Israelites said, in Deut. i. 27, "Because the Lord hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt." In every difficulty they encountered they conceived God hated them in it, though he had so many times done them good. And has not this been the reasonings of our unbelieving hearts, and the murmuring of our spirits in our afflictions? O take heed of such, they are very displeasing unto God. There is a great difference between the rebukes of God upon the godly and the wicked, though perhaps rebuked both in one and the same affliction. As the apothecary breaks Bezar stones to powder, but is very careful not to lose the least grain of them; so the Lord's people, even in the furnace, are dear to him, and have then the greatest experience of God's love. When Jacob lay upon the ground, and had the stone for his pillow, even then he had that heavenly vision from God.

But now the question is, How shall we know whether those rebukes that are upon us are intended for our good or our hurt, our desolation or our restoration?

It may be known thus: if God's displeasures be such, that we find him more set against our sins than our persons, it is an argument that he intends our good, not our hurt, in his rebukes.

But you will say, This is as difficult as the other; how shall we know God aims at our sins, and not our persons? Thus:

If his rebukes work us to a humiliation for our sins, to a resignation of ourselves up to God's disposal, and to an acquiescence in the punishment of our iniquities; this is an argument that God aims at our sins, and not at our persons, in his rebukes, and so in them intends our good and not our hurt. But you will say, It is usual for wicked men in their afflictions to cry out, it was their sins that brought this upon them. But hereby we may discern the difference.

1. They cry out of their sins but per accidens, but of the judgment per se, the judgment troubles them more than their sins, the cause of the judgment: but the godly cry out of their sins per se, and of the judgment per accidens, their sin troubles them.

2. A child of God more desires the sanctification of an affliction than its removal; but the wicked care not for removing the cause of judgment, even sin, so the rod of correction be taken off.

"Among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be." Some conceive that these words are spoken as the aggravation of this people's misery; and if so, the observations from them are,

Obs. 5. God smites not a people with judgment before he warns them. "Among the tribes of Israel have I made known."

Obs. 6. When God threatens he is real in his threatenings. "That which shall surely be." Ephraim thinks that God intends not him. Sinners think that when God warns them he is not in earnest, it shall not be; but God saith, It shall be. God esteems his word more than heaven and earth; nay, heaven and earth shall pass away, before the least jot or tittle of it shall fail; and cursed be that peace that has no other ground or foundation than this hope, that those things are not true which the ministers of the word from the word threaten against sinners. And yet this is the condition of many people, and it mightily provokes God, as you may see in Deut. xxix. 19—21, If notwithstanding what is written in this book "he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace; the anger of the Lord shall smoke against such a man." Oh the bitter, aggravating circumstances recorded in this scripture against such a sinner! Now if God will be so punctual in fulfilling his threatening word, how much more his word of promise! for God has not done so much to realize to you his threatenings as his promises. For,

1. God has not called such witnesses to confirm them. Sometimes, in the general, he calls the heavens to witness; "Hear, O heavens, and hearken, O earth, I have nourished up a people and they rebel against me;" but there are Three in heaven and three on earth who are witnesses, but not to the threatening word, 1 John v. 7, 8.

2. To the verifying of a promise there is not only God's faithfulness, but his faithfulness in Christ, all the promises are in him, yea and Amen: there is in God's promising word, not only his faithfulness, but his faithfulness in Christ, all the promises are made in Christ; so are not the threatenings, judgments have not such immediate relation to Christ.

3. Promises are not only God's covenant with his people, but his testament, and so more sure than a covenant; for a covenant may be broken by the one party, but a testament cannot, it being confirmed by the death of the testator: the promise on our part may be broken, but when we look upon them as confirmed by the death of the great testator Jesus Christ, we have strong consolation: as it is a great evil not to believe the threats of God, so it is also a great evil not to credit the promises of God. Christians, you wonder when wicked men believe not God's threatenings and his judgments to tremble at them. Know, O Christian, that not only men, but angels stand and wonder when thou dost not believe the promises of God, when they are so confirmed that we might believe and walk in comfort.

Obs. 7. The revealing of sin before judgment aggravates both the sin and the judgment. If a father should desire his child not to do a certain thing, nay, not only desire but forbid him, yea, threaten him with punishment if he did it; if he shall after all this gainsay his father's will, he puts a greater contempt upon his father, for he breaks through hedges and fences which should have restrained him: so when God shall forbid, yea, threaten if we break out, it puts a great contempt upon God.

1. The goodness of God is not honoured by us: when the Lord for our good shall warn us of our sins, that so we may prevent judgment, the desert of our sins, and we, notwithstanding, sin, it dishonours God's goodness.

2. The truth of God is not honoured: when we disobey, we do no other than try whether the word be true or no, whether God's words are yea and nay. O sinner, dost thou know what thou dost? thou temptest God, saying, Lord, there are such and such threatenings against sin, but I do not believe them, Lord, I will venture it, I will put it to the trial whether it be so or no.

3. It aggravates the sin: the judgment cannot but be the greater, thou canst expect but little pity from the goodness of God which thou hast slighted, when it warned thee of those judgments which are now upon thee, his mercy to remove them cannot be expected. God, by his ministers, warned me in such a sermon, but I went on and would not reform, and now there is matter for the worm of conscience to gnaw upon; that thou mayst say as Job, "What I feared is now come upon me;" and this is that which aggravates our misery. Have not the ministers of God now for these twenty years, especially in these latter seven years, made this the subject of their preaching, to warn us of judgments? and now the judgments of God are come upon us, God has vindicated the word of his servants.

But these words, though they may be thus understood, yet I conceive they bear a further signification, which is this: I have declared among the tribes what shall be finally irrevocable, without any change or alteration; I have formerly repented, and have been entreated, but now I will repent no more. They seem to contain God's unchangeable purpose for the desolating of this people; and being thus understood, the observation from them will be this:

Obs. 8. There is a time when there shall be no help to deliver from judgment. Though they should call, cry, mourn, weep, fast, and entreat, yet the judgment shall not be removed. As is said of Esau, "he found no place of repentance," Heb. xii. 17. There is a great mistake in the interpretation of that place made by many, who gather from it that there may be many tears shed, much sorrow found, and yet no true repentance; but the meaning of the words is this, he found no place for his father Isaac's repentance, though he cried and shed tears for the blessing, yet his father repented not that he had bestowed it upon Jacob: so that people may cry and humble their souls before God, yet shall find in God no place of repentance; nay, if the saints of God should all join together and pray for such a people they would not prevail; Ezek. xiv. 20, "Though Noah, Daniel, and Job" should pray for them, they should not prevail. O sinner, take heed this be not thy condition; thou hast perhaps godly parents and kindred, and they set themselves to seek God for thee, but God will deny them, their prayers shall not prevail for thee. This may be the case with nations and kingdoms, there may be true repentance found and turning to God, and yet no deliverance from outward affliction. I deny not but that true repentance shall deliver a soul from eternal wrath, from perishing in hell; but this I affirm, that there may be true repentance found, and turning to God, and yet no deliverance from a temporal affliction. And this I shall make good by two remarkable texts of Scripture. The first is in Deut. iii. 26. Moses had sinned, and God saith he should not go into the land of Canaan, which was a sore affliction to him: upon this, Moses, who we may be certain had repented him of that sin, prayed; yet see what he saith, "The Lord was wrath with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter." All his prayers and repentance could not deliver him from that outward affliction, and bring him into Canaan. The second text is in 2 Kings xxiii. 25, 26. In chap. xxii. we find the heart of the king melting when he heard the law read, and perceived the anger of the Lord against his people was provoked; he humbled himself, and the Lord told him that he should die in peace. And in chap. xxiii. the king sets upon reforming the people, enters into a solemn covenant with God, causes the people to join with him, pulls down the groves, destroys idolatry; and although it be said in ver. 25, that "like unto him was there no king before him," yet, in ver. 26, there is added, "Notwithstanding the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, wherewith his anger was kindled against Judah." So that sometimes God is so set upon his threats, that they shall come to pass; God will make them good whatever ensues: this I conceive to be the meaning of these words; and so Mr. Calvin reads them. God may be so resolved against a man's eternal estate, that he will never show such a man or such a people mercy more; as we may see in those which were bid to the gospel supper: therefore we had need to gather ourselves together "before the decree bring forth," Zeph. ii. 1, 2. O let us in this kingdom take heed; through God's grace we are not yet left desolate, but have much mercy, even in this day of our rebuke; but what God will do one cannot determine; therefore it concerns us to prepare to meet our God, lest the wrath of God meet us, overcome and destroy us, till there be no remedy: though, through present mercy, we may say there is remedy, let us the rather tremble and be awakened, because God sometimes comes against, and is more quick with, a people that are not so openly and notoriously vile as others are, than with the most profane.

Ver. 10. The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound: therefore I will pour out my wrath upon them like water.

But why is God so wrath with Israel? Have not the princes of Judah provoked him also?

Yea, God here speaks to them principally. It seems the people were not so bad, so sinful, as they, for in the next words he saith, that "Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment, because he willingly walked after the commandment."

Obs. 1. Princes must answer to God for all their doings: "The princes of Judah." Though they are above all men in power, and so are not so liable to give an account to man as others are, yet to God they must: those actions which are least obnoxious to men, are much to God.

"Were like." That is, not so much figuratively as really; it is usual in Scripture to put the word "like," for the thing itself, as thus, "The glory as of the only begotten of the Father." The princes of Judah were those that removed the bound; by the light of nature, and the law of God, it was a wicked thing to do so; you may see it forbidden by the law of God, Deut. xxvii. 17.

It was a custom among the heathens and the Romans, if any man removed the bound, the ancient landmark, to adjudge them, if poor, to slavery, to dig in deep pits; if rich, to banishment, and a forfeiture of the third part of their estates.

The princes of Judah broke down the bounds in a fourfold manner.

1. They took away other men's estates. God appoints men their bounds and estates, therefore it is not in the power of princes to take them at their pleasure. It was not in the power of Ahab to seize Naboth's vineyard; nay, not, to force him to sell it: though a king, he thought it too much to take it by violence; and Jezebel, though a cruel woman, yet would not advise him to possess himself of it without some colour of law. Therefore princes have no right to the subjects' estates, nor liberty to seize them at their pleasure; though such principles of late have been infused into them by some, for which we this day suffer so heavily. In Isa. i. 23, their princes are said to be "rebellious, and companions of thieves." Now if all were their own they could not be thus classed. We would think that they of all men should not break bounds, for what is it they may not have if they would? Plutarch records an excellent conversation between Cineas and Pyrrhus, who was mightily bent on war with Italy, much to the purpose. Cineas thus addressed him: What shall we get if we overcome the Romans? We shall subdue, saith Pyrrhus, our great enemy, and be made possessors of a brave country. Cineas asked what he would do then? Then we will subdue Africa, Carthage, and Sicily. And what then? Then, saith Pyrrhus, we will feast, drink, and be merry. Cineas replied, Why may you not do so now, without shedding so much blood, putting yourself to so much trouble, and endangering your person. If princes would keep within their bounds, what hinders but that they may enjoy themselves and their comforts in peace and quiet, without the shedding of blood?

2. They broke all bounds. That is, they break all laws and liberties; they will not be bound by laws, saying thus, Laws were made for subjects, not for princes. And thus these princes broke the bounds. Hence we may see what corruption there is naturally in the hearts of men; and this is furthered by evil counsellors. When Cambyzes desired to marry his sister, but questioned whether he might do it or no, he called his judges together to give him their advice, and they told him, there was indeed a law against it; but, added they, ye princes of Persia may do what you will. They were so far from dissuading him from that wicked act, that they encouraged him in it. And has not our time afforded such counsellors to our princes?

3. They broke the bonds of religion. Therefore interpreters conceive that our prophet Hosea prophesied in Ahaz's time, when he provoked God so by idolatry, setting up the abomination of desolation. And this is the great breach of bonds, when people provoke God. God has set bounds to his word, for his worship and service. Now, take heed that you go not beyond those bounds, for any pretence of decency or comeliness, suitable to the state and circumstances in which you live. God has permitted men to use great liberty in civil things, but none in his worship and ways. Oh what evil have popish princes done in this respect, in removing these bounds! And this is the main reason which makes papists so labour for the upholding and setting up of an arbitrary government, having thereby full liberty to break all bounds in religion.

4. They broke the bonds of their own covenants, and regarded them not. Such were the corruptions of those princes, they broke all sorts of bonds, civil, spiritual, covenanting bonds; nothing restrained them.

But as God left no means to keep in bounds princes as well as subjects?

To this I answer, Yea, certainly. Those who at first gave power for families and persons to keep these, never sanctioned their being broken by the great. The law of nature never gives power to destroy itself, especially in a kingdom where there are resources defensive and offensive, against any means that the greatest in power may raise to infringe the laws and liberties of men; for no subject of a prince but is also a subject of the state, and the state may deal with the instruments that it employs either defensively or offensively. Trajan, after he was made emperor, put a sword into his officer's hand to defend him while he defended the laws; but if he failed in his duty, bade the officer deal with him as a delinquent. It will be worth our pains and cost if, after all our troubles, we can but get the kingdom settled in its true rights and liberties; though our workmen, who are making up our breaches, through some negligence or miscarriage, suffer the wild beasts to break in, yet let not us murmur and repine, but be content, and bless God that we have means to help ourselves. A few years ago we thought our breaches so wide, that none could help or deliver us; now, then, that God has raised up for us helpers contrary to our expectation, let us bless God for them, and be content, and stir up ourselves to aid them. If the sea should break in upon a country, would you sit still, or let any by you rest that would not stir to make up the breach? A farmer is contented to see cattle run up and down in his ground, while his workmen are making up his hedges and fences to keep them out: so our workmen are making up the hedges, let us be contented to suffer awhile patiently. The truth is, those most complain of confusions and disturbances who have been most instrumental to make our breaches and distractions.

Thus the princes of Judah were like them that break the bound, and for thus doing the Lord threatens, in the following words, to "pour out his wrath upon them like water." They have passed their bounds in sinning, and my wrath shall pass its bounds upon them; they kept no bounds in sinning, and my wrath shall keep no bounds in punishing. The Hebrews were wont to express anger by עָבַר a word which signifies, going beyond bounds; intimating, that ordinarily in our anger we are apt to go beyond bounds. The sense then is, "I will pour my wrath upon them" in great abundance, "like waters." The judgments of God in Scripture are often set forth to us by this similitude of water, as in Isa. xxviii. 17; Nah. i. 8. Look, as their anger ran like water, so my wrath shall run upon them until they are consumed.

God's wrath is very hot against wicked governors, such as break the bounds of religion, laws, and covenants: the Lord is much displeased against the great when wicked. Numb. xxv. 4, the people of Israel committed a great evil in provoking God by their idolatry, joining themselves to Baal-peor, and the Lord said, "Take the heads of the people." The people offended by the encouragement of the governors, therefore their heads must off; the people sin, and the governors must suffer because they reprov'd not nor restrained, but countenanced them. Hence we may

Obs. 1. We had need pray much for princes. Fearful are the examples which historians report concerning the judgments of God upon wicked princes.

Leander, in the description of Italy, tells of a cruel tyrant, who persuaded himself that he must give an account to no man for what he did; at last God gave him into the hands of the people, who stripped him naked, bound him upon a plank, and drew him through the streets in the sight of all the people; then made a great fire, in which they heated tongs red hot; and, when they had done thus, proclamation was made in the market-place, that seeing he had wronged so many that it was impossible he could atone for the injuries he had committed, therefore all that had suffered by him should come and lacerate his flesh with these implements of torture.

Another fearful example we have of later date, in the massacre in France. Charles the Ninth, pretending much love and kindness to the Protestant party, invited them to a great marriage-feast; and, at the same time, issued a commission, whereby he called in those bloody miscreants, who cruelly murdered them: there he broke bounds; but see how God met with him in a most grievous disease, through the violence of which there spouted out blood from several parts of his body, so that, before he died, he wallowed in his own gore. God poured out his wrath upon them in blood who in their lifetime thirsted after blood.

Obs. 2. The bounds of religion and laws, as they keep in obedience, so they keep out judgments. Pure religion and good laws, as they are bounds to keep us in duty, so they keep judgments and wrath from us. And we ought to look on laws in both these points of view, not only as means to keep us in order and duty, but also to keep out wrath: if we break our bounds, we must look that wrath should break in upon us; therefore we had need do as men that live near the sea, when the sea breaks in upon them, they presently leave all other businesses, to make up the breaches. Our bounds are broken, and who is the occasion of it the Lord knows, and wrath is broken in upon us at our breaches; therefore let us now, as one man, endeavour to stay "the overflowing scourge."

Obs. 3. God punishes according to men's sins. They break the bounds, God breaks in with wrath upon them. Are they resolute in sinning? God will be as resolute in his judgments upon them: see Jer. xlv. 25: You have sworn and vowed to your superstitions, and I have sworn to bring judgment upon you, and it shall come to pass. Therefore when judgments are upon us, if we would have them removed, we should diligently observe what sins we are guilty of correspondent to the judgment; for many times we may trace the cause of a judgment by the sin that we are guilty of; and if we ever expect to have troubles removed, we must first remove their cause, sin.

Ver. 11. Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment, because he willingly walked after the commandment.

Wrath, in the former verse, was threatened against the princes of Judah, who removed the bounds; and here the Lord returns again to Ephraim, in this 11th verse; and in the 12th verse, to Judah and Ephraim both together; they being both a provocation to God, are plagued both together.

The word "oppressed," in the original is עָצַב translated by Jerome, "calumniate," and by the Seventy usually understood in a like sense. We may interpret the words thus, Ephraim, by sycophants, suffers a great deal of wrong. When there are false reports raised against men, they suffer wrong by it: false reports are as a false medium, which represent things otherwise than they are. As a staff put into the water seems crooked, although in reality not so; so the actions of men in the reports of others may seem crooked, when in themselves they are straight and good. And thus was Ephraim broken in judgment; though his cause was good, yet was it wrested in judgment, and that without redress. Good causes are many times perverted by bad men; but the saints may support themselves with Paul's comfort, who cared not for man's judgment. In this signification the Septuagint usually take the word; but here they express it actively, thus, Ephraim has overpowered his adversaries, and so has trodden down judgment. But the words are well rendered in your books in the passive sense, "Ephraim is broken in judgment." Concussus judicio: concussio is a law term, signifying such a kind of breaking and oppression as threatens the utter ruin and undoing of a man by law; as many rich men threaten to ruin their poor neighbours when they do them any wrong. Or, as corrupt and wicked magistrates, when they cannot bring the poor to say or do what they desire, will threaten to recompense it on them, if ever it lie in their power: of this Samuel clears himself, 1 Sam. xii. 3, "Whom have I defrauded?" (the word is the same as here;) that is, Have I used my power to threaten men to yield up their liberties, their rights, their enjoyments? This was the sin charged here on the great princes of the ten tribes.

משעבד I defrauded? or whom have I oppressed?" (the word is the same as here;) that is, Have I used my power to threaten men to yield up their liberties, their rights, their enjoyments? This was the sin charged here on the great princes of the ten tribes.

"Broken in judgment." That is, not in God's judgment upon them, but in the judgment of their own cause, they were crushed in their estates, liberties, and laws, and that not only by their own magistrates and governors, but also by the Assyrian: by their own magistrates they were broken and oppressed, good men were discountenanced, just causes betrayed, the whole court corrupted, and the laws of the land, which should have maintained the bounds, were broken; they were so broken as a thing which is broken but not quite spoiled with the fall, some shreds of it may be made use of; so the generality of them were so broken that there was little right to be had for any wrong committed. And as they were thus oppressed in the prophet Hosea's time, so also in the time of the prophet Amos, who prophesied about the same period: Amos ii. 7, "They pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor." They did not only seek to bring poor men under them, but even utterly to destroy them, they sought to ruin them, and that by perverting of judgment. So Amos v. 11, their oppression grew to such a height that they took the wheat of the poor from them; if the poor had but gleaned a little wheat in the fields, as they brought it home they robbed them of it: this was the oppression which at this time prevailed among the ten tribes, from their own governors. But they were also oppressed by the Assyrian, who calumniated and reproached them, saying, Where is now your God, in whom you so much trusted? Thus much for the explanation of these words. The reason follows:

"Because he willingly followed after the commandment." But some here may say, Why this? is there so much in this to provoke God?

Yes, this was a great sin; for the opening whereof, take notice of these three things.

1. Whose commandment they followed. The commandment of Jeroboam and his princes, men that had authority and power in their hands, yet it provoked God thus highly against them, that they followed the commandments of men who had authority over them. It may seem strange that this charge should be against Ephraim for this, no question but they pleaded thus, What! am I wiser than my governors? must not I do as they bid me?

2. What commandment it was that they followed. It was to worship the calves at Dan and Beth-el. He worshipped God, but in a false manner, and this provoked God so against him.

3. "He willingly followed after the commandment;" as soon as ever he was commanded he yielded, without any deliberation, or consultation with himself; whereas he should have stood it out, and have rather endured the loss of all, than yield to their commands: as the three children, who rather suffered the fiery furnace, than they would fall down before the image. Though the generality of them followed after the commandment, yet there were some found among Ephraim who would go to Jerusalem to worship in the place of God's appointment: so 2 Chron. xi. 16, those which set their hearts to seek God would go up to Jerusalem, and not follow Jeroboam to Dan and Beth-el: some knew that God would be worshipped in his own way and in his own place, but the generality of the people liked the commandment, because it was will-worship, which pleases man's nature best; and then it was most for their ease; and this was Jeroboam's plea, I love my people's ease, I would not be so harsh to them, therefore come, we will worship the true God still, it is but the circumstance of place, and that is of little importance. They then willingly followed after the commandment, and thereby encouraged Jeroboam in his wicked design. The Vulgate expresses it thus, they willingly followed after הוֹדוּ אֲחֵרִים; dregs; and the Hebrew seems to confirm this, signifying filthy dregs; and is rendered vanities, or vain things, by the Septuagint. If this be the meaning two things may be remarked:

1. That Jeroboam was willing to have the people enjoy their lusts, so he might compass his ends; he was content to give the people the full indulgence of their lusts, and therefore the baser sort gave to him. Jeroboam reasoned thus: I must rend the kingdom from David, but how shall I accomplish it? I must have the people to assist me in it, but how shall I gain them? I will let them have their pleasures in sin, they shall have their lusts without contradiction, and then the most will follow me, I shall be sure of the rude multitude, the profane in the kingdom.

2. After their filthy vanities; that is, after their idols, the calves which he had set up; for the Scripture sets forth the filthiness of idolatry by the basest things in the world.

Thus much of the words in that sense: but they are more full as read in your books, and more agreeable to the original, and afford many observations.

Obs. 1. It is a great judgment for a people to be under oppression. It is a very sad affliction for a nation, family, or person to be under oppression, and broken in judgment, when good men and good causes are crushed and slighted, and wicked men and bad causes prevail and prosper, when a man's innocency avails him nothing. Solomon, in Eccles. iii. 16, saith it is a great evil, when wickedness is got into the place of judgment. God has promised to deliver his people from this, "In righteousness shalt thou be established; thou shalt be far from oppression," Isa. liv. 14; but these times are not yet come, the greater part of the world is at this day under oppression. It is sad to have our estates and our liberties broken for conscience; conscience-oppression is the worst oppression; and this was our condition not long since, nay, and is the condition of many of our dear brethren in many places of this kingdom; has it not come to such a pass that the meanest, yea, the basest, persons in a city or country have had power enough in their hands to undo the best ministers in the kingdom, and that he who departed from iniquity made himself a prey? Oh with what an iron rod has the kingdom been ruled, parliaments broken, the edge of the law turned against the godly party! witness the banishing of men, ministers oppressed in their estates, in their liberties, but especially in their consciences, if they would not, like the fiddler's boy, be ready to dance after every pipe; insomuch that when the Lord gave us a little reviving, we were even as men in a dream. When, under all this, we were ready to say, We shall never be delivered, how is it possible that we should be rescued from the oppressors? how was heaven filled with our cries and earth with our moans! Thus it has been; and worse now it is in many places of the kingdom with many of our brethren; but let them and us be comforted in this, it was thus with Israel, when God delivered them out of captivity. To our adversaries that text may be applied, Isa. xxx. 12; they "trust in oppression;" what is their language but this? We will raise a great army and muster together strong forces, and then we will be masters of the field, and reduce the rebels. They trust in oppression, and make cruelty their arm of power; take away that, and their cause falls to the ground: but God's people are commanded the contrary in Psal. lxxii. 10, "Trust not in oppression;" and for those that do oppress, they shall be like those in Isa. xxx. 13, "whose breaking cometh suddenly in an instant;" and you that have friends in oppression, send them for their comfort such scriptures as Psal. xii. 5, "For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the Lord; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him."

But you will say, True, God will arise, but not yet: these are good words, but we may suffer extremely in the mean time.

But mark what the Lord saith in the 6th and 7th verses of the same Psalm: "The words of the Lord are pure words;" and this word among the rest, that God will arise, and set his people in safety, from this generation to the end. And if any of your friends be in danger, send them Isa. li. 12, 13, "Where is the fury of the oppressor?" God will assuredly so work out things in his own time, that we shall be able to say, Where is now the fury of the oppressor? Now, if God has made us to know the smart of this sore and heavy burden, he looks that we should have very tender carriages and loving dispositions towards our brethren, especially towards their consciences; mark his charge concerning this, Exod. xxiii. 9, "Thou shalt not oppress a stranger:" why so? Oh, saith God, "for ye know the heart of a stranger." Perhaps there are some that walk close with God, who have tender consciences, which cannot yield to what may be imposed upon them by authority, Oh take you heed of oppressing these, God expects that you should use them with all loving-kindness.

Obs. 2. Idolaters are great oppressors. When was it that Ephraim was oppressed? When he walked after the commandment of Jeroboam. Changes in religion bring people to oppression. Therefore the Scripture sets forth antichrist by Egypt, because the people of God were there most grievously oppressed, and the woman in the Revelation is said to sit upon the waters. That story of a bishop who would oppress the people, is well known, who, when one standing up told him he could not do it by law, answered, that if there were any law against him he would carry it in his sleeves. Likewise that oppression of the Waldenses was very great, who, desiring that they might but enjoy the liberty of worshipping God in woods and groves, were refused. And was not this our condition some few years since, when the saints durst not appear for God in public, but only in private rooms and chambers?

Obs. 3. God has a righteous hand in delivering of men into the hands of unrighteous oppressors. "He willingly walked after the commandment," saith God. It may be your enemies, into whose hands I have delivered you, may deal unjustly and oppress you out of measure; yet am I just.

We are oftentimes ready to complain of instruments which oppress us, and never look at the hand of God that smites us by them. We should look within ourselves, and find the cause there which provokes God, what sins we are guilty of, and make our peace with God: and so likewise in the kingdom, this is the way to be delivered from our oppressors. I remember a story in Cedrenus concerning Phocas, who, having murdered his master the emperor Manicius with his wife and children, usurped the empire, and opened a floodgate to all impiety: an honest poor man at that time was wonderfully importunate at the throne of grace to know a reason why that wicked man so prospered in his design; and was thus answered by a voice, that a worse man could not be found, but that the sins of Christians, and the city of Constantinople, required it. Sins unrepented of give strength to an enemy's side.

Obs. 4. A special cause of oppression is, people's following of false worship. We never read of Israel's great oppressions, but when they "walked after the commandment;" and it is very observable, after they once began to follow the commands of Jeroboam, the ten tribes never had any good kings, whereas Judah indeed sometimes had, because they kept something of God amongst them, the temple and some of its services. If we submit to wicked men in our consciences, no wonder if they are quickly usurpers over our estates.

Obs. 5. Our giving too much to men, God often punishes by making them the greatest instruments of our misery. If you will make governors gods, it is just with God to make them devils to you; for men made idols become devils. We should labour truly to inform ourselves of that obedience which we owe to governors, and yield them that and no more. If people will give that to men which is God's due, it is just with God to make them the greatest plagues to us.

Obs. 6. We may see here the evil nature of wicked men. Jeroboam and his princes are very fair and specious, give good words to the people, and all to gain their own ends; and when they had attained them, then they broke them in judgment, and oppressed them exceedingly: the more they are yielded to, the more they oppress. It is a sign of a base spirit, for men thus to abuse poor people. "The wicked boasteth of his heart's desire, and blesseth the covetous, whom the Lord abhorreth," Psal. x. 3.

Obs. 7. It is Satan's course to get false worship backed by authority. Satan's chief design is to get his worship into the throne, and to effect this he labours to corrupt the pure worship of God, and presses his own upon the people, backed with the command of authority; the devil knows that there is no way so likely to prevail with the people as this, that if authority commands, that overpowers all reason brought to the contrary. And this is the aspersion cast upon the godly at this very day, that they rebel against authority; an old subterfuge, which in all ages the devil has used to get advantages against the saints. This was Haman's argument, that it was not for the king's honour to suffer the Jews to live in his provinces. Sanballat and Tobiah would not suffer the people of God to build the temple; why? because they were factious people, disobedient to authority. So Paul himself was accused of sedition: and the false prophets tell the king that Amos was such a turbulent fellow that the land could not bear the words which he uttered.

Obs. 8. Man's authority is not a sufficient warrant. No evil may be committed under pretence of the commands of authority. Therefore the papists' blind obedience is too great a burden and bondage for man as man to bear; then much more as Christians. If God command any thing we must look more at the quis than at the quid; but in the commands of men we must look at the quid, what it is that is commanded, more than the quis, who commands; the commands of men may be such that the best obedience is to disobey. The pope, writing to Bernard, required a thing of him which was unlawful. Bernard returned this answer, I as a child do not obey, and I obey in disobeying. God's authority is that which we must look at in all our actions. Authority at the first was set up for the good of commonwealths, and not for their hurt, therefore it was no wonder that so many in former times did deny obedience to the unlawful commands of magistrates, when the edge of justice was turned against them; but now, since authority is good, harmonizing with the will of God, punishing sin and wickedness, who obeys more than those who formerly were accounted disobedient? Therefore it is a false reproach which is cast upon the professors of the gospel, that they are disobedient to governors, and contemn authority. Who are they that, in their estates, liberties, and lives, venture most in this cause? Is it not the people of God? Nay, is not this used as an argument to godly soldiers to be content with the want of pay, because they are owners of this war? It is for religion and liberty they stand, it is conscience incites them to show themselves active for God, and venture largely for his sake, though they verily believe they shall never see a return of their cost: let but law and authority go on God's side, and then they will obey willingly.

It is true, authority against God must not be obeyed; but suppose the command be in indifferent things?

I answer, that absolutely indifferent things are not within the reach of the magistrate, he is to command that which in his conscience, and according to law, he conceives to be for the good of the commonwealth.

But in this case who must be judge?

The magistrate is to judge whether the thing be indifferent or no, and accordingly we are to yield obedience, if the contrary do not appear to be manifest.

But may not a man judge of his own actions? True, he may; but with a twofold peril, that if the course be right and sincere, he must adopt it; and if it prove light and false, then submit it to the magistrate's censure. Now if the magistrate should command any thing which you in conscience think is not right, according to the rule, you must disobey them, observing however these cautions:

1. With much suspicion and self-jealousy, thinking that they may understand better than we.

2. Pray and beg earnestly of God, with much humility, that he would discover the truth to you; and disobey them not presently, but upon serious deliberation.

3. Account it your affliction and trouble that you cannot agree with them, and make it not a matter of joy.

4. If in some things you cannot obey them, do it as secretly as you can, make not a public business of it; to prevent scandal, boast not of that which should be thy trouble and affliction.

5. You must be very modest in your refusal to comply, not proud and self-conceited, thinking yourselves above them, or better than they.

6. You must have a high and reverent esteem and respect to them, for their place' sake, although they require that from you which you cannot yield.

7. You must be careful to be so much the more obedient in other things; if in some things you cannot yield to them, in other things that you can you should be the more obedient, that so your masters and governors may see that it arises not from obstinacy, but conscience; and this will mightily convince masters and governors.

8. You must be so much the more conscientious in your walking with God in all things; if in some things you plead conscience, and be remiss in other things, your governors may justly say, that it is from caprice and fancy, not for conscience' sake.

9. If, after all this, the magistrate shall in a legal way inflict punishment upon you, you are to submit to it, and patiently to bear it, or else avoid the place.

Thus, observing these cautions, you may disobey magistrates or governors, in things which your conscience tells you are not according to truth.

Obs. 9. The more willing men are to sin, the greater is the sin.

The more of the will there is in any thing, if it be evil, the worse it is; if it be good, the better. Many men make this for their excuse in their evil actions, it was against their wills; this does not excuse, but where the will goes along with any thing, if evil, it is very evil indeed.

1. Now the will may be said to be in sin, when a man does those things which produce sin, or on which sin follows, or omits that which would keep him from sin: a drunkard, perhaps, does not will to swear, strike, and abuse men, yet, doing such things, although unconsciously, his will may be said to be in those sins, because he did not shun the things which led to them.

2. The will may be said to be in a sin, when a man shall, in difficulties, in which he must either sin or suffer, choose rather to sin than to suffer. This people here were commanded by Jeroboam to worship at Dan and Beth-el: but God commanded them to worship at Jerusalem; now for them to disobey God's command, and choose rather to obey Jeroboam's command than suffer Jeroboam's punishment, was a sin of willingness in them. When a man omits a duty commanded, for some attendant hardships, he sins willingly in that his omission.

Obs. 10. Willing obedience in evil brings much guilt upon a people.

This people should not presently have complied with the king's command, but petitioned against, yet, suffered punishment rather yielded; had they done so, they had done something; but no sooner was the command issued, but they willingly obeyed. Governors, perhaps unconsciously, command that which is not good, but if they see their people stand out against it, then they will begin to bethink themselves. There is much evil in this obedience, for by this you mightily enrage them against those that, by reason of the tenderness of their consciences, cannot obey. It is recorded of Louis XI., that being about to confirm unlawful edicts, many of the nobility came to him in their scarlet gowns to petition him not to do it, and if he would proceed, that he would take their lives away; for they told him they would rather die than live to see the confirmation of such unlawful commands; whereupon the king, struck with their coming in such an unusual manner, stayed his hand, and refused to sign. Oh how happy are princes and people in such nobility! Had Ephraim done thus, they had done well in it, and might have had comfort from it.

Obs. 11. Commands for false worship easily prevail. Witness in this kingdom; when King Edward would have reformed the mass, what rebellion arose in Cornwall! but when Queen Mary set it up, how did people please themselves in such abominations! So in our days, what command issued by bishops met not with present obedience?

Obs. 12. It is the duty of Christians willingly to obey God. What a shame is it that we should not willingly obey the commands of God, when devils and wicked men have some that will obey them willingly! How do you think to follow after God, and put off all thoughts of him till you come to lie on your death-beds? Our hangings-off from God mightily hinder our comforts.

But you will say, Were we but assured that they were the commands of God, we would obey them.

But if we would examine, we should find that it is often our own unwillingness to obey, than any uncertainty about the commands of God, that hinder us. There are many things in which the Scriptures are dark, yet if things can be fairly inferred from Scripture, we are to obey; otherwise, how can we be said to obey with the obedience of faith, as we are commanded? Now, how can we be said to obey with the obedience of faith, if we must have reasons for every thing?

But how shall we know God's mind in matter of worship?

In this case we are to compare things together and weigh them seriously, and so get out the result and mind of God, and follow that, although for the present there want demonstrative reason to make it out clear. And thus much for the words so understood.

Now from the other reading of the words, after the Vulgate latin, post sordes, we may

Obs. 13. It is the way of bad princes to give liberty to men's lusts.

Now surely that way which has so much of sin in it, cannot be the safe way for men to walk in.

Obs. 14. Idolatry is filthy stuff.

Therefore you that are so pleased with them, and take such delight in superstitious vanities, much good may you do with them; for our parts that truly fear God, we desire the pure ordinances of Jesus Christ.

Ver. 12. Therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a moth; and to the house of Judah as rottenness.

God made a great difference between Judah and Israel; but they joined in the same sins, and God couples them in the same wrath: "Therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a moth, and to the house of Judah as rottenness."

"Therefore." Why? wherefore? It has reference to the words we spake of the last day, they "willingly walked after the commandment." Because they followed the unlawful commands of Jeroboam and his princes, "therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a moth:" that for Ephraim.

And it is likely the same cause might exist for God being "to the house of Judah as rottenness." Had they resisted the unlawful commands of those in power all might have been well; but they thought that perhaps some disturbance would arise in the state, Oh, it is better for us to obey, that we may be at peace; but while they, to free themselves from apprehended disturbance and to enjoy their own quiet, would obey unlawful commands, the secret curse of God rested on their estates: "Therefore" (saith the Lord) "I will be unto Ephraim as a moth, and to the house of Judah as rottenness." A secret curse there was on peace so procured.

In the opening of these words, and presenting the mind of God to you in them, there are these five or six things to be considered.

1. The reading of the words.
2. Their scope, what it is that God intends by them.
3. The reason of the difference of the expression, A moth to Ephraim, and rottenness to Judah.
4. What time this refers to; when was God a moth to Israel and rottenness unto Judah?
5. How and in what respects God may be said to be a moth and rottenness to a people.
6. The several observations to be drawn from it.

All this is necessary for the opening of this twelfth verse.

I. The reading of the words. The Seventy read the words a little different from our English version, ταραχή και κίνετρον, conturbatio ac stimulus, I will be a trouble unto Ephraim and a prick unto Judah; I will trouble, prick, goad, and vex them. The blessed God, who is a rest to his people, is a trouble, a prick, and goad, to vex his enemies, the ungodly. The Vulgate and Jerome read it thus, Ego tanquam linea Ephraim, I will be as a moth unto Ephraim; the first word as in our books; but the second, quasi et putredo domui Judee. Others, as Munster, Leo, Juda, Drusius, render it quasi et teredo. Teredo is a worm that eats out the heart of the strongest wood. Minutissimus vermiculus, saith Luther on the place; and Pliny saith it is the worm that breeds in shihs at sea, and eats out the heart of the strongest oak planks: but yet often translated rottenness, because the worm causes that wood to be rotten. Prov. xii. 4. "A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband; but she that maketh ashamed is as rottenness in his bones:" there the same word occurs; a woman whose behaviour is such in company as makes ashamed, is rottenness to a man's bones, be they never so strong. That for the reading.

II. The scope of these words, what it is that God intends by them; which is, that judgment should come,

1. Secretly, 2. Gradually, 3. Insensibly.

That wrath which I intend to let out upon Ephraim and Judah shall come,

1. Secretly; as the moth doth eat the garment secretly, so my wrath shall be, there shall be no noise of it for a while.

2. Gradually; I will go on by degrees: a moth and rottenness do not consume the garment or the wood all at once, but step by step.

3. Insensibly; they shall not so much as perceive it, they shall not see for a long time how my wrath is out against them, and yet it shall consume them. That is the scope.

III. The reason of the difference of the expression, A moth to Ephraim, and rottenness to Judah. If God intended only to show his secret, gradual, insensible judgment, then one expression might have sufficed. But the reason of the different terms used is, Israel was to be destroyed sooner than Judah: Judah should hold out longer than Israel, though both of them were to be destroyed at length. As strong wood holds out longer though there be a worm in it, than a garment attacked by moths; so Judah held out above a hundred years after this threat, after this rottenness began in them, longer than Israel did; for the time that this moth was in Israel (of which we shall speak presently) to Israel's captivity, was but two or three and forty years; but from the time of God's being a rottenness to Judah to his desolation, one hundred and threescore years elapsed.

IV. To what time doth this refer? when was God a moth unto Ephraim and rottenness to Judah? To show that fully would require some time; I will refer you to the scriptures which contain the account, both when the moth and when the rottenness began. From 1 Kings xv. 8, to the end of the 17th chapter of 2 Kings, you may find the time when God was a moth to Ephraim: and for Judah, in 2 Kings xvi., when God was rottenness unto Judah, even from Ahaz's time to the time of their being carried away captive into Babylon, which was about a hundred and sixty years. And besides the Scriptures, Josephus, in lib. ix. cap. 12. and lib. xv. towards the latter end, and lib. x. cap. 10, likewise sets forth the condition both of Ephraim and of Judah, when the Lord was a moth to the one and rottenness unto the other.

V. How and in what respects God may be said to be a moth and rottenness to a people. Indeed the same thing is signified in both these expressions, only (as I have told you) the first implies a quicker despatch of Israel, and the second a more slow judgment on Judah, but both issuing in the same results. Now God is a moth and rottenness to a people many ways.

1. In the very spirits of people. There is a secret way of God's wrath upon a people in their spirits, which is not perceived in the world. As, 1. When the spirits of men in a nation grow weak and cowardly; that shows a judgment of God upon them that is as a moth to them. And so it was in Israel, as you may find in 2 Kings xv. &c., where their governors did what they pleased, and the people laid down quietly and dared not to appear in the least to find fault with their actions. 2. When a base sloth of spirit seizes on the hearts of a people, a dull sordidness, a minding of low things, and disregard of worthy and honourable achievements; when men are thus, then God is as a moth and rottenness to them. 3. When there are jealousies and divisions. As a moth in a garment, and rottenness in wood, secretly dissever and waste the threads and fibres, so secret jealousies and secret divisions in the minds of men, by the disunion they create, consume and destroy them. 4. Base compliance for their own ends. 5. Falseness of spirit in the trust committed to them. When you see this prevail, especially in those that are put in public trust, then is God a moth and rottenness to that people. And that is the first, A moth and rottenness in the spirits of men.

2. In men's counsels. As, 1. In blindness; that they shall not be able to see the plots of their enemies; they shall not know their own advantages, nor how to improve what they have; they shall not hit upon the right means to relieve themselves. There shall be a perplexity and contradiction in their counsels, and they shall be insnared in their own folly. 2. In blasting their projects: God may not appear outwardly in a hostile and terrible manner, but his secret curse rests upon their counsels, and so is a moth and rottenness to them.

3. In their tradings. Trade shall decay amongst them, and they shall grow poorer and poorer, no man knows how. There shall be a secret curse upon their tradings and estates, that no man can give a cause of.

4. In the chief instruments they make use of for their good; taking away their chief ones secretly, when nobody takes notice of them. As with rotten wood, one little piece drops down after another; so in a state and kingdom, chief instruments shall be taken away, and no one notice it; sometimes one, and then another, and then another after him; so they shall moulder away by degrees, and those that remain shall be blasted in their esteem among the people. Those that God gives ability to do them good, and might be very useful and serviceable unto them, yet, though they live amongst them, they shall be so blasted by reports one way or other, that they shall not be able to do them much good. And when you see this prevailing in a kingdom, then God is a moth and rottenness to them.

5. In their enterprises: when in their actions and enterprises there is division amongst them; not only division in their spirits, but in their actions, one goes one way and another another way, they scarce can agree in any thing, and so all their enterprises are brought unto nothing.

6. In their warlike power and strength. There shall be a great charge upon the people and much shall be gathered together, but no man shall know how it is spent; it shall moulder away, so that every one shall complain of the charge and of what goeth from him, but nobody almost can see what it comes to.

7. In their religion. A secret curse of God on them, that their religion should be corrupted, that their wine should be mixed with water, their silver with dross; that when they desire to purify their religion, there shall be such mixed and contradictory opinions, as to manifest that there a secret moth and rottenness, even a secret curse of God, rests. These seven ways God may be said to be a moth and rottenness to a people.

Now, from all these, arise these observations, which we should take special notice of as nearly concerning us.

Obs. 1. God may be in a way of wrath against a nation or individual, and yet meanwhile be very patient and long-suffering toward them.

Therefore no people must think themselves secure because that God appears not in the height of his displeasure. Neither let any think themselves safe because God is patient towards them. As in the greatest afflictions of the saints there are glimpses of God's goodness, so in the greatest prosperity of the wicked, when God is most patient towards them, there are some footsteps of his wrath. No child of God is ever in such a dark night, but he has some beams of God's goodness; and no wicked man is ever in such a height of prosperity, but he has some workings of God's wrath against him.

Obs. 2. God many times lets out his wrath against a people in little things.

"I will be a moth and rottenness." They are both little things. What is a moth? And that which is translated rottenness, is one of the least of worms, a worm that eats into the heart of the wood, and so produces rottenness. As there may be much poison in small drops, so there may be much wrath in little things. You know the wrath of God was shown much on the Egyptians in the plagues of lice and flies; and so it may be let out against thee in very small and contemptible things; things thou little thinkest of, and passest by unheeded, may be means of great wrath in the hands of God.

Obs. 3. When God lets out his wrath in small things, it is contemptible to carnal hearts.

The carnal in Israel and Judah little thought of the extent of the impending evil, but slighted and contemned all that the prophet could threaten, for it was but "a moth and rottenness." It has been so amongst us. With what contempt did many hear the threatenings of God's ministers against England! And why? Because some dreadful judgment did not rest visibly on the nation; though meanwhile the wrath of God and the fruits of his displeasure were amongst us. Men are seldom sensible of little things. As they little consider God's mercies in small things, so in the same they little regard God's wrath. As it is an argument of a gracious heart to bless God for his mercies in small things, so likewise it proves that the heart is right when in small things it is observant of God's displeasure. If God but hold up his finger, presently to take notice and to be sensible of it, is an argument of a gracious heart. As it is an argument that that flesh is full of life which is sensible of the least touch, so that heart is full of grace when it is impressed by the least token of God's displeasure. But when we are in such a frame of mind that, except God strikes us in some terrible manner, we are not sensible of his displeasure, this is a sign of the callosity and hardness of our hearts.

Obs. 4. Though carnal hearts slight and contemn God's wrath in small things, yet it will eat them out at last. It will bring them down, it will destroy them, if it be neglected. You know, in Exod. viii. 25, the plague of flies brought down the spirit of Pharaoh more than all the previous judgments; he said before that he would let the people go, but he never bade them go till then. God is able to bring down the stoutest and proudest spirit by little things. He can eat out the heart of the strongest wood by this little worm; and so by the least of his judgments can abase the stoutest and proudest.

Obs. 5. God is slow in punishing. He punishes by degrees at first: yea, his punishing is as a moth, and as a little worm in the wood, it is a long time before they do any hurt. This is to show that God's wrath is at first but slow. And by this we are taught to do even as God himself doth, to be "slow to wrath;" in our wrath and displeasure against our brethren, to be slow as God is slow; not presently to fly in the faces of our servants or of our children when they displease us. God deals not so with us, but is a long time before he bring on us any sensible evil. The Romans used to have the rod and the axe carried before their magistrates, to show that they began by lower punishments at first, and proceeded gradually to the infliction of the extreme penalty.

Obs. 6. God has secret judgments to bring upon a people. In 2 Kings iii. 17, "Thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet that valley shall be filled with water." There shall be a filling with water though you see neither wind nor rain; you shall not know whence it comes, yet the valleys shall be filled with water. So, often the judgment of God is out against a people, against a family, or an individual, and no one can tell whence it comes. As God has many secret blessings for his people, so he has secret curses against the ungodly. Let us take heed of secret sins, for God has secret wrath in store to avenge secret sins. Many of you that find the hand of God out against you, and know not wherefore, examine your own hearts, whether there be not in you many secret sins against the Lord. It was so at this time when God came to be as a moth unto Ephraim, for in 2 Kings xvii. 9, speaking of the very period this prophecy relates to, the text saith, that the children of Israel did secretly that which was not right in the eyes of the Lord: therefore just was God in this, to be as a moth, to pour forth his displeasure secretly. Take you heed of secret sins, lest God consume you by secret judgments.

Obs. 7. Our corruptions within breed our trouble and our undoing. Whence comes the moth but from the very cloth itself that it corrodes? it is bred there: and this worm is bred in the wood that it consumes. "A moth shall eat them," seems to have been a proverbial speech amongst the Hebrews, when they would express the perishing of any by their own counsels and ways; as the Latins, Fabrum constringi compediibus quas ipse cuderat, The workman is fettered with those fetters he makes himself: and so that proverb of ours, To nourish a snake in a man's own bosom, is something of the same import; that is, the evil which befalls us is bred within us; the wrath which consumes us is engendered by our internal corruptions. As the bird furnishes out of its own plumage the feather to wing the shaft for its own destruction, so from our own sins results our own misery. From the uncleanness of a nation or a particular soul comes its evil; therefore if we should read the words according to the Vulgate, they followed post sordes, after the filth of Jeroboam, then the elegance of the expression would be increased; it was those filthy ways of Jeroboam that caused these moths to be bred. From our uncleanness comes our consumption: as from the impurity of the body many evils are bred, so from the want of purity in the spirit. Therefore we should be willing to take pains in the work of repentance, yea, though it be somewhat troublesome to the flesh, yet better wear out clothes a little by washing them than let them rot in their dirt. True, washing of clothes wears them a little, but filth soon engenders corruption and decay: so the work of repentance may put you to pain and wear out your bodies a little, but if you let your hearts alone in the filth of sin, misery must ensue. Take heed of suffering any sin to remain undisturbed in your hearts, it will breed a worm, (for so this word rottenness signifies,) it will breed a worm, the worm of conscience, that may prove the worm that never dieth.

Obs. 8. God's wrath, though secret, many times eats out men's spirits and makes them unuseful. Therefore it is compared to a moth, and to rottenness, to a worm in the wood: as the moth eats out the strength of the garment, and renders it unserviceable for any thing; and as the worm in like manner eats out the strength of the wood; so the secret wrath of God many times eats out men's spirits, and makes them very unuseful in the places where they are set. How many have had excellent parts when young, and have been very useful; yet the uncleanness of their spirits has bred a worm that has eaten out the excellency of those parts, and before they have died they have been as a moth-eaten garment and rotten wood! indeed there has been the same bulk and as goodly an appearance as before, yet, if you come to make use of them, they as much differ from their former selves as a moth-eaten garment from itself, or rotten wood from the same material unaffected by decay.

Obs. 9. Though others go before them, yet they shall follow not long after. This note is drawn from the diversity of the expression, a moth to Ephraim, and rottenness to Judah. God indeed will deal more quickly with Ephraim, and consume them sooner in his wrath, but Judah shall follow not long after. A matter of serious reflection for any people, that, though others are consumed before them, yet it will not be long before they shall follow. Germany and other countries have gone before us: we cannot prophesy as here the prophet did, but yet, except God prevent by an extraordinary hand, we may follow not many years after; and who knows how soon? And, to apply it individually, it may be such a friend of thine is gone, the hand of God has consumed him and eaten out his very heart, and he is perished as filth and dung from the face of the earth; and thou art yet alive: and is there not rottenness in thee? is not the secret wrath of God eating out thy heart? He is gone a little before, but thou art like to follow within a little while after. What great matter is it though thy companion be struck dead and gone to hell, and thou left alive, when thou shalt follow not long after? It is in this case as with persons who travel together; perhaps one outrides another, and so comes to his inn a little sooner than the rest of his company, but before he is lighted off his horse, or gone to his chamber, the others have arrived also: so perhaps God's hand strikes one dead and sends him to hell, yet within a while the rest will follow after. Therefore consider, when God's hand is upon any to strike them dead, I may follow not long after. A moth to Ephraim and rottenness to Judah.

Obs. 10. What a poor creature is man. God, in expressing himself thus to be a moth and rottenness, speaks with a kind of contempt against the pride of Ephraim and Judah: they were haughty and proud, but, saith God, a worm shall consume them. In Job iv. 19, it is said of men, that they "dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth." It is a strange expression, I know not any such in Scripture to show the weakness and vanity of man. Indeed to be crushed before a lion is not so much; but that he should be crushed before a moth, that a moth should be able to crush a man, marks strongly the weakness that is in man. Wherein is he to be desired? he is but vain, yea, vanity itself, when he can be crushed before a moth. And so, what are the great kingdoms of the world? let them be never so proud and haughty, yet they are but as rottenness, and a worm may consume them.

Obs. 11. How low God condescends that he may express his meaning to men. It is a very strange expression, for the high and glorious and dreadful God, whom the angels themselves adore, to say of himself, that he will be as a moth, and for this infinite and blessed Deity to say of himself, that he will be as rottenness. Dare any creature have used such a low and mean comparison respecting God, if we had it not in his own word? Yet this high and glorious God condescends thus low only that he might the more easily reach, and the more surely affect, our understandings. Surely we should be willing to appear very low, to do any service for God, seeing God is pleased thus to humble himself to our apprehensions.

Obs. 12. It is a sad thing for divers neighbouring countries, professing the same religion, and living in the midst of a common enemy, to have God's hand against them at the same time. A moth to Ephraim, and rottenness to Judah. These ten tribes, and Judah together with Benjamin, were the only professing people that God had, and they lived in the midst of the heathen, their common enemy; now this is the dreadful threatening, that the hand of God should be out against them both together. And of this we have special occasion to take notice at this day. In many ways God's wrath has been out against us in England, not only as a moth and rottenness, but so long, and to such an extent, that the ruin and decay it has occasioned have become manifest. But, blessed be God, that he has been gracious to our brethren near us, (I mean our brethren of Scotland,) and that the same judgments that have been upon us, have not been upon them at the same time; that though God's hand be out against us, yet that the same hand was not stretched out at the same time against them. For so we may compare England and Scotland to Ephraim and Judah, brethren living near together, and living in the midst of common enemies. Had the Lord, at the same time, been moth and rottenness there, as he was here, what had become of us? That is, had there been the same divisions in Scotland that there were, that there are still, in England, what had become of us at this day? Oh! it is a mercy of God which we must notice and bless his name for, that though he were a moth to us, by exciting divisions, dissensions, jealousies amongst us, whereby we were weakened and unable to help ourselves, and became a prey to the common enemy; yet, though at the same time nothing was more aimed at than to create the like divisions in Scotland, that he has delivered them from that judgment, that he has not been in that respect a moth and rottenness unto them. How had the common enemy rejoiced and boasted had this object been attained! This was God's great mercy unto us, whereas it was threatened against Israel and Judah that his wrath should be against them both at the same time.

Ver. 13. When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb: yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound.

“When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound.” The word translated “his sickness,” is from one implying grief and sickness. And the word translated “wound,” from a word that signifies colligavit, he hath bound up; either because of the corruption of the body that is gathered together, or because of the binding up of it with cloths.

“When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound:” that is, God at length made them to see what a crazy condition both their civil and church state were in, how wounded they were, how like to perish, and ready to die. In Isa. vii. 1, and succeeding passages, you may find the sickness of Judah, and how Judah saw it. When Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, son of Remaliah, came against Judah, the heart of the king and the heart of his people were moved, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind; then Judah became sensible of his sickness and dangerous condition. How Ephraim saw his wound, we shall see further presently, when we examine what remedy for it they sought to obtain.

Wrath was out against Ephraim and Judah some time, and had almost consumed them before they would take notice of it. Hence,

Obs. 1. The pride of man's heart will not easily be brought to see and acknowledge the hand of God. “Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see.” Isa. xxvi. 11. They will not acknowledge the hand of God against them, but would rather make it appear to the world that all is well with them. So it was for a long time with Ephraim and Judah, but at length they saw their sickness and their wound.

Obs. 2. God will force men to be sensible of his hand out against them; he will make them to see their sickness and their wound. Micah vi. 13, “Therefore also will I make thee sick in smiting thee,” saith God; I will smite thee, and I will make thee sensible of my stroke: so in that forecited place of Isa. xxvi. 11, “Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see; but they shall see, and be ashamed,” saith God: I will make them to know and to be sensible of my stroke; the sickness shall so grow upon them, the anguish of the wound shall be so great, that they shall be sensible.

Obs. 3. Men more readily see their wound than their sin. They see their sickness and their wound, but here is nothing of their sin. This is usual with carnal hearts in their afflictions, to look at nothing but their wound and their sickness; they regard nothing but to get that healed; seldom will you hear them cry out of their sin. Thus it was with Israel and Judah; and is the way of carnal hearts.

Obs. 4. Men will not seek for help till they be made sensible of their misery. “Then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb.” And this is true spiritually; till God wounds the soul, and it is made sensible of its sickness, it seldom, yea, never, sends out for help; but when he strikes, it cries for aid. And many times it is with soul-affliction as it is here with outward affliction, they seek for help, but seek it in a false way. They “went to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb.”

You will say, When did they do so?

To explain this, we must refer to the Kings, for though you have this prophecy of Hosea placed in your Bibles at a great distance from the book of Kings, yet this prophet and others prophesied in the time of the kings, and therefore their history will much help to a right understanding of the predictions delivered. First, then, Ephraim begins to send to the Assyrian and to king Jareb. In 2 Kings xv. 19, there you read that Menahem, who was king of the ten tribes, gave Pul the king of Assyria a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm unto him the kingdom. Mark, that his hand might he with him to confirm the kingdom. It seems, this king of Israel saw his kingdom to be in a crazy condition, saw his sickness and his wound; therefore he sends to the king of Assyria, and gave him a thousand talents of silver, that he might confirm the kingdom in his hand; and in the 20th verse, you shall find that his subjects were obliged to pay it, “Menahem exacted the money” (saith the text) “of all the mighty men of wealth” in Israel. Oh what do subjects often suffer to satisfy the humours of their rulers! And in 2 Kings xvii. 4, you find that Hoshea, another king of Israel, sent messengers, for help, to So, king of Egypt. And as to that Jareb, which is named here, some say that it was a principal city in Assyria; others, that it was a special name of the kings of Assyria; but others, and very likely with truth, do not make it the proper name of a man, but a word of appellation, according to its signification; for Jareb means defensorem, the defender, or avenger. Therefore, when Gideon's father spake to the people concerning his son's casting down the altar of Baal, and cutting down the grove that was by it, he saith, “Will ye plead for Baal? will ye save him? if he be a god, let him plead for himself:” thereupon they called Gideon's name Jerub-baal, he that defended them from, or took vengeance on, Baal. So here they sent to the king of Assyria, as to one that should be their defender or avenger: they do not seek to God, but they sent to king Jareb, the prophet saith, as their defender. As often in scorn we call men by the name of that which they undertake to be; so, because they trusted in the king of Assyria as their defender or avenger, therefore God, in contemptuous irony, calls him Jareb; They sent to their defender, but they little thought of me. So much with respect to Ephraim.

And then as to Judah, though he be not particularly named, because Ephraim was the most forward and the first that sent for help, yet doubtless the prophet here rebukes Judah as well as Ephraim; for in 2 Kings xvi. 7, Ahaz king of Judah sent to Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria to come up and save him out of the hand of Rezin and Pekah, kings of Syria and Israel, that did rise up against him: and in 2 Chron. xxviii. 16, you find Judah again sending for strange helps, unto the kings of Assyria. The words being thus opened, the observations are these:

Obs. 5. Carnal hearts seek to the creature for help in time of difficulty.

They saw their sickness, they saw their wound; what did they then? They "went to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb." They look to no higher causes of their trouble than second causes, therefore they seek to no higher means for their relief than second causes. They regard their troubles as such as befall other men as well as them, and so look not up unto God. They are led by sense, and the second causes are before them and near to them, but God is above them and beyond them, and his ways are often contrary to sense; they know little of God, and have less interest in him; therefore it is that they little mind God in their straits, but send for help unto the creature.

This is the way of carnal hearts at this very day. What helps do they send for but creature helps? Therefore, my brethren, let us not fear our adversaries much, for their strength is in the arm of flesh; and we know they take no other course but to strengthen themselves in the creature; they know no other help; they little regard God in all their ways; let them have what they will, yet pray they cannot, they have little heart to go unto God; they curse and swear, yea, and tell us that it was never worse with them than when they prayed most: all their help, then, is on this side heaven, and therefore not much to be feared; they have that carnality of heart in them which was here in Ephraim and Judah, when they were a people to be destroyed, and were given over by God to seek for help only in the creature, to go to the Assyrian and to send to king Jareb.

As it is in temporal, so it is sometimes in spiritual distress. When God strikes the soul of men with sicknesses, and wounds their consciences, what course do they take? they seek not to the Lord that smote them, but to the creature, for help; they go to their companions, to their trading, to their shops, to their pleasures, &c., and strive in them to find relief for their souls. This is the way of carnal hearts, to seek to the creature for help, both temporal and spiritual, when they are smitten.

Obs. 6. There is much guilt contracted by resting on creature helps. Thus it was with Israel and Judah; they contracted much guilt in that manner. And we find that God is greatly incensed with such as do so. In 2 Chron. xxv. 6—9, when Amaziah king of Judah, in a time of danger, hired a hundred thousand men out of Israel, which were idolaters, the Lord would not suffer him to make use of them, but bids him send them away; "Let not the army of Israel go with thee, for the Lord is not with Israel." Yea, "but what shall we do" (saith the king) "for the hundred talents which I have given to the army of Israel?" Be content, the prophet replied, rather to lose the hundred talents, than to make use of such wicked men as they that have forsaken the true worship of God.

It is a great question among many, whether it be lawful to make use of wicked men in any cases, especially in public affairs of kingdoms; to send for their help in time of public danger, to think to strengthen ourselves by the ungodly. Peter Martyr, in his Comment on Judges, chap. iv. 17, handles this question, How far leagues may be made with idolaters and wicked men? and gives two reasons why their aid should never be sought in any of our straits. First, then, there will be by this means danger of their infecting us with their idolatrous spirit and superstitious usages. But, secondly, and especially, if you send for their help, how can they unite with you in prayer to God to bless you? and when you have gotten the victory, how can you join together in praising God? And indeed this is as strong an argument as possible, not to make use of the help of wicked men in the public affairs of a kingdom. They truly are unfit to join together in fighting, that cannot join together in prayer and in praising of God. And yet this is very natural to most men, yea, good men are sometimes guilty of this, of seeking too much to the wicked for help in times of difficulty. Asa, though otherwise a godly king, in 1 Kings xv. 18, is blamed in that he sent to Benhadad the king of Syria to help him; and in 2 Chron. xi. 9, Hanani the seer told him that he had done foolishly in so doing. for, saith he, you require not such aid; "For the eyes of the Lord run to, and fro throughout the whole earth, to show himself strong in the behalf of those whose heart is perfect toward him." So that it proved that in this thing Asa's heart was not perfect with God, because he sought for help from the wicked, and relied not upon the Lord. And it is very observable of this king, that though a good man, and, it seems, a soldier, yet he was very angry with the seer: "Then Asa was wrath with the seer, and put him in a prison house;" what! shall a prophet contradict him in his warlike affairs? I must have soldiers, old soldiers, about me; talk as you will of good men, and that God will be with those that can pray, I must have those that can fight, those that are soldiers. I would it were not so at this day. Isa. xxx. 1, 2, "Woe to the rebellious children, saith the Lord, that take counsel, but not of me; and that cover with a covering, but not of my spirit!" wherefore do they this? "that they may add sin to sin." This is a strange charge, "Woe to the rebellious children," that go on in their own ways, and "take counsel, but not of me," and that cover things over with vain pretences, "but not by my spirit;" yea, and all is, "that they may add sin to sin!" And what is this sin? It follows presently, "That walk to go down into Egypt, and have not asked at my mouth; to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt!" "And have not asked counsel at my mouth," saith God. They think to strengthen themselves by Pharaoh, and never ask counsel of me. It is rebellion, it is a following of their own counsels, a covering over things, but not by God's Spirit, an adding sin to sin, to seek for help from wicked and ungodly men.

Revetus on this text treats at large about this very question, of forming leagues with idolatrous and wicked men; and saith, That for whole kingdoms, on any pretext whatever, to call in the help of ungodly men against those that are of the same religion, is unlawful and sinful. Still he thinks it may possibly in some cases be allowed, but it would require a great deal of time to discuss fully every case, and to give all the requisite cautions. But certainly it would appear, that some amongst us, and their cause, have little to do with God when they seek for such helps as they do, and rely so much upon them; when they send for papists, for Irish rebels, for atheists, and care not who they have, so be it they may further their own designs, and deliver themselves from the hand of God that is out against them. They cannot but be sensible that his hand is out against them, yet they vainly look for creature help, and for aid from some arm of flesh. And on the contrary, this is an argument of the faithfulness of others, who though a party low and ready to be trodden down, yet have been so far from seeking help from, or protection of, wicked men, that though fair proffers have been made them, yet have they resolved to venture the loss of all in a good cause; let success attend it or no, whether they attain the liberty they desire or not, yet are they content to venture their estates, their lives, and all in that cause, and not to provide for themselves by the help of such as they see to be evil, and whose ways and designs they see are not conformable to the will of God.

And if to seek to wicked men for help and protection be so sinful, what is it then for men, in times of straits, to seek to the devil for help? Surely that must be much more sinful, to use those ways that are in themselves directly evil, as lying, swearing, cheating, cozening, and the like. For you to think to help yourself by those means in times of difficulty, is as if you should say, I see God does not help me, I will try what the devil will do. Certainly, by iniquity shall no man be established, Prov. xii. 3. Art thou in a strait under any affliction? never think of seeking to help thyself by unlawful means, for they cannot avail thee. And that will appear more evident from the words that follow.

"Yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound." The Assyrian could not help, Jareb could do no good; yea, indeed they were so far from helping Israel and Judah, that they made the wound greater: for Israel was afterwards carried away captive by the Assyrian to whom he sent for help; and as to Judah, we read in 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, that when Ahaz sent for help to Tilgath-pilneser, king of Assyria, he came to him indeed, but he distressed him, and strengthened him not. Whence we may

Obs. 7. Creature comforts avail little in the day of God's wrath. God's wrath was out against Ephraim and Judah, and they would fain seek to the creature for help, but unavailingly. Creatures can afford little aid in the day of God's wrath, they are all as a broken reed, that rather pierces than supports a man's hand. So the Scripture saith of riches, that they also avail not in the day of wrath. All the creatures will say to you, If God help you not, how can we aid you? They are but as a tree in a storm; you may run under it, and perhaps for a time it may afford you some shelter, but if the storm rage on, what protection can the leaves yield? The creature may refresh you a little, but if God's wrath continue, what effectual benefit can you receive?

But the words, "yet could he not heal you," the Seventy translate, he shall not so much as ease, or even in a small degree mitigate, your grief. Sometimes by seeking to creature comforts a man may think he gets some relief, but the truth is, it ends in trouble and sorrow. A man that thus seeks for help to the creature when God has wounded him, is as a stricken deer; the deer runs up and down from one bush to another to seek for ease, but still the blood falls fast. What relief can bushes yield to a poor deer while the arrow remains fast in his body? God often strikes his arrows into the sides of people, and they run up and down to the creature, to this bush and to the other, for help, but little or none can they obtain. Some little, and of brief duration, I confess they may occasionally get, as in the case of Ahaz, when Rezin and Pekah came against him. Ahaz received some present aid from Tilgath-pilneser, king of Assyria; but afterwards (as we shall show you when we come to another point) it did him little good, for God's hand was out against Judah so much the more dreadfully.

Obs. 8. Of all things men rest on for help, wicked men are like to prove most helpless. They leave you in the hour of your need, as the scribes and Pharisees did Judas, when he was brought into straits by his sin, and in the anguish of his spirit came and said, "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." "What is that to us?" say they, "see thou to that." There was all the comfort he could get from them. They were ready to draw him into the sin, but when he had committed it, then, "What is that to us? see thou to that." Such comfort you are like to have from your wicked companions in times of difficulty; they will draw you into that which is evil, but afterwards, when they come to visit you suffering under the rod of the Almighty for the very sins they have tempted you to commit, what miserable comforters will they prove! So true is it, you can obtain no help from the wicked in the hour of your need.

Obs. 9. The best men are not to be depended on in times of difficulty. God has given us experience at this day, that every man is vanity. So the Scripture saith, Verily every man is vanity. Cease from man, for wherein is he to be esteemed? Had we no other stay but man, what should become of us? Therefore, neither to the Assyrian, no, nor to any living, are we to send for help, otherwise than as instruments in the hand of God. He pronounces a curse upon him "that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord;" and saith, "he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited," Jer. xvii. 5, 6.

Ver. 14. For I will be unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah: I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away, and none shall rescue him.

That which is here translated in your books, "a lion," the Seventy render, a panther, which is one of the swiftest and fiercest creatures in the world. God's wrath for strength is compared to a lion, and for swiftness to a panther. To a lion, because though most strong and terrible, yet, as naturalists say, if you fall down and submit he will show mercy. Thus God is a lion, strong and fierce in his wrath, yet merciful to those that submit unto him.

The word שׁוֹר here translated "lion," differs from אֲרִי the term generally employed, in that it signifies a fierce lion. And so you have it in Job iv. 10, "The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the fierce lion," שׁוֹר so that God threatens here to be a fierce lion. Of this creature, Gesner, in his History of Animals, saith, that nature has so ordered it, that because the lion is so fierce of himself, he has always a kind of a quartan fever, or ague, upon him, to mitigate or calm his fierceness. And it were well with many if it were so with them; many that are fierce and of lion-like spirits in the service of their lusts, and for the gratification of their passions, but sheepish enough in the cause of God.

But mark, God was before a moth and a worm, but now he is become a lion. I will be a moth unto Ephraim, and a worm unto Judah; for so you may translate it. And now, "I will be unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah." Why a lion? that is, he will appear in the fierceness of his wrath against Ephraim.

But what is the reason of the difference of the expressions here? As he said before, he would be a moth to Ephraim and rottenness to Judah; so here, he will be a lion to Ephraim, and a young lion unto Judah. The reason is the same as before. As there it was designed to show, that though God intended the destruction both of Ephraim and of Judah, yet Ephraim sooner, and Judah later; so here, though God would be terrible in his wrath to Judah, yet he would be more so to the ten tribes: and so we find, that though Judah was carried into captivity, yet that captivity lasted but for seventy years, and Judah returned again; but Israel was torn in pieces so that he never revived. They were both sinners, but Judah retained somewhat of God's true worship, therefore God would show them a little mercy. Though wicked men will the less spare the saints because of their godliness, and will take the more advantage of their frailties because they are professors, yet God will pity them. The observations from hence are these:

Obs. 1. When God's lesser afflictions work not, God will be most terrible. You heard of the moth and worm before; they are the lesser afflictions, and it seems they did not move their hearts to repentance, nor bring them unto God; therefore does God turn to be a fierce lion unto Ephraim, and a young lion unto Judah. God's wrath is as Elijah's cloud, that at first appeared but as a hand-breadth, but within a while overspread the whole heavens. It is as the thunder, which at a distance sounds low and indistinct, but stay a while, and the peals are loud and terrible. It is as the fire, at first struggling for life, but which, when fanned by the wind, bursts forth in irresistible fury. As in that known place, Lev. xxvi. 18, "And if ye will not yet for all this," saith the Lord, "hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins;" and again, ver. 21, "seven times more;" and ver. 24, "yet seven times." God will increase in his wrath, from being as a moth and as a little worm, to be like a lion. Such degrees there are in his anger. You had need look to it when the hand of God is stretched out even but a little against you; though it be but as a moth and as a worm, yet, if you disregard it, it may increase: for as great a difference as exists between a moth and a fierce lion, such a difference may there be between present wrath and that which awaits you. Thus the Lord often deals with men's spirits; causes secretly the worm of conscience to gnaw them, and some disquiet and trouble ensue; but, notwithstanding, they go on still in their sins, and at length God comes upon them as a lion, tearing their souls. Did you never see a sinner lying on his death-bed in anguish of mind, God's wrath, like the paws of a lion, preying on the very caul of his heart, whilst he lies roaring out he is damned, he is damned! and now he sees, yea feels, the heat of the wrath of God against him. Thus God comes as a lion to prey upon those that will not regard the gnawings of the worm: when the worm was but little and small, they slighted it, and that caused God to bring the greater judgment. So it is with families; God comes upon families sometimes in a little sickness, in a child or in a servant, and that is not regarded; afterwards God comes with plague of pestilence, or some other dreadful judgment.

So in kingdoms, the Lord comes first with light judgments, and then with heavier. As in Ireland, for many years together, the Lord was as a moth and rottenness; but of late how like a lion has he there appeared! how has he torn and rent that kingdom in a most dreadful manner!

Yea, the truth is, the Lord had been to England as a moth and rottenness; and this very text I question not but some of you have heard many years ago applied to it, when those that preached from it little thought that ever God's hand should be so stretched out against many parts of England as it is at this day. In many parts of this kingdom the Lord is now as a lion. "The lion hath roared, who will not fear?" Amos iii. 8. Oh it is time for us all to fall down to the ground before the Lord. It is true, God has not yet come to this city as a lion to tear and rend it as other places in the country; but yet we have heard the roaring of the lion abroad, and God calls us to fall down before him that he may not come and tear us likewise. Certainly, the Lord will have glory of his creature; God has sworn by himself, and the word has proceeded out of his mouth in righteousness, that every knee must bow to him, and every tongue confess his name: every creature must submit to him, and if lesser judgments will not do it, God will lay every sinner upon his back, he will come as a lion to tear him in pieces.

But further, mark what is between these two, being a moth and a lion; between these two it is said, "Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound; then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb;" and now saith God, "I will be unto Ephraim as a lion." Hence,

Obs. 2. Our seeking out for ourselves in times of affliction refuges of lies provokes God. The Lord looks upon this with indignation: What! when I appear in my displeasure, do they seek to escape it by sending to the Assyrian and to king Jareb? upon this the indignation of God rises high, and he becomes a fierce lion to them. Josephus reports, that in Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 6. 7. the factions in Jerusalem, Antiochus being called in by one party proved the ruin of both. This is the honour God expects, that in our affliction we should not fly from, but humble ourselves before him; if we do not, his anger, his jealousy, arises to a fearful height, he will pursue in the fierceness of his wrath. The way is not to fly from God, but to fall down before him, to lie at his feet. No one can abide the slighting of his anger. If a parent or a master be slighted by the child or the servant, it incenses him more: so when men make light of the anger of God, and think that there is power enough in any creature to pacify him, this causes the wrath of God to burn more fiercely against them. You have as notable an example as any in the book of God, in Isa. vii., compared with 2 Kings xvii., where you find that Abaz in the time of his distress sought to the king of Assyria, though God offered him a sign by the prophet that he himself would deliver him. But mark, on this the Lord threatens that he would bring upon him and upon his people days, the like whereof had not come since the day that Ephraim departed from Judah; such days God would bring upon them, more dreadful than ever yet came upon Judah, and that because when they were in straits they sought for help from the Assyrian. And as in outward dangers, so in spiritual, a man shall seek for help from God. Does God wound thy spirit, does he make it sick, and dost thou seek to unlawful means for help? dost thou go to thy company, to music, to good cheer, to relieve thee? Oh this provokes God against thee! This is just as if a man in a fever should take a draught of cold water: true, for a while he may have a little ease; but the disease returns with greater violence: so those that in trouble of conscience seek for carnal helps, by their vain tampering only render their condition worse.

"I, even I, will tear." The main thing wherein God expresses the dreadfulness of his wrath here in this place, is the tearing of them as a lion. We may take in pieces that which we purpose to mend for future service, but when we tear a thing we intend to use it no more. This expression marks the greatness of God's wrath, as in Psal. l. 22, "Consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces." Now this tearing here refers to the letting in the Assyrian upon Israel, and the Babylonian upon Judah. And the main observation from it, and which is indeed seasonable for these times of ours, is,

Obs. 3. When God in wrath causes war in a kingdom, then God tearth.

I will send the sword amongst you, I will send the Assyrian against you, and then I will tear you. The judgment of war is a tearing judgment. God's wrath never appears more dreadful than in letting out the wrath and rage of provoked enemies upon a people. The teeth and claws of this lion are no other than spears, and swords, and poleaxes; the mouth of this lion is no other than the roaring cannon, from whose mouth proceed fire and smoke, and sudden death. Here you may see stout and strong ones struck down by thousands in a moment; here one man's arm is torn from his shoulders, there another man's leg is rent from his body; here one dying lies wallowing in his own blood, there another weltering in his gore, all mangled and wounded. "Every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and with garments rolled in blood;" death reigns in the field, and triumphs, which side so ever falls. And as in 1 Sam. iv. 17, when there was a great slaughter among the people, and one told Phinehas's wife that her husband and her brother-in-law were dead, she bowed herself and travailed, for her pains came upon her:" so when news comes home to the poor fatherless children and widows, Your husband is dead, and your father is dead; oh what tearing of hair, wringing of hands, rending of clothes, lifting up the voice and crying, until the noise thereof reaches to heaven! My brethren, war is a tearing judgment, it is malum complexum, a compound sorrow. The cup that is now in the hand of the Lord "is full of mixture," Psal. lxxv. 8; full of bloody ingredients, of fire, famine, pestilences, murders, rapes, cruelties, and all miseries; the Lord tears now indeed. Oh how is the husband rent from his wife, and hale to prison by cruel and bloody soldiers! How are men's estates and possessions torn from them in tumultuous outrages! their pleadings and cries rejected with scorn and contempt, and the bodies of their wives and children, and their own too, abused in the rage and malice of the insulting adversary! And of all wars, civil wars are the most dreadful; there God tears indeed; there the brother contends with the brother, and the father bathes his hand in the blood of his own son. Thus the Lord has been a lion in many parts of this kingdom. Alas, our brethren abroad cannot say as they in Jer. iv. 5, "Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defenced cities;" they stand afar off, and are afraid to come out of the land of their captivity, because of the oppressing sword. Yea, and in this heavy judgment that is upon us, never was God's name so torn as it is now by bloody oaths and hideous and unheard-of blasphemies. And what more do our adversaries desire, but to tear the saints and to trample them under their feet?

My brethren, time it is for us all to rend our hearts, even to tear and rend our very hearts within us, because the Lord is come out against us as a tearing lion, devouring on every side. The Jews were wont when they heard the name of God blasphemed to rend their garments. We hear of the dreadful blasphemies of our adversaries, their rending and tearing of the name of God; oh how should we rend our hearts rather than our garments, and mourn with more than ordinary sorrow at this desecration of the name of the Most High! And the rather because we have escaped for the present, and our estates and bodies are yet uninjured. Our sins have passed into the cups of our brethren, have increased their miseries, and have been those claws and teeth that have torn them. Thus the Lord is raised from a moth and worm even to a tearing lion.

Obs. 4. God has a righteous hand in the worst actions of men. Though the Assyrians and Babylonians did this, yet, saith God, I will be as a lion to tear them. We cry out that men are so vile and wicked, but you must look up to God who directs all. The most horrid wickedness ever committed, the betraying of Christ, and the crucifying of the Lord of life, the Scripture saith, was done by the fore-determined counsel of God, Acts ii. Therefore let those that have had their estates, their husbands, and their children torn from them by wicked men, let them know that the Lord has had a hand in it. Though men be wicked, yet the Lord is righteous; let them justify God in all. This is God's glory, that he can have a hand in the most hideous wickedness in the world, and yet remain righteous notwithstanding: therefore he saith here, "I, even I, will tear." He not only owns it, but would have people to take special notice that he directs all. Oh the use that we might make of this to ourselves, if in all those dreadful judgments that are upon us, and the yet heavier ones that have befallen some of our brethren, we could but believe that the hand of God has done it! I, even I, have done it: and in this one verse, I is repeated four times: let the thing be never so hideous to you, yet know that I am the great orderer and disposer of all, and I have some great thing to bring to pass by all this that is come upon you. And certainly, though the misery be great that some parts of the kingdom endure, yet because God's hand is so much in it, therefore we must know that he has some great thing to bring to pass by these his dispensations toward us.

Obs. 5. God has a righteous hand in the worst actions. What the wicked Assyrians and cursed Babylonians did, that God is said here to do; and in the sin of Judas, the most horrible that ever was, God not only permitted, but ordered all, Acts ii. 23. This is God's glory, and yet to be free from the evil of sin. Many knots there are about this, that men exercise their wits to untie; but Cum veniet Elias, (as the Hebrews use to say when gravelled, When Elias cometh we shall understand,) there is a time when all difficulties shall be easily reconciled. You whose estates have been torn from you, and it may be many of your dearest friends, consider that it is God that is the lion tearing.

Obs. 6. The hand of God is more immediate in some judgments than in others; "I, even I;" and the more immediate the more remarkable: There shall not only come judgments upon you, but I will bring them, they shall be such that you shall see that I am in them. In some judgments, God makes so much use of the creature, that sinners can see little of his hand in them; but in some others, they can easily discern it. Belshazzar trembled at the hand-writing, and his thoughts were troubled within him; why so? the hand struck him not at all, but he saw it to be the hand of God, the hand of the Deity was in it, Dan. v. 5, 6, and this made him to tremble. Gen. vi. 17, "Behold, I, even I, do bring a flood." And that wrath which is out against us at this time, is the hand of God in a special manner; God may well say to us, "I, even I, will tear" ye, O England. Oh how has God manifested himself to us in these latter years since the wars began! As we ought to take notice of God's judgments on kingdoms, so also on families and particular persons: as a godly heart is observant of God's hand in mercies, and as coming from him they are most sweet; so, on the contrary, he takes notice of God's hand in every judgment to be humbled under it: "I will establish my covenant with you," Gen. ix. 11; and Isa. xliii. 19, 25, "I, even I, am he which bloteth out thine iniquities." As mercies are then most sweet when we see them come from God's immediate hand in the way of special providence, so God's hand remarkable in judgments must be regarded. For,

1. Hereby the heart becomes humbled, when it considers that it is God which appears against him: Not devils, nor men, but God, that God in whom I live, and from whom I receive every blessing that I enjoy. This it was that troubled Christ, more than all the wrong which the scribes and Pharisees did to him, when he considered that it was his God; "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" When the saints see God's hand against them in any thing, this troubles them and humbles them more than any thing else.

2. It is a special means to render the heart patient. Psal. xxxix. 9, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou, Lord, didst it." See it in Eli, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good;" and in Christ himself, Shall not I drink of the cup which my Father shall give me? Is God my God, and doth this come from my Father? I will take it, I am sure it will do me no harm, but much good.

3. By this means the soul is put upon the inquiry, why this affliction has come, what may be the cause of this trouble. When we see nothing but man the instrument used in an affliction, we regard it not so much, it never leads us to soul-search and trial of ourselves; but when God is seen in a cross, the soul begins to consider, What have I done? what aileth thee, O my soul? Thus did the church, Micah vi. 9, "Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it." There are letters written upon God's rods, which the man of wisdom can read.

4. It causes the soul to receive content and satisfaction in nothing but God alone, and in peace with him. When we look upon judgments only in the second cause, we are apt to think that second means will make up the breach again, which sin has made; as they in Isa. ix. 10, 12, "The bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stone;" "for all this his anger is not turned away;" why so? In the 13th verse we have the reason; "For the people turneth not unto him that smiteth them, neither do they seek the Lord of hosts:" they would not see the hand of God, nor give glory to him, for if they did, they would say as this people, in the next chapter, "Come, and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up." Thus much for the doubling the expression.

Obs. 7. When God intends ruin and desolation to a people, it is impossible for any to deliver them out of his hands. "I, even I, will tear and go away." When lions tear their prey, they are not afraid of what they have done, but walk majestically before the dead carcasses, as it were bidding defiance to all other creatures; they run not away as the fox, but walk as it were in state, for so the words in the original imply: "I, even I will tear." As if God challenged all the creatures in heaven or earth to grapple with him, "I, even I, will tear." It implies how God will deal with Judah, he will not be afraid of them, he will not come against them in secret, but publicly.

The judgment at this time upon our enemies is not a secret, but an open one, the Lord deals not subtly and by craft with them, as they do with his people; but though the Lord deal as a lion, tearing and rending them, yet they will not see him, neither are they able to resist him, nor can any rescue themselves out of his hands: let the means in God's hands be never so weak, yet when he is in a way of wrath there shall be no delivery from him. Isa. xxxvi. 6, "The foot shall tread it down:" tread down what? "the lofty city:" what feet? "even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy." In Jer. xxxvii. 10, the Lord tells them, that though they "had smitten the whole army of the Chaldeans, and there remained but wounded men among them, yet should they rise up every man in his tent, and burn their city with fire."

Obs. 8. When God comes against a people, he defies the strongest, and greatest in power, and most confident in an arm of flesh, to deliver themselves out of his hands. Isa. xxiv. 21, "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall punish the host of the high ones that are on high," in their greatest pride, in the midst of their greatest victories and conquests. And it is very observable, that since our enemies gained their greatest advantages they have lost the most; God then pulled them down when they were most proud, and God will go on in his work though men are never so proud and strong; therefore it is our wisdom to resign ourselves into his hands, yea, though they be hands of chastisement; for although no power can rescue out of his hand, yet by humbling ourselves, falling down before him, willingly submitting to him, we may change the operations of his will. God had rather that men voluntarily gave him his glory than compelled him to extort it from them.

Ver. 15. I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early.

"I will go." God repeats it again, which notes, 1. The glory of the work, that he is not ashamed of what he has done: and God's people ought to resemble God in this; let their actions be warrantable, such as they may with comfort own and stand to, yea, suffer for, if requisite. 2. The irresistibility of God's work, as if he should say, Let any try whether they can oppose me. 3. And chiefly it implies, I will bring them into captivity, and there I will leave them. Whence,

Obs. 1. It is a heavy judgment for God to tear and wound, and then to leave a people. God saith, If they return not, I will rend and tear them, make them very miserable, and in that condition will I leave them, I will be a stranger to them, and will not own them. Ezek. xxii. 20, "As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you." God in another place promises to be with his people in the fire and in the water; but there is a time that God's people may so provoke him, that he will bring them into the fire and there leave them. When the Philistines fell upon Saul, it was a sad time for him, because God had left him. Oh how terrible was it when God left Christ upon the cross but for a little while! This we all deserve, and this is the portion of the damned in hell. While the judge is present upon the bench the malefactor has hope, but when he departs, hope departs. Therefore the church prays, "Lord, leave us not;" "Thou art my hope in the day of evil," Jer. xiv. 9; xvii. 17. God is said to be the "strength" of his people, in Psal. xxxvii. 39. Now, if their strength be gone, they must needs be weak. Christ rebukes his disciples for fearing when he was in the ship with them: but when God leaves a people, oh what cause of fear is there then! The church implies as much, Jer. xiv. 9, "Thou art in the midst of us; leave us not;" we are in a sad condition already, yet, O Lord, do not thou leave us.

Now, if we would not have God leave us, let us take heed we do not leave God. Would you have God for you in adversity, then be you for God in prosperity, nor forsake him when he is afflicted, that is, when his people and cause suffer. Many will be for the saints and own the cause of God when all things go well, and their side prospers; but in trouble they forsake them, as if they knew them not. Know that in thus doing thou leavest God, and God may justly leave thee in thy affliction. But now, it is God's promise to his people, that he will not leave them, Psal. xxxi. 7, 8; xxxiv. 17, 18. God may bring thee into the power and jurisdiction of the evil, but wait thou on the Lord and he shall deliver thee. We are wont to say when we are in any trouble, to our dear friends, What! will you also leave me? will you not now own me, and stand by me? As Christ himself said to his disciples, "Will ye also go away?" God will never leave his people in this manner. The shepherd may allow his dog to hunt the sheep and to bark at them, in order to bring them together, but never suffers him to worry and kill them: so God may permit the wicked to hunt the saints, and perhaps sometimes to fasten upon them, but then God will call them off again, for his promise is, as in Heb. xiii. 5, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee;" in which words we have in the Greek five negatives to affirm the truth of this conclusion, that God will never forsake his people. I will not, not leave you. Yea, but the people of God might say, But, Lord, we seem to the eye of the world to be forsaken. No, saith the Lord, I will not, not, not forsake you. There are two negatives to leaving, and three to forsaking; from whence we may see how strongly God has engaged himself for his people's security.

"And return to my place." These words are something difficult. What is God's place? Is God contained in any place? God is rather the place of the world, than the world his place. "I will return to my place;" that is, I will go to heaven again: not that God is there only contained, but that is the place from which he reveals himself most, there his holiness shines forth most gloriously. There is but little manifestation of God in this world, compared with what there is in heaven; the glory of all the world is but as a dungeon to that place of God's special presence; and we are like children born in a dungeon, who think there is no better place because they never saw better; but heaven is our Father's place, and Christ, who is our elder Brother, is gone thither before us, to provide mansions for us; let us therefore have conversations in heaven answerable to the holiness of that place. This world is like the out-housing, stables, or kennels, belonging to some palace or stately building; and even as these are very inferior to the rooms in the house, so is the pomp and state of this world to heaven. God has given the world to worldly men for their portion, but the saints have a better inheritance reserved for them, even in heaven.

"And return to my place." When was God from his place? when did he come from thence? Thus: when he did rend and tear them, appearing against them as a lion, and as a young lion; then it was as if God should come down to rectify and set in order things which were amiss, as we may see in the case of Sodom, Gen. xviii. 21, "I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it which is come unto me;" the sin of Sodom brought God from his throne. So in Isa. xxvi. 21, "Behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." God compares himself to a prince on his throne, who goes from his place of state into countries to quiet mutinies and rebellions among his people. Hence, Obs. 2. Sin disturbs heaven and earth. God cannot be quiet in heaven for sinners; just then is it for God to trouble sinners on earth.

Obs. 3. In times of public judgment God leaves his majesty in heaven, to set things in order on earth. And surely it will be to their cost when God thus comes; do but view the terribleness of his approach, in Psal. xviii. 9, 12, "He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and darkness was under his feet. At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, hail stones and coals of fire" were under his feet. God seems to speak as a father to his children; What! must I come to you, will you force me to come among you? if I do, it shall be to your cost.

Obs. 4. God's administrations to his people may sometimes be such as if he regarded them not. "I will return to my place." When I have afflicted them I will go to heaven, and there will I sit, and my administrations shall be such towards them as if I regarded them not; as a prince that goes from the tribunal to his seat of dignity, and regards not the poor prisoner. God's people may be so left in the hands of the wicked, that they may think God has forsaken them, and given them over into their power, and conclude that God is gone and has now hid himself for ever. As a poor child in misery in one country, and his father in another, thinks thus, I am in trouble and sorrow, and I have a father, but he is in another country, and I know not when he will return; so God may return to his place, and the soul may seek him, but he be gone. Yet the saints should be encouraged, notwithstanding, to look up to God, and know, though God be gone, yet there is a way to bring him down again. In Psal. xviii. 6, God was in his heavenly temple, and his people cried to him in their distress; then the Lord "bowed the heavens, and came down." Let me make haste, saith God, I must go to the help of my people; therefore, that I may make speed, let the heavens bow before me. So in Isa. lxiv. 1, 2, the church cries out, "Oh that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down!" True, Lord, thou art in heaven, and there dwell thy majesty and glory; but oh that thou wouldest come down and help us! Prayer, as it will rend the heavens to get up to God, so it will rend the heavens for God to come down to man. Lord, if thou wilt go to thy place, then what will become of thy glory? In the world thou hadst service and honour done to thee by the creature, thy saints offered sacrifice to thee; though sometimes thou, God, didst seem to answer, I care not for this, I can and will have honour to myself in some other way.

Obs. 5. When the wicked are in perplexity, then God enjoys himself in his perfection, Ezek. x. 4. When they are in wrath and sorrow, and God receives not that external service from them which he has had, "I will return to my place," saith he, and enjoy myself in my glory. And this aggravates the misery of the damned in hell: We are here in eternal torments and horror, but what does God lose by this? he is reposing in blessed beatitude in the midst of his own perfections.

Obs. 6. God sometimes turns his back upon sinners, until they acknowledge their sin: "Till they acknowledge their offence." This is the best way for God to deal with some kind of men; let them but feel a little of the smart of trouble, and then they will consider. Many who are wilful will do so and so, their wills shall be their law; now the best way to tame such is to let them see and feel the evil of their ways. So saith God, My prophets and my messengers can do them no good, therefore let them alone: 1 Kings viii. 47, "If they shall bethink themselves and repent."

Obs. 7. God humbles himself to behold what is done upon earth. It is a kind of self-denial in God to regard man at all. As it is a mighty condescension in a prince to come from his throne to visit and comfort poor men in dungeons and prisons: surely such prisoners have occasion to honour such a prince, for he comes from his throne to visit them; how much more then have we need to honour God for his love towards us!

But to examine more closely the words in their own original; they are, till they become guilty in their own hearts, and acknowledge themselves to be so. אשמו signifies to offend, to be guilty, to be desolate, and to sacrifice for sin; all these significations the root אשם will bear.

Until they become guilty. Were they not guilty before? Would God have them more guilty? No; but God would have them convinced of their sin, accuse themselves for it, justify him in all, and lastly, with sorrow and shame, acknowledge themselves to be sinners before God and men. It is true, as soon as ever the sin is committed, the sinning person incurs guilt; but then he is especially said to be guilty, when his own acknowledgment confirms the sentence of the law.

But when was this disposition wrought in them? has it ever yet been? or is it still to be fulfilled and accomplished?

I answer, that it was in part made good at their coming out of captivity; hence Daniel, chap. ix. 5, in the name of the whole church, speaks after this manner, "We have sinned, and done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts," &c. How many terms are used to express their departure from God! Also in Ezra ix. 13, 15, and in Neh. ix. 16: all these three lived after Moses, though in our Bibles placed before him. This text is fulfilled again in Jer. xxxi. 18; Ephraim was then guilty when he was found bemoaning himself. Again, it was fulfilled when Christ was preached, Acts ii. 37, "When they heard this, they were pricked in their heart." And certain it is, this prophecy had reference to Christ. But this scripture shall principally be fulfilled at the calling of the Jews, then they shall become guilty: Zech. xii. 10, "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him."

Obs. 8. So long as men prosper in their sins, they will contest even with God himself. Mal. iii. 7, "But ye said, Wherein shall we return?" Is not this the speech of many proud spirits? being taxed about any crime, they presently answer, Wherein have we offended? This is remarkable in Saul, 1 Sam. xv. 13, when he told the prophet he had performed the commandment of the Lord. Samuel labours to convince him of his sin, saying, "What meaneth then the bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?" yet, after continued expostulations, in the 20th verse Saul replies, "Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the Lord." It was otherwise with David when the prophet came to him; "I have sinned against the Lord," was the ready answer, 2 Sam. xii. 13. It is a good sign of a soul truly humbled, when it joins issue at once with the word.

Obs. 9. Affliction sanctified brings men to see and acknowledge their sins. God in afflictions marks men out, and then conscience will prey upon them, as Simeon and Levi fell on the men of Shechem, for then they are sore and unable to resist. In time of affliction thou shalt find conscience hard enough for thee: what pangs have men in their sickness! saying, as he in Prov. v. 12, "How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof!" Oh what a deal of guilt is opened and discovered in affliction! Afflictions are to the soul as earthquakes to the ground, which opens the graves and discovers abundance of filth.

Obs. 10. It is a sign of a hard heart not to confess when God's hand is upon us. Even Pharaoh did this: and it is that which God requires: Joshua bids Achan, "My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him." Confession gives glory to God, and when thou standest out in this thing, thou opposeth God in his glory. Latimer reports of a man in his time, who was to be executed at Oxford for some villany, that many means were used to induce him to confess the act, but none could prevail: being cut down, after hanging the appointed time, they perceived he was not quite dead, and by the use of means brought him to himself, when he confessed all circumstances. This example may show us thus much, not always to conclude men are not guilty when they confess nothing; there is that stoutness in the hearts of men, that they will rather venture damnation than yield to men.

Obs. 11. God will have glory from us. If we do not acknowledge our guilt by lesser judgments, he will continue, yea, even increase them, till we confess and give glory to him. Our unwillingness to do this, is often the reason that we are so long under trouble: sin in the conscience lies as purulent matter in a sore, requiring to be let out before ease can be obtained. God calls for confession, and no true peace otherwise can be enjoyed; O therefore, sinner, confess and give glory to God. How many are there who have lain a long time under anguish of spirit, till they have freely and fully confessed the sins which lay heavy and burdensome on their conscience! Neglect not this duty when you are called to it, it is an ordinance appointed by God for the easing of troubled souls; and when you cannot get peace any other way, having used other means, and yet God withholds the light of his countenance, then are you called to confess to others. See what course David took, and how he sped, Psal. xxxix. 2—4, "I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good;" I roared and was vexed, but I said, I would confess my sin, and shame myself for them, and then thou forgavest the sin of thy servant. Mark here, there was some sin which lay upon David's conscience, and he could not get peace in again; what course takes he? I (said he) did but say, I would confess; and then thou forgavest my sin, thou didst then seal a pardon to me. O take this course, and thou shalt have the like success. God comes to thee in a sickness, and saith, Sinner, guilty, or not guilty? give God then the glory of a humble confession. It is true, to confess offences against men to men, there may be danger in it, making us liable to trouble; but confession of offences against God never causes trouble.

"And seek my face;" that is, my favour, my Son, and my ordinances, for, in general, God's face is nothing else but God's manifestation of himself in his love, in his Son, or in his ordinances; and it is a most blessed thing thus to behold God's face, Rev. xxii. 4: this is what David so earnestly prayed for, "Lord, lift up the light of thy countenance upon me;" one sight of God is better than all the world. To see God any way is sweet, but to see him in Christ is surpassing excellent: in the world, we have nothing of God but his mere footsteps, but in Christ is the great manifestation of the wisdom, mercy, and love of God to poor, lost man. And in the ordinances, too, God communicates himself in an especial manner. In these three things are shown to us the meaning of those words, "and seek my face." The observations from them are these:

Obs. 12. It is not enough to acknowledge our sins, but we must seek God's face. The heart, in the work of humiliation, must be active: the soul which is truly humbled before God, must be lively and active after God, else our humiliation is worth nothing in his sight. When the heart is sullen and desponding in its humiliation, God looks not at it. Thus in Ezek. xxxiii. 10, we read of some who are said to "pine away" in their sin. Many, when God begins to afflict them with their sins, and to excite some trouble in their minds, pine away in their iniquity, are deterred from duty, and lie down under their trouble discontented and melancholy; and this is a very bad sign: therefore here is the test whether our trouble of conscience be genuine or not; if it arises from melancholy, it dulls the heart, banishes all spirit and activity, and renders it wholly unfit for service; but if true, it enlivens the soul, animates the mind, though naturally dull and inactive, and makes the whole man energetically zealous. It puts the soul in ways of activity for God, when in the service of God. The melting of lead consumes the lead, but the melting of silver refines and purifies it: so the trouble of a carnal heart melts and consumes it, but a gracious spirit will abide the fire, and come out purer and better; therefore repentance is expressed by a word implying activity, Isa. lv. 1, "Come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk." Matt. xi. 28, "Come unto me." A true penitent heart is in an active, coming posture, fitted for any service.

Obs. 13. When God leaves his people, he leaves something behind him, which causes the heart to seek after him; the soul has her eyes upon God, looking after him. Therefore, much are they to be reproved, who are so full of their sad conclusions and desperate forebodings, I am undone and lost for ever, there is no hope, to hell I must go: but a gracious heart, in the darkest night of sorrow and trouble can see some glimpses of light and comfort, saying as that good man, Ezra x. 2, "Yet there is hope in Israel concerning this thing;" and as the church in Isa. xlii. 24, "Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers? did not the Lord, he against whom we have sinned?" What follows? "Thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not," Isa. xliii. 1.

Let us lay up this to support our spirits with in sad times; we know not what days await us, yet surely we cannot be in a sadder condition than Ephraim was in here, to have God to be to us as a moth and as a lion to tear and devour us. Many make their conditions worse by their desperate conclusions. Austin observes, that David prayed earnestly that he might not be cast out from that face which he had offended. Is God angry with us or the kingdom? let us not run away from him, but earnestly seek him.

Obs. 14. True repentance is not so much to seek our own ease, as God's face. The face of God is more in the heart and thoughts of a true penitent, than its own ease: 2 Chron. vii. 14, "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land." We may seek our own good, but we must go beyond it; it is God, and not ourselves only, which we must seek after in our seekings after God. This has been the practice of the saints: Psal. lxxiii. 1, "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is;" not for water "in a dry and thirsty land," but for thy face. So Isa. xxvi. 8, "Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee." We seek God in our days of humiliation, and that earnestly; but what are our ends? Is it that we may have our peace, our ease, our estates, and our lives? We may indeed desire and seek for these, but do we seek the face of God more even than these? If so, we may hope that our requests will be granted.

But what is God's face? Ut amplecterentur verbum et cultus in verbo propositos, hoc proprie est facies Dei, quo se revelat, et nobis conspiciendum offert: It is the word, and God's worship propounded in the word, &c., saith Calvin, as upon this place, so on that, "Seek ye my face." Whence,

Obs. 15. God's ordinances and worship are his face. The soul never knows God or has close communion with him, as in these; in other things darkly, in these with open face. The creatures are but his footsteps; these his countenance, whereby we know him better than by the other.

Obs. 16. Repenting hearts are solicitous about God's ordinances. As soon as they begin to know God and themselves, they begin to dishelsh those ways of worship which satisfied them before.

Obs. 17. The worship of God, his name, and his ordinances, should be the objects of our great concern in times of public calamity. Though our sufferings are great, yet we should pray, Lord, take care of thy great name, ordinances, and worship, which are dearer to us than any thing in the world; therefore, O Lord, whether we have peace and liberty or not, our estates or not, take care of these and it suffices; let England enjoy but thy name, thine ordinances, and the government of thy Son, and we have enough. Lord, thou knowest our peace, our lives, and estates are dear to us, and we desire them all; but thy gospel, thy presence, and the manifestation of thy face are dearer than they all, and other things are sought by us in subservience to these. Oh that this frame of spirit were found in us! then how soon would the Lord return and heal all our breaches, and destroy our enemies, and settle us in a sure peace! 1 Kings viii. 44—53.

"In their affliction they will seek me early." Hezekiah sends to the prophet, Isa. xxxvii. 3, and tells him that it was "a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and of blasphemy," as it is with us at this day; "wherefore," saith he, "lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is left;" and saith my text, "In their afflictions they will seek me early." Now when men's minds are dejected and cast down with every rumour of fear, Providence seems to have presented them here a very reasonable subject of meditation, especially if you connect these words with the beginning of the following chapter, as is done by the Septuagint and Jerome, who read them thus: "In their affliction they will seek me early: come, and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up." The first words are a prophecy of what the Lord will work in his people Judah, "In their affliction they will seek me early," and then follows the ready response of the church, "Come, and let us return unto the Lord:" this was God's design in tearing them. And now from the connexion of these two, God's wounding, and their returning unto him again,

Obs. 18. That which God aims at in his administrations to his elect he will accomplish. In my tearing them I aim at their good, and I will effect it. God useth many means, his word, his works, and his encouragements, and all these are of very great force and power to accomplish his gracious purposes; and though in the ungodly they do not, yet in the elect they are efficacious; God leaves not them to the means, but he will see that the means effect that good which they require. When God sends the gospel to any place, it meets with two sorts of people, reprobates and elect; now God does to them all that is fit for him to do, and if they do not or will not receive it, he goes his way and leaves the reprobates to themselves, but the elect he follows after with the means, and accomplisheth the good he aims at. Some express it thus, A man has his servant and his child sick of the stone; he provides a remedy for both; brings the surgeon to his servant, tells him that he is willing to be at the cost, but the servant refuseth, choosing rather to suffer the misery and pain than undergo the operation: the master seeing this goes away, and comes to his child, who refuses likewise; but from him the father goes not away, but commands his child to be bound, and will see the surgeon perform his office. So God offers the means to all; the reprobates refuse it, God lets them alone; the saints refuse it also, but God will not permit this, but sets the means home upon them by his almighty power.

But touching the words themselves, יָחַד The morning before light, or the dawn. In K. it is, destruere, nigrum esse: in P. libel, mane quadrare. See T. מָחָר morning me, they shall come in the morning of their time and seek me. For the further opening these words.

What time does this seeking of God refer to? when did the Jews thus seek God? It refers to these three periods:

1. When the seventy years were at an end. And this was fulfilled in Dan. ix., Ezra ix., and Neh. ix.; and then they sought God early, when their sorrows and oppressions were greater than in Egypt, as Jeremiah in the Lamentations expresses it.

2. Under their captivity and oppression by the Romans. When Christ came into the world, three thousand were converted at one sermon which Peter preached to them, Acts ii., and multitudes came in daily, Acts xxii. 20.

3. At the calling of the Jews, who are now in a most sad and deplorable condition; then shall this be principally fulfilled.

How did they seek God in any of these times early? for in Daniel's time, he saith, "All this evil is come upon us; yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth," chap. ix. 13: they never prayed to God in all the time of their captivity with any seriousness till the end of it came. Then for the second time, how did they seek God early at Christ's coming, when the Scripture tells us, John i. 11, that "He came unto his own, and his own received him not?" they crucified him, and were very bitter enemies to him, even to the death. And for the third time, the calling of the Jews, how did they seek him early? for it is two thousand three hundred years since this prophecy was spoken, and yet they have not sought God; how then is this fulfilled, that they sought God early? To this interpreters answer,

1. This is to be understood not in respect of the time, but as soon as they came to be illuminated, to have their eyes open, to see any thing of the truth, in the morning of their day of grace; as in Cyrus's time, and suddenly at Peter's sermon, and hereafter, when the coming of the Son of man shall be as the lightning: this time seems to be called the day-star arising in their hearts, 2 Pet. i. 19. The calling of the Jews shall be suddenly, therefore, in Rev. ii. 28, they are promised "the morning-star," that is, some beginnings of a day of grace; those which overcome shall partake of the good of that day, and then shall be the time in which the people shall seek God early.

2. "Seek me early," may mean, seek me diligently; as Prov. vii. 15, "Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face, and I have found thee." I came forth to seek thee early in the morning; the word is the same with this in the text. And thus was fulfilled in the time of their captivity; Neh. iv. 17—20, they built the walls diligently, or earnestly, having their weapons in one hand, and their tools in the other. So the spouse sought Christ diligently; and in the apostles' time, Acts ii. 37, they cry out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" And when the Jews are called, it is prophesied of them, that they shall be as doves flying to the windows, Isa. lx. 8. Hence,

Obs. 19. In the sorest and greatest afflictions which befall the people of God, God intends their good. I will return unto my place, that they may seek me early: in all this that is come upon them, I intend them no hurt, but every way much good. Isa. xxvii. 9, "By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit to take away his sin." The 14th verse of Isa. xxvii., compared with the 19th verse of the same, shows God's different dealing in afflicting the wicked and the godly. In the 14th verse we have God's dealing with the wicked, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; the wicked are dead, and being dead, shall never rise: but in the 19th verse, when he speaks of the saints, he saith, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise." The Scriptures make a marked distinction between the anger of God and the anger of men: men in their anger seek the destruction sometimes of those against whom they are incensed; but God loves in his anger; the spring of his anger to his people is love. The outward administrations of God both to the wicked and the godly may be one and the same, yet the root from whence they come very different, they may be love and kindness to the one, but wrath and hatred to the other.

Obs. 20. God has little honour in this world. God here speaks of his own people, they seek him, but it is but seldom, except when in afflictions; and if the service they perform be small, what has he from other men? If men make use of you for their necessities and in their extremities only, you take it unkindly, and think they serve themselves more than respect you. Oh how ill may God take it then from us, when he seldom or never hears from us but in our extremities!

Obs. 21. Times of afflictions are times for seeking God. This is the apostle's advice, "Is any among you afflicted? let him pray," James v. 13. And Isa. xxvi. 16, "Lord, in trouble have they visited thee, they poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them:" "they poured out a prayer," to thee, not by drops now and then, but a strong, unbroken stream; "a prayer," in the singular number, denoting that they made their prayers but as one continued act: the word תפלה rendered there "prayer" signifies incantation, as in words used for such a purpose there is supposed to be much efficacy; so here, their prayers were very powerful to prevail with God. The voice of prayer is well-pleasing to God when fervent.

In the time of affliction the soul sees that it has to deal with God; the false medium, the delusive glosses wherewith sin was wont to be disguised, are then removed, they see sin as sin. Luther saith, that many of Paul's Epistles could not be understood but by the cross. Men in prosperity can dispute against the truth, and grow wanton with it; but let God but lay his hand upon them, how easily will they yield! Afflictions awaken the conscience, so that the truths of God come with more power: "He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth that they return from iniquity," Job xxxiii. 16; xxxvi. 10. Did not God command them before? Yes, but not with the same power and efficacy.

Obs. 22. When the Lord is pleased to work grace in the heart, that heart is taken off from all creature helps. They dare not go with Ephraim to king Jereb; they dare not go to councils or to armies for relief, but to God; how are they then to be blamed who seek to the devil for help in distress! To rest on men is evil, much more upon the devil. Do any of you go to enchanters or wizards to find God? you may seek him, but shall not find him.

Obs. 23. We are not to be discouraged in seeking God, though afflictions drive us to it. This people sought God, but their afflictions constrained them to do so, yet God accepted them.

Sit not down despairing in your afflictions, saying, God will never be gracious, our seeking him is to no purpose. It is true, as Jephthah said to the people, "Do you now come to me in your distress?" so God may justly say, Do you now come to me in your sorrows and miseries, when you cast me off in your prosperity? I confess it is very dangerous to put off seeking God till then, but if then God be pleased to work upon your hearts, be not discouraged, but seek him still. So Joel saith, that in his affliction he sought the Lord: but did the Lord answer him? Yea, his requests were granted.

Obs. 24. An acceptable seeking of God must be an early seeking. Now, men are said to seek God early,

1. In the morning of their years. When the young make this text true in the letter of it, it is well-pleasing to God. It may be God laid his hand on thee in thy youth, and then revealed the knowledge of himself to thee, thy misery by sin, thy remedy in his Son, so that the church's prayer was thine, Psal. xc. 14, "O satisfy us early with thy mercy." How many sins are by this prevented! Your father or master, if godly, would give a world (if they had it) that they had begun sooner to serve the Lord, and to seek him early; therefore bless God who has put it into your hearts to seek him. John was the young disciple, and he in his youth began to know Christ; and of all the disciples none had such respect showed them as John, for it is said that he lay in Christ's bosom, and Christ loved him.

2. In the morning of God's revealing himself. As soon as ever God begins to discover himself, we should then seek him early; the soul should say, as Paul, "I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision;" "neither conferred I with flesh and blood," Acts xxvi. 19; Gal. i. 16. Has God set up a light in your consciences? and has it discovered to you your misery? and have you hearkened to its voice? What have you done since? Is sin reformed? Are you changed in the inner man? Is Christ formed in you, and exalted upon his throne in your hearts? Is your will subjected to the will of God, and your whole man delivered up to the government of God? Blessed of the Lord art thou if it be so. But contrariwise, is sin let in, and liked as well as ever, after these stirrings and convictions of conscience? Then are you far from the number of those who are early seekers of God.

3. When we seek him with fervency and diligence. When God's hand is out against us, he then looks that we should seek him with intentiveness of spirit. See how the church seeks God, Isa. xxvi. 9, "With my soul have I desired thee in the night; yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early." When was this? In a grievous night of affliction, when they were in great troubles; then to seek God early, with their spirits within them, is most emphatical. So Acts xii. 3, prayer was made by the church for Peter "without ceasing;" it was continued prayer, prayer stretched out: even so ought our prayers to be lifted up with fervency. True prayer is active and working; the fervent prayer of the righteous prevails much with God, James v. 16. Lively, working prayers are prevailing prayers.

But what is it to seek God diligently? When we seek him,

1. With all other things under our feet, when all other things are contemned in comparison. When the soul is carried out after God with a panting, longing desire, as the hart after the water-brooks.

2. With our whole heart. The heart is not divided in the work, every part is employed; as Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 3, "feared, and set himself to seek the Lord," gave himself wholly to the work.

3. When the soul bears down all difficulties in seeking God, when nothing shall keep him off his work; as Jacob wrestled with God, and would not let him go till he blessed him, Gen. xxxii. 24—26. So the woman of Canaan, how earnestly did she seek to Christ for her daughter, and would not be discouraged by difficulties! Matt. xv. 22—23.

4. When no means are neglected to be used whereby that which we seek may be obtained. The soul tries every means, and follows God in all his ways, that it may find him; as the poor woman who followed Christ from place to place to touch the hem of his garment; Christ could not be hid from her.

5. When we resolve even to die in the pursuit; when it is our constant practice living, and our resolutions dying; as Jacob, the nearer the dawning of the day approached, the more earnest was he. How contrary are the practices of too many, who at the first seek God early, and earnestly too, yet after a while leave off and grow cold! Oh that it were not thus with us at this day! The Lord has brought us low at this time, yea, our condition is sad. True, there is a spirit of seeking abroad in the land, but now God calls for a quickening of this. "Be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord;" in the original it is, ζῴοτες, boiling in spirit; let us so seek him now, that hereafter we may praise him. "They shall praise the Lord that seek him: your heart shall live for ever," Psal. xxii. 26. How sweet are those mercies which are won by prayer, and worn with praises! Therefore now stir up the gift that is within you: you that never prayed before, pray now; and you that have prayed before, quicken your diligence and double your care. How much better is it to seek God than men! to cry to God for mercy than to cursed men! God might have made your condition as the condition of your brethren. How many are this day fleeing for their lives, and begging mercy at the hands of barbarous, bloodthirsty, merciless monsters! and you are yet in peace, seeking your God, for yourselves and them.

But it may be asked, Why should we seek God? Can we do any thing to move God? Will God be the sooner entreated by us?

I answer, No, the words mean not that we can alter or change God's mind; but such exhortations as these are to fit and prepare us for mercy, to raise our spirits to a suitable frame and disposition for mercies expected and desired. And thus we leave this rich mine of the fifth chapter, which has been so fruitful in affording many choice truths; and come to the sixth, a rich mine also of heavenly and most seasonable directions, no less useful than the former.

CHAPTER VI.

IN this chapter we have,

I. Israel's true repentance, ver. 1—3.

II. A sad complaint of the feigned repentance of many in Israel, ver. 4.

III. A further upbraiding of Israel for its unkind dealing with God, ver. 5—11.

I. Israel's true repentance, manifested in their resolution to return to him who had smitten them, their confidence in his mercy, and their blessing themselves in their happy condition now they were returned.

Ver. 1. Come, and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up.

These words are an excitation of the mind, not the body, to return to God; they also show the mighty spirit which came on this people at this time, as if they had said, Well, our princes have deceived us, and our prophets have deluded us and led us aside; we have been false in our worship, wrong in our practices, and have incurred the displeasure of God: but now, "come, and let us return," we are resolved to fall down and humble ourselves before him: "he hath smitten us, and he will bind us up." The Septuagint, and also Jerome, understand these words to refer to the practice of surgeons, who are wont to put deep and long tents into sores which they desire not merely to skin, but thoroughly to heal. So that here are marked Israel's dangerous disease, and their great corruptions, and that in their afflictions; and God's design not to let them die of the disease, or perish under his hand in the curing, but to heal them, and that thoroughly. A woman whose breasts are sore must have them thoroughly tented before they be healed, and she bids the surgeon to make her cure complete, though it be long and painful. So saith God, This people are very sorely wounded, and their cure will be very long and tedious, sore and painful, yet I will heal them. And the people saith, seeing it is thus, "Come, and let us return;" it matters not, though our healing cost us dear and be painful, it is enough that God will heal us. Let our disease be never so grievous, "come, and let us return." A man that has a mortal wound about him, what pain would he not be willing to endure were he certain of being cured! This people conceived themselves so wounded, that if God had not undertaken to relieve them they must have perished; but in that God had undertaken the cure, they were confident they should be healed.

Obs. 1. When God's time of mercy is come, he puts a mighty spirit of seeking into men. God's time was come for Israel's deliverance, and now God puts an active, stirring spirit into them; therefore they say, "Come, let us return:" before, their spirits were heavy and dull, like men in a lethargy; but now, their minds are quickened for God, and they say, like those in Isa. ii. 3, "Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob;" and, as in Isa. xlv. 5, they willingly and cheerfully call themselves by the name of Jacob, and subscribe with their hand unto the Lord, and surname themselves by the name of Israel. As a ship whose sails are filled with a full and strong wind, they go on gallantly against all opposition: there is a spirit infused into them, such as Epaphras desires with fervent prayers for the Colossians, chap. iv. 12, "that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God." Now will effectual and thorough reformation take place. At the time of antichrist's destruction, God has promised to put such a spirit into the hearts of the people, that all his tyranny shall not be able to stand before them: God will breathe upon the spirits of men, and they shall rise up powerful in his might.

Now, considering God's power, let not us despair concerning the great works which are doing in our times. Let men be never so base and perfidious, when God's time is come he will speak the word for deliverance. What a miserable, senseless condition was the world in a little before Luther's time! But when he came, what a spirit was raised in the people! And what a spirit has there been excited amongst us, and that suddenly, when we were in such bondage, and, although born free, likely to be slaves and vassals subjected to the wills of some twenty or thirty men! And what a spirit did God raise in our brethren of Scotland, when he was about to do them good, and to break the neck of the yoke of their tyranny! Oh then what a cursed thing it is for any to quench, keep under, or resist such a spirit as this when it arises within them!

Obs. 2. A joint turning to God is very honourable to God. "Come, and let us return." It is much honour to God when but one soul is turned to him, but when many are converted there is much glory, a multitude of praises then offered up to God; as in Rev. v. 11, "And the number of them which stood round about the throne was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands." And so Rev. xix. 6, "The voice of a multitude, saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

Obs. 3. Times of mercy are times of union. Oh it is very sad when men will go every one their own way; but when men join together, saying, Come, and let us set about the Lord's work, every one encouraging each other, then there is hope the times of mercy are nigh that people. But our misery is the divisions and the rendings asunder that are amongst us. God is much displeased at this, and it certainly is one great hinderance to the entrance of mercy, that, notwithstanding God has us in the fire and threatens even our consuming, yet we will not join and unite together.

Obs. 4. True penitent hearts seek to get others to join with them. Oh how glad are they to see any coming on with them to seek the Lord! and how careful are they to give encouraging examples, to persuade them with all gentleness, saying, Come, let us go up to the house of the Lord, we have found the Lord very gracious to us; O come, he is good still, yea, and good to you, if you will come to him! If the husband have found God good to him, he will persuade the wife, the child, the servant, to come to Christ. Thus much of their resolution to return: the reason follows:

"For he hath torn, and he will heal us." Hence,

Obs. 5. In times of the greatest sufferings a truly penitent heart retains good thoughts of God. God has torn, and wounded, and smitten us; what then? shall we run away from God, and think hardly of him? No, think well of him and bless his name, even when you receive the hardest measure from God. This the people of God in former times have done: in all their miseries how careful were Nehemiah, Ezra, and Daniel to acquit and justify God! yea, the church in the time of her desertion retains Christ as a King, and calls him so, Psal. xlv. And as they dare not entertain hard thoughts of God, so neither of his cause nor his people. Many are like bad servants, who while they have every thing fitting, can give their master's family a good report; but let them be crossed, and go away in discontent, how vilely do they speak of it! or as sturdy beggars, who whilst they find relief and succour, can give good words; but let them be sent away empty, and then what terms are sufficiently abusive? so when things go well with the cause of God and his people, they will be on God's side. Oh take heed of being sorry that you have been so far engaged in it; this is a base and vile spirit. See how low the church was in affliction, Psal. xlv. 12—16, "by reason of the enemy and avenger:" yet in ver. 17, although "All this is come upon us," what then? is not God good, and his cause good that we maintain? No, God forbid such a thought should enter into us: Although "all this" evil "be come upon us, yet," she saith, "have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant." Oh let us lay up this truth as a mighty comfort and stay to us in these times, and a good incitement to prayer; for mark, in the 23rd verse, "Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? arise, cast us not off for ever." Those can pray to purpose, who in the sorest afflictions can manifest the most fear of God, and exercise notwithstanding the most love toward him and his ways.

Obs. 6. A penitent heart is not a discouraged heart. It is a heart that sinks not down in discouragements, saying, (as some do,) We are a lost people and undone, there is no hope, we had been better never have ventured as far as we have. It dares not draw conclusions from what has been, to what is, and what will be; this it regards as too presumptuous. David in the cave can trust in God, and hide himself under God's wing, Psal. lvii. 1. So long as there is a God in heaven, such a soul will expect help from him, will expect mercy notwithstanding his severity and justice; the severity of justice in God cannot keep him from waiting for and expecting what God has promised: if the soul can but get over this difficulty, the deep gulf of God's justice, it will easily surmount all the dreadfulness of man's displeasure. A repenting heart is a purified, and therefore not a discouraged, but a sustained heart; while men of unclean and unholy minds are always jealous of God, and of his dealings toward them: oh let it appear that we are not thus, by the cleanness of our lives and the purity of our conversations. Carnal hearts are not discouraged when they have carnal helps to underprop them, and shall we be afraid of any difficulty who have God for our help? Remarkable is 1 Sam. iv. 9, with regard to the speech made by the Philistines. On the coming of the ark into the camp of Israel, they were put into great fear; yet how do they encourage themselves! "Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants to the Hebrews, as they have been to you: quit yourselves like men, and fight." So say I, Let us be courageous in these times, and fight for our liberties, our laws, and our religion: did we but spend that strength in returning to God which we do in discouraging thoughts, oh how soon would help come for us out of the sanctuary! Now though we must not be discouraged when helps and means fail, yet, like the prophet, our confidence must be mingled with deep humility for our sins which cause these breaches, Hab. iii. 15—18. We should improve our humiliation as they did, Judg. xx., who, though in a good cause, a cause which God approved of, yet lost forty thousand men in the prosecution of it. What did they then? leave it off, and run away? No, but summoned fresh courage and resolution, fasted and prayed, and humbled themselves before the God of their fathers, and then prospered. Oh let us be humbled, that we may not be discouraged!

And as we must not be discouraged, so must we not falsely encourage ourselves: as they said, "The bricks are fallen down, but we can build with hewn stone;" so say not, This army is lost, but we can raise another quickly. Let us only encourage ourselves in the Lord our God, but take heed of resting too much in the goodness of our cause. 1 Sam. iv. 3, the people said, "Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies:" they thought the bare having of that among them would deliver them. Know that it is not the goodness of our cause that can bear us up, and carry us through difficulties, if we do not turn to the Lord.

Now, that your spirits may not sink under these troubles, let me give you a few proppos to lean upon.

1. If we have been faithful in our work, we may have this testimony, that what is our duty as creatures, is performed by us; and know, though there were many weaknesses in our performances, yet we have to deal with a God who loves sincerity in infirmities.

2. If we suffer, God suffers more. This should mightily encourage us in sufferings, when God is contented to be our partner.

3. God sees further than we, and knows what is best for us. When the wars first began we promised ourselves a present end of them, and we thought it would be best; but God saw otherwise; and now we are sensible that if we had obtained peace at the first we should not have known what to have done with it, it would even have undone us by this time.

4. Things are not more difficult now to God than they were at the first; God knows as well how to deliver in the greatest straits, as if none at all existed.

5. God usually works by contraries, bringing light out of darkness; saving Israel in the Red Sea, when in the greatest danger of drowning.

6. God will be seen in the mount. God has his time, his set time, to appear for his people, and before that time come he will not show himself. The soul is very prone in misery to run into a double extreme, either of presumption or despair; presumption, that puts the evil day far off; and unbelief, that puts the good day far off: therefore take heed of both these.

But could we have the encouragement of this people, could we say that we have returned, it were something.

Now for this, know, that if the consideration of God's healing mercy is more prevailing with us to turn than any misery whatsoever, if we are willing and desirous to turn, the other may be made good, that God is willing to heal and bind us up. Can we but make out the first part of our turning, I dare affirm the second, of God's healing; though the means employed may be very painful, the Lord may put a deep tent into us to eat out our putrified flesh, yet we ought more earnestly to desire a thorough and sound healing, than an easy and perhaps transient cure.

Obs. 7. When God intends good to a people, he gives them intimations of his love. How did this people know that God would heal them, and that he would bind them up? Thus they argued it, from God's goodness, from his name, and from his covenant. Oh would God but put into our thoughts to consider the mercy of God to us in the covenant.

But I fear this would be presumption in me, may some say.

I answer, No, if thy believing and resting upon the promise sanctifies the heart, and does not make it secure; if thy laying hold upon the promise more breaks the heart, renders it more humble and submissive, it is a right supporting the heart upon the promise, and not presumption.

Obs. 8. Apprehension of mercy causes the heart to turn. Many say, God will not be gracious, mercy is past, there is no hope, therefore we will give over waiting. No, but let us seek him still, and wait longer for mercy to come.

Obs. 9. The saints make their healings not a fruit of their returning, but of God's mercy. Many poor souls think that they must not believe till they are so far humbled, and so much broken. This is an error; we should exercise our faith more upon God's healing than our returning, and this will cause us to be humbled; humiliation will soon follow. Good works are a good nurse to faith; but if we make works the mother of faith, that faith is not right, it rests not on Scriptural grounds.

Ver. 2. After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight.

God's works are comments on his word; and I have often had occasion to notice this in explaining this prophecy: as Christ said of that scripture, Luke iv. 21, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears;" so may I now say of this scripture, how literally has God fulfilled it in us! In the last discourse you heard of God's wounding and of his healing; how has he graciously healed us, and literally fulfilled these words towards us! "After two days he will revive us." But two days after our humiliation he revived us, and the third day we lived in his sight; and if we follow on to know the Lord we shall know more of his counsel, and though the darkness of the night be not yet over, yet the morning is prepared.

But may we conclude, as this people, that God will revive us, and that we shall live in his sight? If we can prove our turning unto God, and our returning from sin, the other may be made good, that he will revive us in our sorrows.

The scope of these two verses is to express a further confidence of repenting, believing Israel in God's goodness: before he smote them, and now he would revive them. But before this reviving comes perhaps we may be as dead men, yea, lie a day, that is, a certain time, as dead men, forsaken and forgotten of God; yea, we may lie the second day also, that is, a second time wherein we expected help the enemy may triumph over us; yet "we shall live in his sight," that is, all shall see, that the eye of God was on us for good: he will revive us, and God shall be in our sight as we shall be in his;

glorious things is he about to make known to us; though it be night now, yet know his mercy is coming, even as the morning follows the dark night. This is the sum of these words.

Yet, for the further opening of them, know that interpreters are greatly perplexed to discover what is meant by "two days;" some think it spoken of the Jewish captivity; others, of the second coming of Christ, the Messias.

The meaning of the words "after two days," appears to be, that although God do not come presently, yet, "after two days," he will come; mercy, though it stays long, yet will come. Two days in Scripture signifies a short time; as Numb. ix. 22, "Whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud staid upon the tabernacle." Mercer quotes R. Abrah. Ezræ Fil. as saying, that wounds and gashes in a man's body pain and smart more at two days' end than at first; so God may let us lie in the smart of pain and sorrow two days, but in the third day mercy shall follow.

Interpreters generally conceive these words to have reference also to the two days that Christ lay in the grave; and Luther saith that this is the scripture which Paul refers to in 1 Cor. xv. 4, that Christ "rose again the third day according to the Scriptures:" what scripture? why this, "the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight;" and though the text notes the confidence which repenting Israel had in God's mercy towards them, yet it refers also to Christ, as if they should say, Our straits and miseries may be great, and we may lie in them a while, as did Christ, but he was raised the third day, and so shall we. Calvin saith, that God gave a famous and memorable example of Israel's mercy after their captivity by Christ's rising from the grave; and this may well be meant of Christ, as that scripture shows, Hos. xi. 1, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt:" who would have thought that this had reference to Christ, had not the Scriptures applied it to him, in Matt. ii. 14, 15, "And departed into Egypt: and was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son?" How darkly was Christ shadowed out in the Old Testament! as by Jonas in the whale's belly three days. Oh what cause have we who live in gospel-times, when Christ is manifested so clearly, to bless God! what dark and mystical intimations had they of Christ in those days, when this, and that of Jonas in the whale's belly, were some of the clearest!

When at any time God would comfort his people in distress, what does he do? he reveals a prophecy of the Messias to come; as in Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6; and Zech. ix. 9: and so here, God having smitten, wounded, and torn them, comes and heals them, promising them that they shall revive and live in his sight.

But here now Luther makes an objection, If these words had reference to Christ they should run thus, He shall live in his sight, not we; and he answers it himself, that it denotes the efficacy of his resurrection, not only for himself, but for many others.

1. "We shall live in his sight;" לפני before his face, that is, his favour shall be towards us for mercy. As the turning the face away shows anger, so the turning of God's face towards us signifies favour.

2. We shall see his face with comfort, and rejoice in the sight of it.

3. We shall eye his face in acts of obedience, and he will eye our duties with acceptance.

4. It implies security in his presence. As in the presence of a king his very presence is our security and safety; so, "we shall live in his sight," that is, we shall be safe in his presence. The observations from hence are,

Obs. 1. God's own people may not only be smitten and wounded by God, but may lie for dead in their own eyes, and in the eyes of all about them, for a time: see it in the case of Heman, Psal. lxxxviii. 10, 14, "Wilt thou show wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise thee? Lord, why eastest thou off my soul? why hidest thou thy face from me?" And in Ezek. xxxvii. 3, we read of dry bones which should be made to live; and Rev. xi., the witnesses shall be slain and lie dead in the streets, the beast shall overcome them; the generality of those that stand for Christ shall be slain by the beast, and overcome by his power.

The reason of this may be, because God can work about his glory by contrary means. When God fetches out his glory from the afflictions of his people, it costs him not so much nor so dear as when he brings it out of sin: now if God's glory be so dear to him, that he will suffer sin to be in the world, thereby to fetch his glory out of it, why should we be unwilling that God should suffer afflictions to be upon us, seeing by them he procures glory to himself? In the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee," Exod. xv. 7. How should God manifest his glorious power in raising them up, were they never brought low? In heaven God will so manifest his glory to us that we shall not need such dark shadows to give it prominence.

If this beso, take heed of drawing darker conclusions from God's dealings than they will bear, as to say, The Lord has forsaken us, and God will have mercy no more upon us; he has forgotten to be gracious, he has left his cause and turned his back upon his inheritance. We should labour to be well informed in the grounds upon which his cause stands and is maintained, and which may uphold us in the maintenance of it; for know that God may put thee to the trial, and if thou art not thoroughly grounded thou wilt apostatize.

Obs. 2. God leaves his people in that dead condition for a time; the first day they may look for help, and it may not come; and the second day he may let them lie, and that after their seeking of him. This people said, "Come, and let us return unto the Lord;" yet what do they add? "After two days he will revive us:" it must be some time first. God is a great God, and his creature must wait. There is much grace exercised in an afflicted condition, when the soul quietly submits to God, and patiently carries the Lord's leisure, let his dealing be never so hard towards it. God sometimes answers his people's prayers presently when they seek him, so that it may not only be said, in the evening, but, in the morning hast thou heard me; not only this day, but the next also. See 1 Kings xviii. 38, 44, where Elijah prays, and the Lord heard him presently; but he prays again, and then the Lord defers: in ver. 38, he prays for fire to come down to consume the sacrifice, and it did so; but in ver. 44, of the same chapter, he prays again for rain, and see in what a posture he prays; yet he obtained his petition with much difficulty, he sent his servant seven times, and at the seventh it was but a little cloud; at first God heard him presently, but he prays again, and then mercy comes slowly and with difficulty; yet God was not angry with Elijah. So Daniel prays, and was heard presently; but the people pray, and pray earnestly, yet they were not answered.

Oh, therefore, let us take heed of an impatient and froward spirit in trouble, of being weary of well-doing, and of growing careless in holy services, because an immediate answer comes not; this as much as any thing shows the rottenness of our spirits, and is as evident a sign of a hypocrite as any we have in Scripture.

Obs. 3. The time of God's reviving his people is neither long in God's nor in the saints' account. It is but "two days;" "the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live." "As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem," Isa. xxxi. 5. He has promised not to contend for ever: and in 1 Pet. i. 6, "Though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations;" in the original it is, If now, if need be; so that there is great need of afflictions before God sends them. So 2 Cor. iv. 17, afflictions are "for a moment," for a very little time. Faith lifts up the soul on Pisgah, and enabling it to realize the valley of Achor, the door of hope, as lying between it and mount Zion, creates patience in midst of the greatest sufferings. It is a sign of a distempered spirit to complain of the length of an affliction; a gracious heart desires more its sanctification than its removal; we might have been swallowed up in the gulf of eternal misery. "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the Desire of all nations shall come," Hag. ii. 6, 7; but Christ came not until five or six hundred years afterwards. Our impatience makes affliction seem long.

Obs. 4. Faith realizes God's reviving mercies in the saddest condition. When their help is gone, in the mount of man's extremity will God be seen. We should reason thus, Because God's people are in great extremity, it is a sign that God will arise and help them; and not despair. As before the morning light is the thickest darkness, so let us never be discouraged at the increase of afflictions, for they show the time then hastens on for deliverance. And this faith makes present and shows to the soul life in death, favour in frowns, love in strokes. Faith discerns a great difference between the strokes of God on the saints and upon the wicked: as Isa. xxvi. 14, compared with ver. 19, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise." When God strikes wicked men, their wounds forerun death here, and eternal death hereafter; when he smites them in their cause, in their names, or estates, it is to undo them. But now, mark the 19th verse, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise." Some think that these words denote the glorious security of the church, that though men and means fail, yet faith can see deliverance in the womb of an infinite wisdom, power, and faithfulness: faith revives other graces when seeming dead, and puts life into them, much more into our dead conditions. It is reported of the crystal, that it possesses such virtue, that its very touch quickens other stones, and imparts to them lustre and beauty. It is true of faith, that it removes present evils, and approximates distant good. Psal. xci. 7, "A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee;" this is a very strange speech, that a man may be in a place where a thousand shall fall by him, and ten thousand at his right hand, and yet he not be touched by the disease. By faith the soul enjoys this security. Psal. lx. 6, "God hath spoken in his holiness; I will rejoice, I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth;" the thing was not yet done, yet they rejoiced in it as present. Faith enables a dead and barren womb to conceive and bring forth, it raises up a dead son out of the ashes; Abraham bids his servants to stay at the bottom of the hill, and expect his coming; oh strong was his faith in this thing!

How unbecoming are our spirits, and how is our faith manifested to be weak and poor, when a mercy promised is within sight, ready to be fulfilled, and yet we are impatient and froward if it come not just as we desire; when we are full of such despairing conclusions against ourselves or the cause of God, saying, Alas, all is now gone, we are left desperate, God has forsaken his cause! O let us take heed of pleasing ourselves with such carnal arguments and objections, for they mightily provoke and dishonour God, and hinder much good which else we might enjoy.

But were I worthy, I could think that then I might entertain some hopes.

In this case, exercise faith upon Christ even in thine unworthiness; and though thou mayst die and not see the harvest, nor reap the fruit of thy prayers, yet know, the generations to come shall, and this may comfort thee. So Jacob's speech when he lay a dying, "Behold, I die; but God shall do much more for you." The cause may be trodden down for a while, and God may hide himself, but know, that he will keep with thee his covenant which he never yet broke; so long as Christ is thine and thou art his, God's covenanted faithfulness is also thine. What if those that stand for Christ and his cause be sometimes beaten, must they therefore give over? No, but venture still: and, if our sins hinder not, though we may lie dead to-day, and to-morrow, yet the third day we may live in his sight.

Obs. 5. Mercies after two days' death, are reviving mercies. "After two days will he revive us." Promises in times of afflictions are sweet indeed; oh, then, how much more deliverance! Such mercies are resurrection mercies, which God sends after killing afflictions. And such mercies has the Lord given us at this very day; the Lord has revived us when almost dead, therefore would we give God the glory, and render to him due and seasonable praise for such seasonable mercies. Let us observe these rules.

1. Look back to the former base unbelief of your hearts, and chide them, upbraid them with this now, O vile heart of mine! did not I begin to say, Alas, I am undone, all is lost, my hopes are now abortive? was not I sorry that ever I was so engaged as I am, were it to do again I would be better advised? did not I think the neutrals, those who "came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty," far better off than I, and wish myself in their condition? How has the Lord been dishonoured by me! what secret repinings and grudging thoughts have I had even against God himself, because of the various dispensations of his providence! Say now, O base, vile, unbelieving heart, how has the Lord confuted thee, and made thee to see thy shame and ignorance, in believing sense rather than faith!

2. Has God bestowed reviving mercies on you? then be willing to give God the glory of them, and resign them up to him on this ground, because they have been forfeited by your unbelief. An unbelieving heart forfeits all mercies before it has them: true, God gives many precious ones to sad, froward, discontented spirits; but you cannot receive them with the same comfort as others, because they are forfeited, and though God through his bounty suffers you to enjoy them, yet you are in fear continually lest God should exact his forfeiture. O believe your mercies in the promise through all the difficulties.

3. Remember the covenants which you made to God in the times of your trouble, and keep them. It is a provoking sin to break covenant with God, God complains of it against Israel: "When he slew them, then they sought him: and they returned and inquired early after God. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues: for their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant," Psal. lxxviii. 34, 36, 37. Oh how usual is it with men in any misery to covenant largely with God, and presently to forget what they have done! this is a sign of a false heart, therefore take heed of it. Lay more weight upon the covenants which you make, if ever you mean to give God real praise for any mercy.

4. Consider how much better it is to give God the glory of a mercy willingly, than force him to extort it from you in wrath: God is better pleased with active praise, than passive, for his mercies. Consider, glory he will have. O oblige him not then to force what is so due to him from you. If you give not God the glory of the mercies you possess, he in wrath may take them from you: and had not God given us this reviving mercy, it might have been our ease to have been forced to give God his glory in a passive manner.

5. Whatever God calls for now from you, he willing to give up to him freely. Whatsoever we would have gladly given for such a mercy in our misery, had God indented with us for it, let us be ready and willing to give him now the mercy is come; had we known our danger, and the miseries which would have flowed in upon us had not mercy prevented, and God said, What are you content to do, to suffer, to part with, that you may be delivered out of this danger, and possess the contrary mercy? Seeing then God has given us such a mercy without this indenting, make this an argument to give freely unto God that which he now requires. You have been, perhaps, in bodily fears, and danger of death by some sickness; now, if God had called for your estates, would you not have given them to him? Do that now which you would then have done.

6. Lay up against unbelief for time to come. Has God remembered us in our low estate? let us say with David, "We will trust in him so long as we live;" we will never determine, as formerly, either against ourselves or the cause of God; we will never more entertain hard thoughts of him, but are resolved to do what belongs to us as creatures, and leave the success of the business to God. Apply this any way, and it will be very useful. Has God helped thee in any soul-trouble? revived thee in the depths of sorrow, when he had hid himself from thee? lay up such passages of God toward thee against all the risings of unbelief; resolve upon this, that thy soul shall rely on him for help whatsoever becomes of thee: this is to give God the glory of reviving mercies. Thus, in Psal. xviii. 1, 2, David appropriates God to himself, and gathers from that strength and support. He was at this time in such great straits by reason of Saul's persecution, that he gave up all for lost; "I shall one day perish by the hands of Saul." "All men are liars," he exclaimed; the prophets of God, Gad and Nathan, are liars; they tell me that I shall be king, that I shall sway the sceptre in Israel, but I am more like to be killed and betrayed, surrounded as I am by deceitful and bloodthirsty men. Soon, however, he recalls his words, and confesses that he spake unadvisedly with his lips: "In my haste I said, All men are liars." And here in this 18th Psalm, where he praises God for that mercy which formerly he would not believe, he addresses him by eight titles, all of them calculated to strengthen his faith: "My rock, my fortress, my deliverer; my God, my strength in whom I will trust; my buckler, the horn of my salvation, my high tower:" from all these titles of God, as his God, he derives encouragement and support. In all the Scripture I know not so short a text so full of matter for the strengthening of faith as this is; and it is faith's special work to realize God as ours in all these relations. Oh how beautiful would our praises for reviving mercies show, could we but exercise our faith thus upon all these titles of God as our God!

Obs. 6. The real sight of deliverance strongly inclines the soul to turn to God. The people made this use of approaching mercy: What! will God after two days deliver and revive us? Come then, and let us return unto him; let us not any longer stand out, but come in, that he may revive us and raise us up. When the soul sees mercy coming, it beholds God outbidding all other temptations, and overpowering all difficulties; and happy are they who by faith can discern it afar off, and are thereby stirred up to turn to God. When God sends such thoughts as these into the soul and settles them on the mind, I am now in a very good condition, well, and in health for the present, but where may I be within two days? I enjoy peace, and have every thing that heart can desire, both for necessity and delight, but within a short time where may I and these be? these are thoughts calculated to strike awe into the soul of the sinner. But, on the contrary, to believers very comfortable and full of sweetness: I am in great and extreme misery, but after two days it will pass away, then, oh where shall I be? in heaven, in joy and blessedness, for evermore at rest with my Saviour! This made Paul overlook all his afflictions; 2 Cor. iv. 17, it is true I am under great afflictions, but they are but light, and but for a moment; and what shall I have then? An eternal weight of glory. Therefore Christians should not be always poring over their afflictions, but look up to mercy, and review their comforts as well as their discouragements; consider, that within two days God will raise us up again, and this will mightily raise our spirits and quell the tumults in our hearts. As we should be sensible of God's hand to be humbled for our sins which have caused him to afflict us, yet should we take care that we do not destroy ourselves by our fears.

Obs. 7. The apprehension of the death and resurrection of Christ is a special help to faith in affliction. Many things may aid, but the consideration of Christ's resurrection most of all: when the soul shall exercise faith thus; I am thus and thus afflicted and in misery, so was Christ, and much more: though he were the Son of God, the first begotten of the Father, and so blessed for ever; yet he was delivered up into his enemies' hands, scorned, persecuted, spat upon, nay, crucified, and put to a shameful death. My condition for the present is not so, but if it should be so it is no more than Christ's was; in this his great sorrow all his friends forsook him, a thing which much aggravates their misery who are in straits; and doubts and fears oppressed his followers, insomuch that the two disciples which went to Emmaus said, "But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel." To what a low condition did God thus bring Christ! and yet this was the greatest work that ever was done, and the most glorious to God. Was the church ever in a lower condition than Christ himself was? yet Christ was raised and delivered out of all; yea, this was a special end of his deep abasement, to be a comfort and a pattern to his churches in like trials; and seeing this is held forth to us in a clearer way than it was to the Jews under the law, we should make more use of it than they did. Was Christ so low that the wrath of God was upon him for satisfaction even to death? this surely was a deep and horrible pit. And is there any hope that ever he should be raised from it? Yea, then was God's time to show his power, and to declare him to be his Son. And now God thus speaks to his people in all their straits: Did my power raise my Son in such a low estate? it is able also to raise you. As the apostle argues in 1 Cor. xv., If Christ be not risen, the dead are not raised, &c.; so from thence I also infer, that the church must rise because Christ is risen. If the church does not rise, Christ is not risen; and if so, "then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain:" therefore raise up your saddened spirits on this ground, Christ is risen, and I also shall rise with him. It was wont to be the salutation of the Christians in ancient times, Christus resurrexit, Christ is risen: so the saints, though brought very low, may conclude that yet that power which raised the Head, will, in his time, raise the body and make it glorious with himself.

"And we shall live in his sight." As I-rael was re-pening, so it was believing Israel also; and as their believing furthered their repentance, so their repentance furthered their faith; they were confident that they should live in his sight. Hence,

Obs. 8. When God grants mercies, he would have his people to be of lively spirits. The meaning of the Spirit in this text is, that however the saints may seem as dead when the wicked prevail over them, yet, when God gives rest and life, they shall be lively and full of spirit: God loves not to see his people sad and dejected, when, in reality, they have cause for the greatest joy.

Obs. 9. When God is reconciled to a people, his face is towards them. He looks then upon them and loves them: Rev. xxii. 4, "And they shall see his face." God deals not with us as David did with his son, 2 Sam. xiv. 24, "And the king said, Let him turn to his own house, and let him not see my face." But if God be once reconciled, all the frowns in his face are turned into smiles, he is all lovely towards his saints.

Now how incongruous a thing is it, that when God smiles we should lower! And as God smiles when we humble ourselves, so should we look cheerfully on our children and servants on their submission.

Obs. 10. God's people account their life to be in God's favour. Hypocrites desire only the enjoyment of mercies, and if they obtain that they are contented, though they enjoy not the presence of God at all in them: but with the saints it is otherwise; although they have precious mercies, and yet God not present in them, they content not them; if they have health and not God's presence in it, if they have peace and not their peace with God, it satisfies not them; this is their cry, Lord, "let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely," Cant. ii. 14.

Obs. 11. The Lord's mercies to his people are settled mercies. He not only gives them the prospect, but the real possession, of mercy. We are revived and raised. Yea, but we may die again. No, "we shall live in his sight," we shall live before him. Mercies to the saints are not the fruit of God's patience, for then they would not be settled mercies; but they come from the covenant of grace, and so are called, "the sure mercies of David," Isa. lv. 3.

Obs. 12. Faith raises the soul high. "He will revive us," and "he will raise us up." Is that all? No, but "we shall live in his sight." It is a proof of a very carnal heart, to be contented with low mercies, to be put off with any thing: it pleases God well, when his people will not be put off with small mercies. Though it is true, we must be thankful for the least mercy, and content with it in opposition to murmuring, yet we must not rest there withal satisfied; but if thy faith be true, it will expect more; and if it hath got a promise from God, it will improve it to the utmost extent that the promise will bear; and when it hath one promise fulfilled, it will look out for the answering of another. We do not approve of such a craving disposition in a beggar, but God is much delighted with it in his people.

Obs. 13. The eye of God on his people is their comfort. The saints have much comfort from God's eye; whereas it is the greatest terror to the hypocrites, that God sees them, that they are continually in his sight; "If one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death," Job xxiv. 17. It is no wonder that they would fain hide themselves from his presence, "for the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers: but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil," 1 Pet. iii. 12. The saints account it their privilege that God sees them; and it is a very good sign of sincerity, when the soul can look up to the clear beams of the Sun of righteousness without fear or apprehension; as the eagle, when she would prove her young, holds them up in the sight of the sun, to try if they can endure with steady, undazzled gaze its effulgent brightness.

Obs. 14. It is the great care of the saints to walk as in God's sight. Psal. xvi. 8, 9, "I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved;" I will not fear, I have set him before me; "therefore my heart is glad, my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope." This text is spoken chiefly of Christ; and if Christ must be kept from falling by setting the Lord always before him, much more must we. Not that he was in danger of falling as we are, but this is to be understood as Heb. v. 8, which speaks of obedience learned by sufferings; looking at God helped him to obey, and to stand in obeying; as the apostle saith, 2 Cor. ii. 17, What we speak, it is as in the sight of God in Christ; that is, What we say, it is in the power and efficacy of Christ. But how comes this to pass, that they thus preach? why as in the sight of God? We thus preach, his power enables.

Obs. 15. The eye of God upon his people is their safety and security. "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous," 1 Pet. iii. 12. As a child thinks itself safe if it be in the parent's presence, so the saints should look upon themselves as very secure in the sight of God. A philosopher in danger of shipwreck in a starry night, could say, Surely I shall not perish, there are so many eyes of Providence over me. Could a philosopher speak thus, and may not a Christian say much more, that he shall not perish, seeing God's providential eye is over him?

Ver. 3. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth.

This scripture is very full, and pregnant with sweetness, and the interpretation unattended with difficulty.

"Then shall we know, if we follow on to know." "If" is not in the original, which runs thus, וְנִרְמָה וְנִרְמָה וְנִרְמָה And we shall know, and we shall follow on to know. The word signifies to follow one as eagerly as a man which persecutes another, and persecutes him as Paul did the saints, with full purpose of mind: when men thus follow on to know, God will reveal himself more. Luther applies these words to Christ, and the gospel revelation of him, setting men's minds on fire by the truth so clearly discovered, and inflaming them with such love to it that they follow on to know it. But although these words have reference to Christ, yet, primarily, they are to be understood of God's delivering his people out of captivity. Then they shall know. What shall they know? That they shall live in his sight. When God delivers them, then they shall know,

1. God's faithfulness in his covenant made to our fathers: we know very little of it now, but the time is coming when we shall know it clearly.

2. The works of God's wisdom, all working for his people's good in their lustre and beauty.

3. The excellency of God's power, how it overrules all things, and how it is exerted for the saints' good.

4. The mercy of God acting every way for their best advantage: we are now in great misery, and our troubles increase, and we cannot see how mercy is working for good; but then we shall know.

5. The mind of God: we are now in much darkness, not only with respect to outward troubles, but to soul-trials; we know very little of God now at the best, but then we shall know him clearly.

6. The vanity of all worldly pomp and glory, and the folly of all carnal confidence: men are now ready to call the proud happy, and bless the workers of iniquity, and run to king Jareb; but then we shall know that God is able to deliver his people out of all straits.

7. That it is not in vain for the people of God to seek him, even then, when all human helps and hopes fail; then they shall know that there is a power and efficacy in prayer, as God's ordinance, to help them in difficulties.

8. The meaning of many prophecies which are now very dark and obscure, and yet contain much sweetness for the churches of God: and whether this will be worth knowing, let discerning men judge.

9. The glorious purposes and decrees which God has had from all eternity for our good: God has glorious purposes, although we for the present know them not, but we shall know them; there is a time that all these things, and much more than these, shall be revealed.

"We shall know, if we follow on to know the Lord." "If" is not in the original, but put in to fill up the sense; but if we take the words literally, "we shall know, if we follow on," then the sense runs thus, Does God reveal himself to his people? and do his people lay hold of the opportunity? if so, they shall know more. But if you take the words without the "if," thus, You know, and follow on to know; the meaning is, That when God begins to show mercy he will go on to show mercy; so that these words are a motive to turn to God, or an expression of their confidence in God. God was now in the dark, his presence clouded towards them, and the enemies scoffed and mocked at them, saying, "Where is now your God?" The people answer, We shall know our God again, and he will discover himself to our comfort, but to your shame. The observations are,

Obs. 1. True penitents turn to God that they may know God. As there must be some knowledge before turning to God, so we turn to God that we may know him more; and the desire of knowing him should not be so much to deliver from hell, as to be fitted thereby to do him more and better service. If the hypocrite have but so much service and knowledge as to manage thereby to attain his own ends, he is satisfied; but a gracious heart dares not rest in such content.

Obs. 2. No man can turn to God, but as God's face is towards him. We cannot turn to God except God turn first to us: "When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?" Job xxxiv. 29.

Obs. 3. When God comes to his people in mercy, he reveals to them much of himself; and according to the degrees of his coming to them, are the manifestations of himself unto them, either more or less; he gives them something in this life, an earnest at the beginning, and at death the full payment, the perfect enjoyment of all promised good. Faith can see a glory in God, even in the darkest seasons; but in the times of light, then it can see abundance of mercy.

Therefore it is Christian wisdom to take notice of the mercies we enjoy, else we cannot glorify God's name. Oh how much of the faithfulness, power, wisdom, goodness, and mercy of God in turning the counsels, plots, and devices of the wicked to our good, we might have known, had we but been diligent observers of his providence! Those who see not the glory of God now shining brightly in the world, have very little light in themselves, but must needs be very dark, or strangely negligent in the observation of the good things they enjoy from God. Of John, who saw the future blessed estate of the church, the temple of God, the ark of the testament was kept in the holy of holies, Rev. xi. 19, when none of the people could see it, it is said that he should prophesy again, Rev. x. 11; not that he should arise again and prophesy, but the time is coming that the Revelation shall be as clearly understood as if John had written a new revelation. Just so in Isa. xxx. 26, a scripture parallel to the text, the Lord promises, when he binds the breach of the people, and heals the stroke of their wound, "the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun;" knowledge shall wonderfully increase, there shall be very glorious manifestations of God to his people. And that passage in Isaiah shows plainly that our present text refers to that time in which God will exalt his church, and make it glorious in the eyes of all beholders.

Obs. 4. The knowledge of God is a very comfortable thing to the saints. They speak here triumphantly, "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know;" any thing of God makes gracious hearts to spring with joy and gladness. It is the happiness of the saints in heaven to know God, and to have the sight of God: and so it is here; "This is eternal life, to know thee, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent;" not only to know him, but to know him as he appears for his church's deliverance. How many are now in heaven blessing God that ever their eyes beheld these days! Nay, certainly, should God but let our forefathers out of their graves to see what a turn things here have taken, and how their prayers have been answered, they would be as men astonished. If it be so comfortable to see and know God in this life, what will it be in heaven, where nothing shall intervene to darken this sight of God!

Obs. 5. The more men turn to God, the more they shall know of him; yea, this we may be sure of, whatever else we here enjoy. "All this evil is come upon us; yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth," Dan. ix. 13: if we understand thy truth and turn from our iniquities, we shall know more of the truth. "The pure in heart shall see God," Matt. v. 8. Oh the sweet light which purified minds enjoy! to these God reveals his secrets, and acquaints them with the mystery of his covenant, Psal. xxv. 14. The great rabbies of the world are ignorant of these things, they are mysteries unto them; and this is the reason of it, because they turn not unto God, neither labour to know God.

Obs. 6. Those that know something of God desire to know more. He that is learned covets after more knowledge. None, truly, but the ignorant, are enemies to learning; those that never knew the worth of it, are they that cry it down; therefore those who are contented with little, nay, and think their little sometimes too much, are of poor, mean, and base spirits, far from following on to know the Lord.

Obs. 7. A gracious heart puts forth strong endeavours in the use of means to increase in the knowledge of God. He will let no time escape, neglect no opportunity, in which knowledge may be increased, Dan. ix. 13. This was Solomon's prayer, 1 Kings iii. 9, "Give, therefore, thy servant an understanding heart;" in the Hebrew it is, שׂוּעָ לֵב Give thy servant a hearing heart. Though God had discovered himself wonderfully, yet he desires that God would further manifest himself to him. Therefore they are very foolish that think they know enough of God, and are contented with what they know; it is a great blessing of God to have a hearing ear and an understanding heart. Therefore what a fond opinion is it, and what a sluggish spirit does it manifest, to be satisfied with the knowledge of former times! What! say they, shall we be wiser than our forefathers? We are, indeed, to bless God for the knowledge of our forefathers, and say, as Master Greenham did, "I bless God for what our forefathers knew;" but also add with him, "I bless God also that he has kept back some of his counsels to communicate to this generation." It is an argument of a poor spirit to rest satisfied with small measures of knowledge; the light three or four hundred years ago was dim, and in these days our light is poor and weak to that which shall be revealed, especially with respect to the worship and order of God's house. Therefore had not we need to "follow on to know the Lord?" Therefore God forbid that any should scorn at the new lights which God discovers, but rather let us be humbled for our ignorance, and now begin to follow on earnestly and perseveringly to know the Lord. No new truth indeed in respect of the word is revealed, but with regard to the manifestation of them to us they may be said to be new.

Obs. 8. It is a blessed thing to take notice of God's revealing himself. Oh how happy a thing had it been for many of us, if, when God first began to stir our hearts, we had followed on to know the Lord! How sad it is for many to look back to former days! what glorious and sweet manifestations had they then of God's love! but, through worldly cares and sluggishness of spirit, all is lost: they are now in the dark, and cannot speak of God to edification: whereas many who are younger, and have kept their communion with God, know more of God, and are able to speak more sweetly of his goodness, than they. And you who thus know God in your youth, bless him that he has brought you to this light, and make much of it; for as Christ said to Nathanael, John i. 50, "Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these;" so do you bless God for what you do know, and God will reveal more.

Obs. 9. Those who "follow on to know the Lord," shall know more of him. "The diligent hand maketh rich." It matters not though thy parts be weak, thy abilities mean, thy failings many, if Christ be thy Teacher it matters not, thy weaknesses shall not hinder his instructions; Christ teaches the weak as well as the strong, nay, accounts it his glory to teach such; nay, the Father himself is not ashamed to instruct them. Christ gives thanks to his Father, that he has revealed these things to babes and sucklings. Christ is a meek, gentle, lowly Teacher, very mild and loving, he will neither upbraid his followers with their weakness, nor discourage them in their dulness. Christ speaks to poor, weak, burdened sinners; "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden;" who then will be discouraged? No, to thy soul he will give wisdom liberally, and infuse into thee the principles of saving knowledge. Col. i. 10, "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God." Great are the treasures of knowledge which a diligent Christian may obtain. "Continue," or draw out, "thy loving-kindness unto them that know thee," Psal. xxxvi. 10. Thou hast some glimmering knowledge of God, some spark of Divine light; bless God for it, and follow on perseveringly to know the Lord, and then thou shalt know more. It is a heavy curse that is denounced on those women in Timothy, that are "ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth," 2 Tim. iii. 7.

But many a poor soul may here object, If this be so, I fear it is my condition, that the means aggravate the sins that I commit, and leave me inexcusable.

To answer thee, If thou art not one who follows divers lusts, and make them thy practice, thou art not among those who are "ever learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." If thou followest on to know God, God will follow thee on with mercy.

Obs. 10. One mercy makes way for another; a less prepares for a greater. God beholds all things at once with one view of his providential eye, and it is his happiness so to do; but the saints cannot do this, they must know a little now, and more at another time. And do not our times make good this text? The Lord will grant one deliverance now, and another reviving the next day, and all to usher in a greater. The Lord first smote us, and within two days did he revive us, and the third day we lived in his sight; and since that deliverance we have followed on to know the Lord, and God has revealed himself more in his power, wisdom, and faithfulness; and, if it be not our fault, we may know more of his workings. Oh that we had hearts to follow on the Lord in repenting, believing, and turning to him! he would follow us with mercies, and all the good that we can wish for, one after another. God makes wicked men to know more wrath, and the drops of his anger here are but the beginning of the deluge of miseries which are their portion; they sink, and sink, and their sinking must be to all eternity. Oh the difference which there is between God's dealing with the saints and with the wicked! though the saints may be under a cloud for the present, yet they shall know the Lord, the sun will appear again; the Lord will follow on his work, though we neglect ours, and glorious shall be the issue. Were it not a glorious thing, if a man had lived from the beginning to this day, and might live to the end of the world, to see what God did in former times, what God doth now, and what he will do to the end of the world for his poor churches? The saints shall live to all eternity to see these glorious things. God did glorious things in the first six thousand years, and surely the next six thousand shall be still more glorious, but in eternity God will do most of all: then the saints of God, those which "follow on to know the Lord," shall be put into the real possession of all those glorious things which God has been doing from all eternity.

"His going forth is prepared as the morning." Jerome conceived these words to be meant of Christ; he shall come as the morning, being called the "Sun of righteousness," and "the Morning-star;" and he conceives that it may have reference to the title of the 22nd Psalm, "A Psalm of David, to the chief Musician upon Ajeleth Shahar;" that is, the morning hind; to wit, Christ, who was sent forth as the morning hind, and hunted in his infancy and in his life, as the hind is pursued by the hounds.

But if we take the words simply as they lie before us, they appear an expression of Israel's confidence in God after a night of trouble. The word בכור "prepared," signifies also decreed, it is decreed upon as the morning and the evening, as the day follows the night by a decree. Children, when they see the sun going down, will often cry, because they think he will never rise again; so the wicked in their straits cry out, We are undone, this darkness will never be over: yea, and such is the baseness of our unbelieving hearts, we think when the clouds of sorrow begin to arise, and blackness to cover the sun of our prosperity, mercy will never break through, light will no more appear. But more particularly,

Obs. 11. Times of afflictions are night times. This is implied here: we may have a long time of sorrow and misery, a dark tempest may overtake us, yet know, that a morning will come. They are called night times for three reasons.

1. Because of their uncomfortableness. Darkness is very terrible. Drexelius tells us of a young man, very fearful of darkness, who, on God striking him with a dangerous sickness, insomuch that he could not sleep, tumbling up and down in his bed, uttered these words, If this darkness be so terrible, what is eternal darkness! and this proved the means of his conversion. Well, therefore, may affliction times be called night times, times of darkness.

2. They are times that often put an end both to public and private service. The night is the time in which the brute creatures, which in the day time keep close, come forth for their prey. Therefore the apostle's exhortation is seasonable, Let us work while it is called to-day, before the night cometh, when no man can work.

3. Night times are times of danger. Many of our brethren can testify to this in these times. When is the time that wicked men prey upon the saints, and the wild beasts go out to devour, but in the dark? so, when do men meditate upon terror and create fears to themselves, but in the night of their afflictions and sorrows?

Obs. 12. The time of deliverance is the morning, the morning after the sad and dark night. As light is comfortable in the morning after a sad, dark, and stormy night; so is deliverance after trouble. The morning is very desirable, as appears, Psal. cxxx. 6, "My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning: I say, more than they that watch for the morning." God's mercies after afflictions are very sweet, as the light approaching in the morning is to the labouring man going forth to his work. When God has work for men to do, he expects that they should go forth to it, and show themselves in it. As the sun when it rises begins to show itself in its brightness and glory, so ought every Christian to shine in the work and service of God after deliverance. In a sickness, or when some strait is upon thee, thou art hindered in God's service, and in thy work; well, then, when God bestows on thee the morning of a deliverance, go forth and manifest thy zeal for him, be not ashamed of his cause in the bright noon-day of mercy.

Obs. 13. The church has no afflictions unfollowed by a morning. The morning will come, either to churches in special, or persons in particular; and we hope this time is coming to us; therefore let dominion be given to the Lord in the morning; yea, and let dominion be given to the righteous in the morning, and this seems to be the meaning of Rev. ii. 26, 28, "To him that overcometh, will I give the morning-star." There may be great contentions, grievous miseries, in this night of afflictions; but be encouraged, to him that overcometh will I give this morning-star of comfort and deliverance.

Obs. 14. It is God's presence which constitutes the saints' morning. As the stars may impart some light, and yet the brightness of all combined cannot form the light of day, but when the sun appears there is day forthwith; so God may make some comfort arise to a soul from secondary and inferior means, but it is he himself alone who, by the shining of his face, and the smiles of his countenance, causes morning.

Obs. 15. God's mercies to his people are prepared and decreed. They are set and determined, "Thy going forth is prepared as the morning;" the word I showed you in the original signifies decreed. Jer. xxxiii. 20, "Thus saith the Lord; If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant." Here we have both the text and the note from it; as is the covenant of God's decree with day and night, morning and evening, called a covenant because it is sure and certain, so also is the covenant which God has made to Christ and to his church firm and sure; and it is a ground of strong consolation to the saints to consider, that mercies which they want are set and decreed mercies, and therefore they may wait for them with patience.

Obs. 16. The saints in the night of their affliction can comfort themselves in this, that the morning is coming. It is night yet, but the morning will come, it is approaching: the assurance that the morning is dawning upholds the saints' spirits in the night of their sorrows. The tempest-tossed mariner in the gloom of night, the weary traveller in his dark and lonesome journey, comfort themselves with this, that the morning light is coming. It is far better to be in darkness, and expect the dawn, than to be in the light, and to know or fear that darkness is coming, and light will never return more.

Obs. 17. The saints' night is darkest a little before their deliverance; as a little before the dawning of the day the darkness is most dense and terrible. So it was in Egypt a little before Israel's deliverance, and their return out of captivity. And this should mightily encourage us, in these times, not to be disheartened though our miseries should increase, for the darker and the bigger the cloud is, it will the sooner break; therefore wait with patience.

Obs. 18. God's mode of deliverance is gradual. As the day breaks by degrees, so the saints shine gradually in their lives, answerable to the light which God imparts. We would have instantaneous deliverance; light, and perfect noon-day forthwith; but this is not God's mode of dealing with his people. A child knows not that it is day till it be very light indeed; but the wise can discern the first streaks in the horizon. Oh that we were so wise to discern God's dealings in the workings of providence towards us!

"And he shall come unto us as the rain." God so glories in this part of his creation, that he wonders when men do not fear him who is the giver of rain: "Neither say they in their heart, Let us fear the Lord our God, that giveth rain," Jer. v. 24; there is so much of my glory in this very one creature, that men's hearts must be very hard that will not praise me for it. And God is elsewhere styled, "the Father of rain." The mention of it here refers to that country in which the prophet spake; to Canaan, where they had rain, not so frequently as we have, but twice a year especially, viz. at seed-time, to soften the ground, and a little before harvest, to fill up the corn in the ear. The apostle James seems to allude to this, chap. v. 7, "The husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain;" so should we, for God's time of delivering his people, his interpositions shall be as seasonable as the former and latter rain. The observations from these words are,

Obs. 19. What the rain is to the corn, God's blessing is to his people. We depend as much upon God for blessing and mercy, as the seed upon the rain for growth and increase; without the rain the corn will be but as "the parched places in the wilderness," which is the curse branded upon the wicked, Jer. xvii. 5, 6. Hence we may see what poor creatures we are, depending upon such a thing as the rain is in itself, and learn from that to consider how entirely we depend on the infinite God for all the blessings we enjoy.

Obs. 20. The church should increase under the rain of God's blessing. As the earth is not unthankful for the rain, but sends forth corn, grass, and flowers; so should we always, after the receiving of mercies, return unto God in duties. We would think it strange if the earth, after all the cost man has bestowed upon it, and after the sweet and seasonable showers of rain, should be barren and fruitless. O man, condemn thyself; the word is compared to rain; and how many times have the sweet showers and droppings of the word lighted upon thee, and yet thou hast remained barren and unfruitful! Dent. xxxii. 2.

Obs. 21. God's mercies to his people are both seasonable and suitable: "as the latter and former rain unto the earth." The Lord comes to wicked men in a way of general providence; but to the saints as rain in seed-time and harvest, with much fulness. How should this teach us our duty to wait with patience upon God, as the husbandman for the appointed weeks of harvest! James v. 7. If mercies always came when we would have them, they would prove judgments to us; that which in itself is a mercy, coming untimely, proves an affliction; God sent his people Israel a king, but he proved a heavy judgment to them. It is God's mercy unto you to defer his gifts till the full time. We exclaim, Our troubles are great, and continue long; we had thought to have seen a period to these times, our wars at an end, and peace settled in our kingdom; and now we see, if they had indeed ended when we desired, what a misfortune it would have been to us. How many that observe God's dealings can say, that if such a mercy had come when they wished for it, it had ruined them! therefore God's time is the best time. Hence we find that the saints have often blessed God when he has crossed them in their desires, and has denied them the thing which they so importunately asked. The Lord has sent us the former rain seasonably, at the beginning of the summer, to prepare the earth for fruit; but now there are scorching heats in the kingdom, heats of displeasure in the country, in the city, nay, almost in every family. Let us then now with patience wait, and the latter rain in its season will assuredly come.

Is God so reasonable in his mercies towards us? Let us be reasonable and suitable in our duty; let us bring forth fruit unto God in due season, as the godly man in the 1st Psalm is said to do; for in this consists the excellency of service. Therefore it is no other but a temptation of Satan, that, when men are called to pursue their necessary avocations, then stirs them up to prayer or hearing: these are not the motions of the Spirit, for they are reasonable; for God never puts the soul upon extremes, the performing of two contrary duties at one and the same time. It is an excellent sign of a gracious heart, to account a season for service, a mercy; and the lack of opportunity, a misery. Certainly it is a great judgment of God upon a man, to be unserviceable in a season of service. Jude, ver. 12, describing the corruptions of the gospel by life and doctrine, in his time, saith, they were "trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots;" trees corrupt even in the time of autumn, when their fruit should come in abundantly. Thus it is with many men, when God expects the most fruit from them, they show themselves most corrupt and vile. These mightily provoke God. And how many such have we amongst us at this day, who, when God calls them to service, manifest the rottenness which is in their spirits! Many when they are in a poor condition think, Oh had I such a man's estate, what a deal of good would I do with it! had I such parts and abilities as some have, and as much time, and as many opportunities afforded me, how would I lay them out for God! O foolish hearts, who, when they can do nothing, would do most, and when they may do most, do nothing at all.

Obs. 22. God's mercies to his people are varied according to their necessities. "The latter and the former rain." Toward the seed-time they wanted rain, and God sends it them. Now, as God may call us to a variety of services, according to the variety of mercies, let not us content ourselves in that we have done something, employed our heads, or hands, or purses; but willingly devote every power and adopt every expedient to subserve his cause. God has employed thee this day in one service, he has another for thee to do the next; be willing and ready to be set on work, and bless God that he deigns to employ thee in his service.

Obs. 23. When God has begun in mercy with his people, he will go on. If God should give only the former rain, the seed would not fructify and increase without the latter rain: faith will believe that God will not lose the glory of former mercies, for want of succeeding ones: faith believes that God will never begin a work, and leave it incomplete. Let not us then begin to obey God, and then leave off and lose all that we have done; let us consider that the rows of God are upon us, the many prayers we have put up, and let us not now lose the return of them. How many in the days of their youth followed on to know God, and found the sweetness of the word to be as the former and the latter rain unto them! Do not now lose all which you got in your youth, by denying him service in your age.

Obs. 24. God's mercies to his people procure much good. They are not empty shells, there is in them all they profess to contain, all God promises to give.

Obs. 25. The deliverances of God's people come from heaven. They spring not out of the earth; if ever God's people are delivered, there must be a Divine, Almighty power put forth, else it will never be a deliverance in mercy.

Obs. 26. God's people's deliverances cannot be hindered. Why? Because they come from above. They are as the light of the sun, and as the rain that comes upon the earth: who can hinder the sun from shining, the rain from falling? who can interrupt night and day? so, who can hinder the rain of mercy from falling on a people prepared for it?

Obs. 27. We should make a spiritual use of God's works in his creatures. We see after the coldest winter there comes a summer, after a drought great rain: let not us, in the times of cold and dark afflictions sent by God, conclude that mercy is quite gone, that God has shut up his loving-kindness in forgetfulness; no, but let us rest assured that there will be a return of mercy which shall revive us.

Ver. 4. O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? for your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away.

Luther interprets these words as a further expression of mercy to this people Israel, and not in the light of a reproof; as if the Lord had said to them, O Israel, my people, I have been very good and gracious to you in the land of Egypt, delivered you from the tyranny and oppression you were under there, and I have been with you in the wilderness, and I have brought you into the land of Canaan; but what are these? all temporal mercies; I have greater than these to bestow upon you in gospel times. But to this interpretation this objection will arise:

What shall we understand by the next words, "your goodness is as a morning cloud?" how can this be said? Luther to this answers thus, "Your goodness;" that is, the goodness of God, which is yours by covenant, and by purchase procured for you; this mercy of God shall refresh your parched souls, as the morning cloud does the earth after a long drought.

But the words "goeth away," and their goodness being but "as a morning cloud," taken together, the sense leads us to interpret it as a breaking off from the discourse about the promise of mercy, to a convincing of Ephraim and Judah of formality in their attempts at reformation; they all passed off, as the morning cloud which vanishes away, and as the early dew that comes to nothing.

Jerome thinks that it is God's mercies towards them which thus pass away; he would not leave them quite without hope, they should have some mercy, but it should not abide nor stay with them. But the genuine sense of the words, I conceive to be, an upbraiding of the formality that generally prevailed in their pursuit of reformation; therefore, "O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee?" As if the Lord should say, You put me to a stand, you even nonplus me in this thing; what, therefore, shall I do unto thee?

Here in general we may observe the change of the prophet's voice: in the beginning of the chapter it is all mercy, and their repentance sweetly join in with the mercy promised them; but now he begins to upbraid them for their hypocrisy, incorrigibleness, and inconsistency in the ways of God: a very good pattern for ministers who have to deal with varieties of people.

“O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee?” To open these words more particularly: the expression “what shall I do unto thee?” implies either compassion or expostulation.

I. Compassion; as if he should say, O Ephraim, it is in my heart to do thee good, but nothing will work upon thee, therefore, “O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee?” Like that expression in Isa. v. 4, “What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it?” were there any other further course to be taken, any thing else to do, I would do it? Now from this sense of God’s compassionating them, we may,

Obs. 1. That God grieves not willingly the children of men; he is even forced to it: at the very time they are grieved by afflictions, God is troubled for their miseries. Can any tell me, men or angels, nay, I appeal to yourselves, can you tell me what I should do more to you than I have done? If you can, I would do it. God expostulates with them; he comes not suddenly upon them, punishment is the last measure he adopts with his people.

And so it should be with us to those under us, as our children or servants; all means of prevailing must be tried before correction; exhort, advise, reprove, and pray for them: have you first taken this course? else you can have little comfort in correcting them. This is God’s way, though you perhaps see it not. He here meets an objection which repining Israel might seem to make: We are believers, to us the promises belong; why might not the Lord bring mercy to us without using such means as smiting, wounding, killing, and parching? No, saith God, I could not otherwise bring about mine own ends. Oh, therefore, let us check such thoughts. God brings us low by afflictions; he could do it by mercies, but then the end which he aims at would not be so fully accomplished.

Obs. 2. We should not think much to lose our pains with others. God has taken pains and been at cost with this people, and he has lost all; and God seems here to mourn over it: I have used this admonition, and that counsel, yet still you continue hypocritical; “O what shall I do unto thee?” yet God does not leave them or grow weary of his pains, he persists still in the means likely to do them good. In this should the saints imitate God: if this course prevail not, try a second; if it succeed not, adopt a third, perhaps that may, and success will amply repay all the pains. And thus much for the words in the sense of compassion: but now,

II. Expostulation, to humble them, or to convince them of their sin. Hence,

Obs. 3. It is a special means to humble men, to lead them to consider what measures have been adopted for their good. Would we be seriously affected with sin, and humbled for sin? then let us go alone and call our souls to account, whether means have not been used sufficient to do us good: consider what means they have been, judgments, national, domestic, and personal; mercies, reproofs out of the word, admonitions from friends, terrors and checks of conscience: when they have thus passed in review before you, charge conscience to speak to thee the truth, and when it doth, give it leave to upbraid thee thus; What! so unprofitable, so stout and stubborn, so froward and impatient, so unthankful and so unbelieving, notwithstanding all this? This would be a means singularly calculated to show the soul its real condition. But, alas! most men put off and shun such a course as this; the devil knows its efficacy, and he strives mightily to lead the soul off from it to such excuses as these, Had I the means others have, I should be more fruitful: I was reprov’d, but it was done too openly; had it been in private and with more love, by such a one and in such a place, it would have done more good. Infinite are the false pretences of an ungodly heart, and the cunning devices of Satan’s subtlety in the soul; but when the Lord comes truly to humble the soul, that soul will charge itself home thoroughly for its sins, in all their circumstances and all their aggravations.

Obs. 4. Such is the perverseness of men’s hearts, that God many times seems to be in a strait what to do with them. “What shall I do unto thee?” God was here even at a stand, he was fain to consult with himself about them. See in other scriptures how God expresses this; Exod. xxxiii. 5, “Therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee:” and Dent. xxxii. 5, “They have corrupted themselves, their spot is not the spot of his children: they are a perverse and a crooked generation.” The words in the original refer to the manner of שׁוֹמְרֵי תוֹרָה wrestlers, who wave up and down, that if the one thinks to have the other here, he is winded the other way: so this people eluded God’s dealings. Therefore, Acts ii. 40, we are commanded to “save ourselves from this untoward generation,” σκολιάς, crooked or perverse, so that none can do them good. God’s ministers are often put to a stand with such, like those in Christ’s time, whom neither John nor Christ himself could please; when John came, they exclaimed against his rigour and harshness; and when Christ came, mild and gentle, of him they said, he was “a wine-bibber, and a friend of publicans and sinners.”

But it may be objected, God knew not what to do; how is this? could not God have put forth his almighty power and turned their hearts, and that immediately? how then is it said, God knew not what to do?

To this I answer, that God was not bound to do this, for God had used all means to prevail with Ephraim and Judah, which the most loving and compassionate friend could have employed. Suppose a man were in such a condition, that, for his cure, all the doctors of physic in the country where he lived were gathered together, and consulted, but their prescriptions availed nothing; would not this set forth in aggravated colours the danger of the disease, and the difficulty of the cure? All this is in God, and much more, and it is put forth for the good of souls; I have put forth more power, wisdom, love, and mercy than man can do. Now shall this be an aggravation in respect of the creature, and not of the Creator? All means to do you good have been put forth excepting my almighty power, and yet the work is not done.

Obs. 5. The condition of people is sad, when no means will do them good. Then that fearful judgment may be pronounced upon them, Jer. vi. 30, “Reprobate silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them.” Ezek. xxiv. 13, “Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more, till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee.”

Obs. 6. It goes very near the heart of God, to see those that are nigh unto him perverse in their ways. What! for Judah to forsake me? It is sad to find crosses and untowardness in Ephraim; but to meet with them in Judah, where my ordinances are in a special manner, and they so near unto me, and I so tender of them! It is strange to behold of what knotty, crabbed spirits God’s own people sometimes are! A piece of wood may be sound, yet full of knots and very tough. What goes nearer a man than to find crossness in his wife, his children, or friend? from a stranger it matters not so much. Even so God is more affected by the unkindness of his people than the wickedness of the ungodly.

Obs. 7. It is not enough to worship God better than others, if we be of perverse spirits. This was the sin of Judah, because they had the ordinances in a purer way, and worshipped God better than Ephraim, they thought they might continue in this their sin. Oh that this were not England's sin at this day! let us be humbled for it, that we may escape their judgment.

"Your goodness." The word יחסד properly signifies piety and godliness, but in a more extended sense, kindness, mercy, and goodness. But why your goodness? Yours, because either of God's goodness toward them, or the goodness, the holiness, which was in them, 1. God's goodness towards them, which is sometimes by imputation called ours, as in Rom. xi. 31, "That through your mercy they also may obtain mercy:" by that mercy which God bestowed on you, you may encourage the Gentiles to come in. 2. Their goodness; either to their brethren, or their piety and holiness, both these were "as a morning cloud, and as the early dew that goeth away." If the first signification of them be taken, then the sense runs thus:

God's goodness to them was as the morning cloud; that is, they, by their sin, had driven away God's mercy and goodness from them, even as the wind carries the dust before it: God was apparently about to bestow mercies, and they, by their sins, put them all away from them. Bernard saith, that the wind of their unthankfulness drove away the floods, much more the dews, of mercy from them. Now God forbid that this should be our condition: the clouds of mercy are over us, and the dews of mercy are upon us; now should we, by our sins, drive these away from us, how woeful will be our case! Therefore let us not only pray to have the dews, but also the clouds to shower down rivers of mercy. Though I do not think this to be the principal scope of the words, yet it may afford us useful meditation; but the words seem properly to signify their own goodness, which may be taken for,

I. Mercy and compassion towards one another; because, in the 6th verse, God calls upon them so earnestly for mercy, notwithstanding all their shows and promises of reformation; these were all but hypocritical, like those in Jer. xxxiv. 15, 16, of whom God saith, "And ye were now turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour;" but they had polluted his name again, by causing those servants formerly set at liberty to return, and bringing them into subjection; so people who are for a time pitiful and very merciful, afterwards often grow cruel and hard-hearted.

Let us take heed of so evil a disposition. When together we sometimes can join in love and unity, pitying each other, and bearing with each other's infirmities, bearing Christian admonition patiently; but these good words and fair shows often vanish and come to nothing. Where are those refreshing showers of love and friendship which you were wont to water each other with in your Christian societies? In the room of these there now grow nothing amongst us but the lusts of pride, passions, and sad dissensions, which parch and dry up all those good seeds of love and gentleness.

I desire to press this the more, because the Scripture is pleased to make use of this expression of the dew to express the sweetness of a Christian spirit, Psal. cxxxiii. 1, 3, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" How pleasant is it? It is "as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountain of Zion:" as that refreshed the grass, so this affection of mercy and love the saints. He compares it not to a dew that dried up presently, but to a dew which descended down; and "there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore." There. Where? Even in the communion of his saints. This is spoken particularly of church fellowship. Oh, then, take heed that your mercy and bounty in relieving your brethren and persecuted saints, be not as the dew "that goeth away." The Lord has not made his mercy, no, not his mercy in dewing the earth, "as a morning cloud" that vanishes away and comes to nothing. Oh let not our mercy and love be mere shows and proffers, devoid of truth and reality! they should truly come like showers upon those who have been parched with the burning rage and malice of the adversary. The Lord expects more from us now with regard to this duty than at other times; we must not only pity and give good words, saying, Alas, my brother; and alas, my sister, I would I could help you, the Lord pity and relieve you; you must not only do thus, but relieve them with your money and provisions. Is it not with too many of us as it was with those in James ii. 15, who say to a brother, "Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled," but give them not wherewithal to do it? what good does this passing cloud do them? But perhaps you will say, that your sympathies have not been thus evanescent; you have bedewed the saints in their need, you have given something; but still it may have been but a poor pittance, and that out of your abundance: know, that this is not sufficient, your dew must be constant, and proceed on in degrees of mercy; yea, we should rejoice that God gives us an opportunity, and do what we do, not forcedly or repiningly, but with a willing mind. Thus much of the words in this signification of mercy.

II. General goodness and piety; and in this sense there is much of the mind of God in the words, they are as full of marrow and sweetness as can be desired. Now in that God should express godliness and piety by such a word as mercy,

Obs. 8. The necessity of this grace of love and brotherly kindness. Though by nature men are passionate and rugged, grace will mollify them; of covetous men it will make liberal and free-hearted, for grace is part of the Divine nature. Nothing is so communicative as God, the highest good; and according to the height of any creature is its communicativeness. As the sun, being sublime and excellent, is most communicative; so a gracious man: has he parts? they are not for himself, but for the church. Has he an estate? he distributes and communicates of it to the saints; and according as grace arises in the soul, will communicativeness arise. A true Christian is not close-handed.

Obs. 9. The excellency of this grace of mercy. When we wish to express the whole of any thing by a part, we do not select an inferior part, but some of its great characteristics; as by prayer many times is expressed the whole worship of God, "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved," Rom. x. 13.

"As a morning cloud, and as the early dew." In these words God charges this people with three things whereby their notorious hypocrisy was expressed.

1. Their vacuity and emptiness; their words were empty sounds, they were "clouds without water," as Jude expresses it, ver. 12. It is the high commendation of Christians to be full of God, of Christ, and full of grace and knowledge; of which Ephraim had a show, but it was but a show.

2. Their falseness and dissembling; they had a heart and a heart, that is, they were double-minded toward God, they dealt treacherously with him.

3. Their inconstancy and fickleness. As often the clouds, all black and lowering, portend rain, but in a short time are dispersed by the wind, and the sky becomes again perfectly clear; even thus it was in their goodness, though they made glorious shows in their reformation, yet were they all empty, false, and inconstant. Thus it was in the general in the reformation of the land, things were reformed but by halves, and in their particular turnings it was but as the morning cloud; many times there were great appearances of reformation, but they were like the early dew which presently goeth away. The ten tribes and Judah made such beginnings in reformation, and setting up the worship of God, that if God were truly worshipped by any people in the world it would be by these; they would set God up high in their thoughts, high in their practices; and this was very burdensome to the Spirit of God; therefore he saith, "What shall I do unto thee, O Ephraim? What shall I do unto thee, O Judah?"

We find glorious shows of reformation come to nothing, as appears in many instances. 2 Kings ix., x., Jehu made great shows: when Joram asked him, "Is it peace, Jehu?" he answered, "What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" And, in the 10th chapter, what a slaughter doth he make of the priests of Baal! Well, what was the result of all this? read but on in the chapter, ver. 29, 31, and it is said, "Howbeit from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, Jehu departed not." What a cloud of hopes was there in Ahab's time! 1 Kings xviii. 39, all the people cried, "The Lord, he is the God; the Lord, he is the God;" upon the miracle which was wrought by Elijah's prayer, when the fire came down and consumed the sacrifice: but this all vanished in the people, and respecting Ahab himself the text saith, he "did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord," and "did very abominably in following idols," so that "there was none like unto him," 1 Kings xxi. 25, 26. When the prophet comes to him after he had killed Nabal, and tells him of his sin, he falls down and humbles himself, inasmuch that God himself takes notice of it, and, upon it, pronounces a transmission of his punishment, that he would not "bring the evil in his days, but in his son's days." God bids the prophet see how he humbled himself, and that not in a show, as if his heart were not touched and affected, but he did truly humble himself in his kind. But now, did no reformation follow upon this? No, none at all. It is very hard to bring great men to reform themselves; where have we such an example since Theodosius the emperor, who although guilty of rash effusion of blood, yet, coming on a sabbath to the place of public worship, would have received the sacrament: Ambrose, seeing him approaching, goes and meet him at the door, and thus addresses him, How dare those bloody hands of yours, which have shed so much innocent blood, lay hold of the body and blood of Christ? Which speech so startled him that he went away, and was humbled for his sin, and afterwards came and made his public confession, and then was admitted to communion. Whence we may see, that kings, yea, emperors, have been kept back from the sacrament. But did this humiliation of Ahab come to nothing? If we look but into the 22nd chapter, we shall find him of a proud, haughty spirit, resolved upon his own will, contrary to the will of God; he would go up to Ramoth-gilead, and when Jehoshaphat asked him, "Is there not here a prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him?" he said, "There is yet one man; but I hate him;" and this was after his humiliation. And is it not thus with us? Many times, when judgments are upon us, how penitent and humbled are we! but if the rod be removed we grow proud and stubborn forthwith. So in Judah, how did that young king Joash begin! 2 Chron. xxiv. 4, he "was minded to repair the house of the Lord," and gave commandment to the priests and the Levites to gather money for the purpose with haste, and, although a very young prince, was so zealous, that he blamed the high priest for his inactivity; and, ver. 10, it is said, "all the princes and all the people rejoiced, and brought in, and cast into the chest." What did this produce? surely some glorious effect. Mark now the 17th verse: "After the death of Jehoiada came the princes of Judah, and made obeisance to the king." And what then? "Then the king hearkened unto them;" they then began to get him on their side, very likely by sinful compliances and flattering speeches, for the text saith, that he "hearkened unto them. And they left the house of the Lord of their fathers, and served groves and idols;" they forsook their religion, and then "wrath came upon them:" while they kept the truth, it preserved them; but turning from the rule, what outrages do they commit, and what did they suffer! Ver. 21, 22, they conspire against Zechariah and stone him; the blood of a prophet's son is now nothing to them, and the king forgets the faithful services of Jehoiada the father, and consents to his death: oh to what a height of sin is this young zealous prince come! How many sad examples have we in these our days like this of Joash! how many are there who in their youth promised well, but the fair hopes prove to be but "as a morning cloud," their timely beginnings end in apostasy! Another example we have in Amaziah, 2 Chron. xxv. 2. Amaziah, in the 6th verse, had hired a hundred thousand of Israel to go with him to the war, and for their hire had given them a hundred talents of silver. But there came a man of God to him, saying, that he must not use them. "And Amaziah said to the man of God, But what shall we do for the hundred talents which I have given to the army of Israel? And the man of God answered, The Lord is able to give thee much more than this." He had no security for it, but only God's word, and that from the mouth of a man; what then? Amaziah obeyed presently, and separated the allies out of Israel; but yet, ver. 14, "it came to pass, after that Amaziah was come from the slaughter of the Edomites, that he brought the gods of the children of Seir, and set them up to be his gods, and bowed down himself before them, and burnt incense unto them." Thereupon, ver. 15, God sends him another prophet; and now see how the spirit of the man is changed. In the former verses the man of God comes to him and crosses his design, and yet he hearkens unto him, and obeys the command of God in that which entailed present and certain loss; but here, when the prophet reasons with as much mildness and love as possible, "Why hast thou sought after the gods of the people, which could not deliver their own people out of thine hand?" they could not rescue or save their people from thee, and wilt thou serve them? yet in the 16th verse mark the answer: "The king said unto him, Art thou made of the king's counsel? forbear; why shouldest thou be smitten?" Dost thou know what is our design in this? The prophet forbears, but what follows? "I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel." The truth is, when we see men unruly, stubborn, and wilfully rejecting counsel, especially after some good workings and stirrings, it is a fearful sign that God purposes to destroy them. As that wicked king at one time could call the prophet his father, yet afterward be enraged against him; so some may be friends to the saints at one time, and at another their bitter enemies.

And as the Scripture is full of such examples, so also are ecclesiastical histories. When Domitian, a most cruel persecutor of the Christians, came to the crown, he could not endure blood to be shed, no, not even in sacrifices. Of Nero also it is reported, that for five years he was so pitiful and full of mercy, that when they came to him to sign the sentence for the execution of a malefactor, he exclaimed, Oh that I had never learned to write! And yet where had the commonwealth of Rome, or the church of God, a more desperate enemy or cruel persecutor? God grant this may never be our case. What had we at the first, in the beginning of the parliament, how did they show themselves, and what great things did they perform! stood against arbitrary government, impeached great ones, executed justice on some peers! What a mighty spirit was raised in the countries to second and stand by the parliament! Now where is the man that ever thought such a party of lords and commons would be found to join with a company of papists, atheists, malignants, and Irish rebels, against the cause of God and the gospel, and every thing that is truly good? Oh most horrid apostacy, that this morning cloud, which in the beginning shone so gloriously, should thus vanish and come to nothing! And private men, though perhaps not so bad as some in public stations, yet how cold and flat-spirited are they! private interest and their own selfish ends ruling in them more than the prosperity of the public; nay, so we can gain our own ends, though with loss to the public, we care not. Oh what shall God do with us, who are such an untoward people? Change but the name, and this scripture is ours; O England, "what shall I do unto thee?"

Your spirits for reformation are down, you care not for a deliverance, and are willing to crouch under your burdens; but let me tell you, should these beginnings of reformation prove to be as the "morning cloud and early dew," we will be the most miserable people in the world, and procure to ourselves and posterity the greatest curse that ever befell a nation; yea, the generations that are yet unborn may, if we neglect this great opportunity, curse our times. Therefore, be encouraged to venture in this work, and still own the cause, for God will own it; and never leave it, that so the work may be finished, and we may say with the saints, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him," and he hath heard us. We should consider that it is a mercy the Lord has made use of such false-spirited men to benefit his people; and seeing the Lord is gone so far in the work, let us entreat him that he would follow it on, and not only bedew us, but even wet us to the root. There is a very remarkable promise in chap. xiv. 5 of this prophecy, "I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily;" they shall have the dew, and be like the lily; but the lily is a poor, weak, fading thing; but, saith God, he shall "cast forth his roots as Lebanon," my mercy shall be perfected towards them. The Lord grant this promise may be made good to us. And thus much of their reformation in the general, as it concerned the public state and church.

Now touching the particular reformation of themselves, and their hypocrisy in it: the observation from thence is,

Obs. 10. For any to make good beginnings, and let them fall again, is grievous to God, and dangerous to themselves. Psal. lxxviii. 36, 37, "Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues. For their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant." What then? Ver. 58, 59, "They provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images." God then "greatly abhorred Israel;" they were as "a deceitful bow," hypocritical in all their ways, which the Spirit of God cannot endure, for these reasons:

1. The Spirit of God is a holy Spirit; but this is a slight, fickle, vain, and unsound spirit.

2. The Spirit of God is unchangeable, and constant in all its motions; but this spirit is altogether changeable. It is said of God, that there is no shadow of change in him; and in such a heart as this there is no shadow of constancy.

3. Such men as these stifle the very conceptions of the Spirit of God in them. It is accounted murder in a woman to stifle the conception in her womb, or in any way to hinder it; now if this be such a vile thing, is it not much more to stifle the conception and first breathings of the Spirit in the soul? Oh take heed of this!

4. There can be no trust reposed in such men as these; they are fit for no employment, neither God nor man can confide in them, or use them for any service, yea, we ourselves cannot endure to have to deal with such, they are so fickle and wavering.

5. They manifest by this, that there is no fear of God before their eyes; for were the fear of the great God in them, it would overawe them so that they durst not act thus.

6. This is a great pollution of the name of God. Jer. xxxiv. 16, when they had professed to set their servants free, they called them to servitude again, and in this, God saith, they polluted his great name.

7. This is an argument that the things of God and matters of religion are looked upon by you as things indifferent; when thou hast a mind to them thou canst use them, or thou canst let them alone; and this greatly dishonours the Spirit of God.

8. This shows that such people never, even at the first, had any sound principles in them; far from the life of Christ, which is said to be a stedfast life, and the life of every saint should be like unto his, "their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant."

Now, as it is grievous to God and to his Spirit, so it is very dangerous to ourselves. For,

1. We lose many an opportunity, many a soul-stirring, which at our first awaking we have had. When the soul is first convinced, oh the many stirrings and good motions which are in it! any thing would then take impression upon the heart; but when we go back, a callous insensibility begins to overspread the heart.

2. The inconstant can never grow to any eminency of grace and godliness, even though there be truth at the bottom. It is said of Reuben, Gen. xlix. 4, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel." Men that do but very little, yet that still progress in godliness, though their parts be weak, and their performances mean and imperfect, may attain to something; but those who at the first do a great deal, run very fast in their youth, and afterward grow cold again, are very bad; the cooling after heating is very dangerous, as to the body, so more to the soul.

3. This hardens the heart very much. When the spirit is cooled after a heating, it is like water which, being hot and cold again, is more cold than it was before; or like iron heated and quenched, is harder than before.

4. This aggravates all other sinning. What! wilt thou sin thus, after God has appeared in us?

5. This spoils the acceptableness of all our other services, be they never so specious. As a man that has a child lunatic, in his fits and moods he is very senseless and sottish, but in his lucida intervalla he comes to himself and speaks sensibly and well; now if a man should see him at this time he would think he ailed nothing; so there are many who seem to be eminent Christians for the present, but let a temptation present itself, or lust within stir, and they are overcome.

6. There is nothing will more damp the heart when it comes before God in duty. God may say to thee, O soul, how darest thou come before me in such a duty as this, when thou knowest thou art guilty of breach of promise, and falsifying covenant with me? This will be an eating corrosive on thy spirit. God may say to thee, How canst thou expect that I should be constant in my mercies toward thee, when thou art so inconstant in thy duty to me? This inconstancy toward God, brings wavering in faith, and unsettledness in our confidence God-ward; the one makes way for the other; inconstancy in duty, and wavering in believing.

How should this stir us up to look to our own hearts, seeing they are so fickle and deceitful! Let us watch over and daily suspect them. John ii. 23, 24, it is said of the people, that many believed in Christ, because of the miracles which he wrought; yet Christ would not commit himself unto them. So Deut. v. 29, there is a people that made large promises to God, that they would walk in all the statutes and ordinances of their God. Now, saith God, this people say well, they are good words, but "Oh that there were such an heart in them!" God regards no work you do, except he find it rooted in you. "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed," John viii. 31: no true disciple of Christ without abiding in Christ. "All flesh is grass," Isa. xl. 6; that is, whatsoever is done by fleshly principles, every duty, though never so fair in outward appearance, if it come from a principle of flesh, is but as the grass; and as the grass withereth and its flower fadeth, so will these specious outside duties vanish away. Therefore look to your heart, and above all keepings, keep it very diligently; for if the root be sound, the branches will be so too, and the fruit thereof good and profitable.

Obs. 11. It is a very dangerous thing to let beginnings die. Therefore, would you be preserved from such an evil as this, of fickleness and inconstancy, take my counsel in these particulars.

1. Rest not in sudden flashes and stirrings of spirit. Perhaps at a sermon some truth or other that nearly concerns thee, is pressed home upon thy conscience, and it begins to stir the heart and warm the affections; now, do not think the work is now over, or that the hazard of miscarrying to all eternity is passed; no, thou must rise higher and go further than this, or else thou art undone for ever. This is that rock upon which many poor souls split to their everlasting destruction, therefore look to your hearts in time.

2. Labour to get your hearts off from all earthly engagements. That man can never stand constant toward God who is entangled with the snares and cares of this world. He whose heart is constantly fixed upon God, though he does but little in the way of duty, in comparison of many a mere professor, yet shall hold out, when the most glorious hypocrite in the world shall fall to the ground.

3. Take heed of secret sins. They will undo thee if loved and maintained: one moth may spoil the garment; one leak drown the ship; a penknife stab and kill a man as well as a sword; so one sin may damn the soul: nay, there is more danger of a secret sin causing the miscarrying of the soul, than open profaneness, because not so obvious to the reproofs of the word; therefore take heed that secret sinning eat not out good beginnings.

4. Often examine how things stand with your hearts. Say, O my soul, how is it with thee? how stand matters between God and thee? Come, my soul, there was a time that there was such and such good motions in thee, what is now become of them? at the first thou wert very forward and active for God, such a chamber, such a closet, can witness the intercourse God and thou hadst; thou didst then walk close with God and his fear was in thee. This, if observed, would be a special help to keep the heart upright: but I fear many a minister may say of his people, as Paul did to the Galatians, Where is now the blessedness which you spake of? Gal. iv. 15.

5. Never trust your hearts after spiritual comforts and revivings. When in any ordinances thou hast met with God's presence, and he has shone upon thee in love, and thou hast got a smile from Jesus Christ, have a care of your hearts, and expect and prepare for temptations. Many, when they have within good desires and hopeful beginnings, think that the work is past and the danger is over; and then comes a temptation of Satan, and encounters with them, and they are basely foiled, and lose their peace. Great consolations usually precede great temptations. In Matt. iii. 17, God testifies that Jesus Christ is his beloved Son, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" and in the very next chapter tells us how he was led "into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil." Often, too, after the greatest mercies follow the greatest miseries: see how well Christ knows this; John xii. 12, he comes riding in pomp to Jerusalem, and the people magnified him, crying out, "Hosanna to the Son of David;" yet, ver. 27, he cries out, "Father, save me from this hour."

6. After good desires and motions of the Spirit humble yourselves. Make yourselves base and vile in your own eyes, that so you may grow downward in the root: it is very dangerous when beginnings run upwards presently, but when they show us our sins and unworthiness then they work kindly. If there be no moisture at the root of the tree, though there be never so many blossoms, they will die, vanish, and come to nothing; so if your joys and secret raptures of soul are not moistened in the tears of sorrow and humiliation, they will blow off and be shaken down by the next temptation; but when the inward workings of joy in the heart operate as well to humiliation as consolation, when they work both ways, then will not your goodness be as the early dew that goeth away, and as the morning cloud which soon vanisheth. In Psal. ex. 3, it is prophesied that in the times of the gospel Christ's people shall be willing in the day of his power; Christ's power shall be put forth upon his people to subdue their wills to the will of God; so that if we find this effect of Christ's power in us, then may we be sure that our goodness shall not be evanescent.

7. Rest not in stirrings and beginnings, except you find that they tend to unite you to Christ. As soon as your hearts begin to work, you should stop a little and ask yourselves what of Jesus Christ is there in these motions; Have I more of his righteousness, wisdom, and love than I had before? Only such stirrings of heart as bring Christ into the soul will hold and stand fast. That is very observable which we read concerning the manna, Exod. xvi. 14, that the dew which was upon the ground passed away, but the manna abode still: so the good affections and desires which are in many are even like the dew, which, as soon as the sun is up, is gone presently: now if you would not have the efficacy of them gone, try what manna there is left behind, what of Christ is strengthened. Is your faith propped, your love inflamed, your humility increased? then it is something. The Israelites could not feed on the dew, but the manna was their nourishment. So, how is it with you when the fervour of your spirits has abated? can you then feed upon Christ, this spiritual manna? Look what word of promise then takes up its abode in your hearts, and how your hearts are affected with it: such as find the promise remaining when the dew is gone, and that these promises are as sweet now as they were when first the affections were excited, such a soul will hold out, and his righteousness shall not be as the morning cloud or early dew that passeth away.

Ver. 5. Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth: and thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth.

"Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets." We would think there were little connexion in these words, yet there is a very fit one. "Therefore," that is, because they are so fickle and inconstant, therefore have I caused my prophets to deal sharply with them to cut them to the heart. I would not have dealt thus with them, but that I have no other means left, seeing they are so vain, so slight in their spirits: and this resource I try, that, if possible, they might be brought to see with what a God they have to deal. The apostle, in Titus i. 13, gives command to "rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith;" sharply, that is, cuttingly, rebuke them cuttingly. My prophets have been as an axe, as an axe that cuts hard, knotty wood, or as the instruments of carvers in stone, which cut hard, rough things. "I have slain them by the words of my mouth." The Sept. refer these words to the prophets, and render them, διὰ τοῦτο ἀπέθρισα τοῖς προφήταις ἰμῶν ἀπίκρανα αὐτοῖς ἐν ῥήματι στόματός μου. Therefore have I hewed your prophets; I have slain them by the word of my mouth. And Jerome saith, they relate to the time of Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 40, who slew many of Baal's prophets; and to Jehu's time, who did the same, 2 Kings x. 25. Thus they interpret it; and in this you have an objection of the people answered, who might plead thus: True, we have been led aside and have not worshipped God as we should do, but it is our priests and our prophets who have seduced us; we did but as we were taught, and if we have gone astray, our prophets and our priests have misled us. Nay, saith God, you cannot plead so, for you have seen my hand out against the prophets sufficiently, I have cut them off. Though I conceive not this to be the meaning of these words, yet from this sense this useful observation may be drawn:

Obs. 1. When God comes against false prophets, he looks especially that people should not do as they have been taught by them. In Ezek. xiii. 9, a woeful judgment is denounced against the false prophets, for prophesying peace when God's purposes were set against Jerusalem for destruction. Their judgment was, that they should not come into the assemblies of his people; and, my hand shall be against them; and mark, "ye shall know that I am the Lord." They shall then know more particularly that I am the Lord God, when my hand is thus out against them. It is a powerful means to convince a people, when they see the hand of God out against their false teachers; and if so, how should the people of England be convinced of the evil of that way they so admire and extol, when the hand of God is so heavy upon its superstitious time-servers and maintainers!

But there are some, as Pareus and others, who refer the word to the good prophets; and so in a twofold sense they are said to be slain.

1. In their charge. I have sent them, saith God, to deliver my message to this people, and they have flown in their faces and killed them, and I account it as if I had done it, because I set to the work: and this was spoken at the time when the prophets were grossly abused, when Zechariah the prophet delivered his message to king Joash, and was slain for it, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21; as saith Acts vii. 52, "Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted?" But now here is their encouragement against all the ill usage and the hardships which they meet with in their work; I look upon it, saith God, as if I did it myself: therefore certainly God will not let them go unrewarded. 1 Sam. xxii. 23, David saith to Abiathar, "Abide thou with me, fear not: for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life: but with me thou shalt be in safeguard." David was the occasion of the death of Abiathar's father, and therefore especially cared for him; and shall not God much more? So that, have you a friend, a brother, or a father, slain for, or in, the cause of God, shall not God take his part? yea, he will. Ahimelech was slain accidentally for the cause of David, and yet would David deal well with Abiathar: but, saith God, thy friend was slain, standing for me, and owning my cause; he shall lose nothing by it, for I will deal well with thee, and preserve thee alive for his sake.

2. In their ministry. It has been so heavy that it has even killed them, I have so burdened them with work that I have even slain them; so that this people cannot say, they have not been warned, or that they have had no prophets among them, or that their prophets have been idle, that they have had no work to do: and certainly it is a good death for a minister to die preaching. Pareus makes much use of this, and saith, How much more honourable <sup>Oporet episcopum cocucionantem mori.</sup> to die in doing God's work, than by committing sinful acts of intemperance, uncleanness, &c. Men cannot spend their strength better than in God's service. Oh let that people who have such ministers look to it, that they bring forth fruit answerable in some proportion to the cost bestowed on them. And if you understand the passage thus, then God seems to speak grievously, Oh what shall I do with this people? What means have been used, what losses have I sustained by them! I have spent many choice servants among them, the lives and strengths of such spirits have been spent upon them of whom the world was not worthy. Oh what shall I do unto such a people? Surely a people enjoying such a ministry had need look to their profession. May not this be said of many congregations in London? Has not God sent many choice spirits among you to do you good? and have they effected the end for which they were sent? If not, woe to you! When God spends the lives of his choicest and most precious servants, if he have not a considerable value and return in people's fruitfulness, it will mightily provoke and incense him against them: God highly esteems the lives and strengths of his ministers, they are valued more than to be spent and wasted upon unfruitful people, who neither care for them nor their ministry.

But to come more particularly, and according to the genuine sense of the words, this slaying refers itself to the people. Now the word slays in these two respects:

1. In its denouncing of judgment upon men; for what the word threatens it is said to do: Jer. xviii. 7, 9, "At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it;" "And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it;" we should look upon both as performed.

2. In its operation, it has a mighty efficacy to lead impenitent sinners to ruin; it is as a two-edged sword, which does execution every way: Isa. xi. 3, it makes men "of quick understanding in the fear of God:" and God is said to consume antichrist by the breath of his nostrils, and by the word of his mouth; yea, the word is of such a force, that sometimes it brings death in a literal sense to those who withstand and oppose it. Ezek. xi. 2, Pelatiah gives wicked counsel in the city, and the prophet is commanded to prophesy against him; and in the 13th verse we read, that when the prophet prophesied Pelatiah died: thus God often makes the word so powerful in the mouths of his servants that it presently strikes men dead. Gualter observes from hence, that the power of the word appears in this, that it awakens, convinces, and terrifies the consciences of men, so that they go home and become self-murderers; and the truth is, it is often nothing else but the word working powerfully to their ruin and destruction.

Or the words may be taken hyperbolically. As men that are oppressed and in misery exclaim, Ye kill me, I am not able to endure it, you will be the death of me! the prophets came so close to them, that they cried out, Oh they will kill us, we are not able to suffer them! Luther saith, that by these words, "I have slain them by the words of my mouth," is meant the law; by the law thou hast slain them: and by the word "prophets" he saith is meant, that part of doctrine which is necessary to be preached, to prevent the abuse of the doctrine of the gospel, which otherwise men would be ready to pervert: and he further adds, that those who deny the use of the law were not fit even to be suffered to exist. I mention this of Luther the rather, because those who deny the obligation of the law, urge so strongly his authority to countenance their error.

"Thy judgments are as the light." That is, passively: Thy threatenings upon them, or the execution of those threatenings upon them, shall break out as the light; though they have slain my prophets, and think thereby to free themselves from those judgments which they threatened against them. No, saith God, for all this I will make known my threatenings which they have denounced against them. When the prophet Jeremiah had delivered the message of God to the princes and the priests, they laid hold on him, and said, He should surely die, Jer. xxvi. 8. Now see what the prophet saith in the 14th and 15th verses, "As for me, behold, I am in your hand: do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you. But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof: for of a truth the Lord hath sent me unto you to speak all these words in your ears." You think, perhaps, that when the minister is gone his words are no more: no, they shall lie upon you, and shall break out so manifestly that they shall clearly convince you. Though formerly they pleaded for themselves, as they in Isa. lviii., yet let them entertain never so good a conceit of themselves, I will discover them to be but base hypocrites; I will show you such clear demonstrations of the ways of righteousness in which you should have walked, that all shall discern what you are, and it shall appear as clear as the light wherein you have strayed from the rule.

Again, the words may be taken actively; and then the sense is, My power shall so appear upon them, that their righteousness and holiness shall appear as the light. And then, though my judgments were smart and tedious at the first, yet you shall not repent it; you shall see so much good resulting, as will make you amend for all. Or thus, I have sent my prophets among this people for this very end and purpose, to make this people a righteous people, and that they may manifest this as clearly as the light. Thus you have the meaning of the words; the observations follow.

Obs. 2. Inconstancy in religion provokes God's anger. The waverers and unstable in religion require to have cutting truths preached to them; "Therefore have I hewed them," saith God, "by the prophets:" and as God's ministers must deal thus with their people, so must every man in particular who loves his own soul; and if so be thy soul be precious in thy eyes, thou wilt willingly deal sharply with thyself, and say, O wretched heart that I have, to let such stirrings die, such motions of the Spirit come to nothing! Dost thou know whom thou hast to deal withal, the great and infinite God? and for what thou hast to deal with him, for nothing less than eternity? and hast thou stirrings of heart about this? and dost thou let them die? this provokes God.

Obs. 3. Many men's hearts are like knotty timber and rough stones. "I have hewed them." The longer men continue in their sins, the knottier they are. As timber which has lain long soaking in the water is tough and hardened; so men's spirits that are soaked in their evil ways, oh how onward are they, and how hard a thing is it to fasten any thing that is good upon them! So that when we see men's spirits tough, stubborn, and hard to be wrought upon, let us think of this text. "I have hewed them by the prophets."

That this is spoken of a people, whose goodness was as a morning cloud, and the early dew which passeth away:

Obs. 4. Although the goodness of many be but as the dew, yet is their evil hard and settled. The goodness of many is like the softness of a plum, soon crushed; but their wickedness is like the stone in the plum, hard and inflexible: so that you may here see, grace and truth consist not in good motions, stirrings, and desires, for these may be where the heart is not melting, soft, nor tender; the heart is not changed, for were the heart kindly wrought upon, it would kindly yield to the power of the word, and, when it comes against their sins, would take part with it.

Obs. 5. God's ministers are hewers. "I have hewed them by the prophets." Elsewhere they are called God's workmen, and here hewers, and that in these two respects; either to prepare them for God's building, or to cast them into the fire; these are God's ends in sending his ministers, his hewers: now they hew all, good and bad, to take them off from their own rootings, and make them as beams in God's building, or to be as an axe laid to the root of their souls. It is recorded of Solomon's temple, that, "when it was in building, there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house;" the materials being prepared, fitted, and squared beforehand: so those which will be members of God's temple hereafter, must be hewed and fitted for it here; therefore John is said to be one sent to make rough things plain, to level great mountains, mountains of sins, crabb'd and rugged spirits. By this you may see what a hard task the minister's labour is, and why Jeremiah resolved that he would speak no more in the name of the Lord to the people. The work of a minister is more laborious than the work of a carpenter, as Chrysostom expresses it; for, saith he, when the carpenter has wrought hard all day, he goes home, and on his return in the morning finds matters as he left them; but we hew and take pains, and leave our people, but on our return find them worse than before.

Obs. 6. When the ministers of the gospel meet with such rough, cross, and onward spirits, they must deal with them accordingly.

"I have hewed them by the prophets;" my prophets have done their work upon them. God seems to speak to the prophets, to bid them sharpen their tools, make their instruments keen, preach suitably unto them, saving some with fear, as the apostle Jude speaks, ver. 23. I wonder what they can say to this scripture, who cry out against ministers for preaching the law, when the text saith plainly, "and others save with fear." Therefore let those that are the ministers of the word have a care that they sharpen their tools by the word, putting an edge upon them, that so they may encounter successfully the greatest oppositions.

Obs. 7. When the ministers hew, God hews. "I have hewed them," saith God, whereas it was the prophets that did it. Is the word sharp, and does it come close at any time? then look to God as the cause. Is the tool sharp, and does it cut? then look to the hand that directed the stroke, and know that if God hew thee, he will have his will upon thee, he will accomplish the end he aims at. When God hews thee, if thou dost not work under his hand to make something of for use, he will throw thee into the fire: as a workman in anger throws away the piece he is at work upon into the fire; so saith God, This man or this woman are good for nothing, I will throw them into the fire. Take heed, you who have stirrings and motions unto good, and yet have your secret lusts, beloved bosom corruptions, know that God may cut you down for the fire; and thou mayst already in his purpose be thus cut down, though thou livest under the ordinances in the bosom of the church. As the fig tree was cut down, yet had leaves for a while, green and flourishing; so know, it is possible for a man to make a glorious profession, and perform many duties, and yet to be but a vessel of wrath, one cut down in wrath by the stroke of the word. This cutting down is like to that which we find in Luke xiv. 24, "For I say unto you, that none of those men which were hidden shall taste of my supper;" and yet these men had their stirrings and motions. Oh! the consideration of this should make sinners to tremble, that it is possible for men, yea, for men professing godliness, to be cut down by the word of wrath, and that, while they are living and well. Now God may be said to cut a man down for vengeance, when he in judgment determines and secretly resolves against him, that no means nor mercies shall do him good; and now, woe indeed to that man against whom God is thus resolved and determined! But that none may be discouraged and disheartened by this, but the rather awakened, know, that so long as God still strives with thee, and is yet working upon thee by his word and Spirit, he has not yet determined against thee, thou art not past hope of cure; therefore improve the seasons, and do not abuse this that hath been said; let it support you against despair, but not encourage you to presume.

Obs. 8. God's ministers are God's tools; and as tools by working are worn out, so are God's ministers. But when the work goes on, the labourer thinks not much though the tools are worn: so God, when he sees people come in and accept of mercy, is content to bear the loss of the wearing of his tools. And as men reckon not only for the work done, but also for the wearing of the tools, and the more precious the tool is, the more account is made of it; so will God, also, not only reckon for the lives of his servants, but also for their strength, and the weakening of their bodies by their manifold labours. Therefore people had need to look to it, that their fruit correspond with what God expends on them; for know, that God sets a high price upon the lives of his choice servants, and he will have a valuable consideration for them, either in you or upon you; and woe be to you if God forces the price of such blood as theirs is in your ruin!

Obs. 9. God's ministers are God's mouth to his people. "I have slain them by the words of my mouth." "If thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as my mouth," Jer. xv. 19. And look, what is threatened by them, is threatened by God; and the promises which they open and press upon a soul in distress, is done by God himself, and it is to be looked upon as God speaking to thee in particular.

Obs. 10. The word of God is of great power, and full of efficacy. "I have slain them by the words of my mouth." The word is like a two-edged sword, which smites every way and doth execution: every time men hear the word, it is for life or for death. Deut. xxxii. 46, 47, "Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day; for it is not a vain thing for you; because it is your life:" it is your life which lies upon it, therefore look ye to it. So in Rev. xi. 5, "And if any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: though the witnesses be as olive branches, yet if any wrong them they must be killed by devouring fire."

But if the word be of such efficacy, of a slaying nature, why should we hear it?

We are bound to hear the word as our duty: and when we come, we should present our lusts before the edge of the word: were sin thus presented before it, it would only slay the sin, and not the person. When the word comes, it will slay the one, either your sins, or your souls; therefore, if you would have your souls saved, put your sins to death. The upright need not fear coming to the word; but such as are resolved to keep their sins, the word will slay both them and their sins.

Obs. 11. God's judgments lie concealed while men go on prosperously in sin. They see them not; they sin, and judgment appears not; and, therefore, they take liberty and imbolden themselves in their sins.

Obs. 12. When judgments do come, they break out. "Thy judgments shall break forth." Judgments were working their ruin before, they did not sleep: when judgments come, they break out upon sinners: as mighty waters, being stopped in their course, when they work over the interruption, run the faster.

Obs. 13. God has his time to punish sins openly; as they sin secretly in the dark, God will punish openly in the light, to make them ashamed.

Obs. 14. God will have his time to convince men by his judgments; then their filthiness shall be punished.

Now God's judgments may be said to break forth as the light, to convince men, in three ways:

1. When the thing threatened in the word comes to pass.

2. When the judgment inflicted is suitable to the sin committed.

3. When it is executed by a remarkable hand upon the sinner, then that judgment breaks forth upon a man as the light.

Obs. 15. God's judgments are gradual. They break forth as the light, not all at once, there is the morning light and the mid-day; as mercies to the saints are gradual, so are judgments upon the wicked. There is much to be learned by this breaking out of judgment as the light. Isa. xxvi. 9, "When thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." Micah vi. 9, "The man of wisdom shall see thy name: hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it." Prov. xxviii. 5, "Evil men understand not judgment: but they that seek the Lord understand all things;" they shall learn much. Examine your hearts by this, and see what you have learned by these judgments that are broken out upon us so manifestly, that the greatest atheist in the world may learn, that "the Lord, he is the God," as the people cried out in 1 Kings xviii. 39.

Obs. 16. When God sends a ministry to a people, it is to discover his way and worship. The Lord makes their righteousness to appear and break forth as the light; he will have his way and worship appear as clearly as the light, his way shall not be hidden from them.

Obs. 17. The more powerful the ministry is, the more terrible shall judgments be, if despised. Your consciences shall echo upon this ground in your ears, "The Lord is righteous in all his ways," justly am I punished. Oh the sad cries of many in their sicknesses and on their death-beds! How many times have I been warned by the word! but I slighted warnings, I regarded them not, warnings have been no warnings to me, therefore justly am I in misery.

Oh that the consideration of this might be more prevalent and work more upon us, than ever God's quickness in his judgments has wrought towards those that stand out against a quick, searching ministry.

Ver. 6. For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.

This scripture having much of the mind of God in it, and much difficulty in the understanding of it, I read no further at this time. Here we have a reason of God's severe expression in the former verse, where it was said that God had hewed them by the prophets, and slain them by the words of his mouth. Why was God so severe against them? Because he would not be put off with their sacrifices. They bolstered up themselves with these, objecting against the prophet when he pressed them to mercy and to the knowledge of God, Why, are not we abundant in serving of God? burnt-offerings are not neglected by us, and why should not we be accepted? No, saith God, "I desired mercy, and not sacrifice;" never tell me of your sacrifices and burnt-offerings, so long as there is no mercy among you. "Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets, and slain them by the words of my mouth;" you are so attached to these outward things, that I must hew you off from them. This sentence is quoted twice by Christ himself in the New Testament, Matt. ix. 13; xii. 7, which, as it does not occur in any other place, notes its great importance.

"For I desired mercy." רציתי רחמים signifies to desire or to will a thing with great complacency or delight; as if God should say, Mercy is a thing so pleasing to me, that I desire it at my heart. God's great mercy in reconciling the world unto himself by Jesus Christ, is more worth than all the sacrifices in the world; but this is not the mercy meant in the text. Heb. x. 5, 6, "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me: in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure." There is no mercy like this, the mercy of God in his Son Jesus Christ. But the mercy here spoken of is the mercy of man, and the word for mercy here, is, in the original, the same as is used for goodness in the 4th verse. The meaning then is, I desire mercy; that is, not the mercy of God, but mercy to man, mercy to ourselves; and so Christ interprets it, Matt. xii. 7, "If ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless." As if Christ should say, God in some cases would have men provide for themselves, though they thereby neglect the strict observance of the sabbath: "I will have mercy," as to ourselves, so to others, mercy to men, either to their bodies, or to their souls; mercy to the body every one will grant, but it ought to be especially to the soul, as we may gather from Christ's other quotation of these words, Matt. ix. 13, "Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." This word "mercy" is a synecdoche comprehending all the duties of the second table under one. "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice;" by "sacrifice" is meant, synecdochically, all instituted ordinances and worship, all the affirmative precepts of the second and fourth commandments, all ordinances then commanded them, or that ever should be enjoined; and this appears from Christ's applying the text, in Matt. xii. 7, to the sanctification of the sabbath: and in Matt. ix. 13, Christ quotes it in reference to an ordinance, (whether true or not, human or Divine, matters not,) the separation of the Jews from publicans and sinners; and tells them, that in a case of mercy they might eat with them, thereby gaining an opportunity to do good to their souls: so that from those two you see a clear warrant for the interpretation of this text.

Now, in the further clearing of it, I shall answer some questions, satisfy some objections, and raise certain observations.

I. I shall answer some questions. And,

1. What is an instituted ordinance? There are natural ordinances, and instituted duties. Now what is the difference between them?

For the unfolding of this, know, that by natural duties we understand such duties as we owe to God as God, to men as men, which, if there had been no law to bind us to the performance of, yet would they have been fulfilled by us, being engraven on the heart by the finger of God himself. Such duties, for instance, as the first commandment binds us to, to have no other gods but the Lord, to fear this God and him alone, to love him before all and above all, to trust in him for help at all times: these are duties to be done as unto a God; nature itself dictates the performance of them.

Then there are duties to be performed unto men, as honouring of parents, speaking the truth, not deceiving one another; these duties are radicating in the heart, that were there no law of God to bind men, yet it were in men's hearts to do them. Now these duties must not yield to mercy. But by instituted duties, I mean those which, if God had not revealed, had not been duties, neither would men have been bound to their performance: as, for instance, the sacrifices under the law, by bullocks and goats; sacrifices of such a kind, were they not revealed by some prophet to be in accordance with the mind of God, had not been obligatory. So our church ordinances of sacraments, Christian admonition, and the like, are such as flow from God's prerogative, and not necessarily from his nature. Natural duties, then, refer to attributes in God's nature and character; instituted, to the expression of his will.

2. But how did God say here, "Mercy, and not sacrifice?" Did not God require sacrifice as well as mercy?

Yea, God did require sacrifice as well as mercy; but we must understand this with these limitations:

1. I will have sacrifice, but not without the spirit. Sacrifices without the spirit joined with them are nothing worth. When spiritual worship is joined with their outward sacrifices, then they are accepted. Instituted worship separated from natural worship is not regarded.

2. Not sacrifices to make atonement for their sins. The people thought by their sacrifices to make atonement for their lives, though never so vile and base; but, saith God, I will not have it thus, I will have it only typical, in relation to Christ. But they left out Christ in them: therefore, saith God in this sense, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice."

3. Not sacrifice; that is, of your own. They had many sacrifices of their own, which God neither required, nor would accept of from them. "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice."

4. Not sacrifices; that is, such as are injuriously gotten. The Jews were a very oppressing, grinding people; they would be much in sacrifices, but it was out of the rights of the poor; they would oppress and grind the poor, and then think to atone for all by their sacrifices: in this case, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice."

5. Not sacrifices; that is, comparatively, mercy rather than sacrifice. This negative, in Scripture, is often used to mark inferiority, as in Prov. viii. 10, "Receive instruction, and not silver; and knowledge rather than fine gold." "Receive instruction, not silver;" that is, rather than silver. God's requiring of knowledge does not forbid men seeking estates, but it shows us rather, that knowledge is to be chosen in preference. So Paul is sent to preach the gospel, and not to baptize; that is, rather than to baptize, for Paul did baptize in some places. So saith God here, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice;" that is, let me have both; but if both cannot be had, let me have mercy of the two, I do so much delight in it, that if I cannot have mercy and sacrifice together, I prefer mercy.

3. Why should God require mercy rather than sacrifice?

Because mercy is good in itself, but sacrifice is good only in reference to something else; the good of sacrifices consists only in their reference to Jesus Christ.

Mercy is good in itself, but sacrifice is only good because commanded by God's prerogative, God's command constitutes its goodness.

Mercy is part of God's image in man, but sacrifice is not; and by how much God's image in man surpasses any other excellency, by so much does mercy excel sacrifice.

All instituted worship was made for man, not man for it; but for natural worship man was made, and not it for man, therefore must it needs be more excellent. Christ's reasoning warrants this, "The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath." Now this cannot be said of natural worship, of the duties of fearing God, loving of God, trusting in God.

There is more self-denial in a duty of mercy than in any sacrifice. To do good to the poor, and that in obedience to God's command, argues more self-denial than the offering up to God of sacrifices.

Mercy is æternæ veritatis, an eternal, everlasting duty; it was always, and shall be so, and the habit of it shall continue to all eternity. Though in heaven there be no objects to be delivered out of misery, yet this disposition of mercy remains even there.

Sacrifice is a typical duty for the obtaining of the pardon of sin, but mercy is a moral duty. Now, that which is a moral duty, is better than that which is but to further us in the obtaining of pardon for a moral offence, committed against the great God.

Because sacrifices are but to further us in natural duties. To what end serve sacraments, and why do I partake of them, but to strengthen my faith, increase my love, and to further my appetite in hearing God's mind? Why do I hear the word of God, but that it may turn me unto God? Now the end is better than the means for the attaining of the end; therefore upon these grounds God may be said to desire mercy rather than sacrifice.

4. What are these cases in which God will have mercy, and not sacrifices?

The principal are these ten.

1. If a beast should be in danger of losing its life by any casualty upon the Lord's day, God allows us to forbear all church ordinances at that time, rather than let the beast perish; but because this liberty is allowed by God to men in this case, yet you must not think that a beast is better than all God's ordinances.

2. In the case of the poor; and that I conceive to be the principal scope of the words in the text. These people wronged, oppressed, and tyrannized over the poor, and then thought to make amends to God by their sacrifices and offerings. Men must not lay out so much of their estates either in superfluities, or for the maintenance of God's true worship, as to hinder them in their benevolence and charity to the poor; no ordinance of God should hinder us in showing mercy to the least member of Jesus Christ. Although those which are next us ought to be first relieved, yet know, it is a shame that others should be neglected and forgotten; yea, it is a reproach to the ways of God, that profane men should be more liberal to the poor, than more hungry bellies should be fed and naked backs clothed by them, than by those who profess religion, and would seem to honour God most. Do not think this will be sufficient to excuse you before God, when the cry of the poor shall come up before him, that you have been at such and such charges for the ordinances and worship of God: no, in this case God will have mercy.

3. Mercy to parents, to relieve parents in their necessity, is a case in which God will have mercy, and not sacrifice. If Providence so order that our parents should stand in need of our help, and we are able to aid them, it is our duty to do it, though by this means we are deprived of God's ordinances. You ought rather to regard the relief of parents than the observation of the sabbath, if the case require it. You may be ready to think thus, Had not I better let my parents alone? I must obey the command of Christ, who saith, Matt. x. 37, "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." But there is in this matter a mistake. "Is not worthy of me," only means, if your parents should counsel, advise, persuade, entice, or command you to the practice of evil, or to the omission of any good, or the breach of any command; and upon your refusal they should be angry with you, that you will not obey them, but follow the command of God, and not go out of God's way; in this case father and mother are to be forsaken for Christ and the gospel, but in no case if they stand in need of your help; as is enjoined in Mark vii. 11, "But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free." Now Corban signifies a gift consecrated to God; and the Jews thought that if they could apply the word Corban of any thing, they were exempted from all duty to their parents in that respect: It is true, I had an estate, but I have consecrated it to God, and church services; and though I owe duty and respect to you, as my parents, yet more to God, as my Creator. This is most vile and abominable, and reproved by Christ himself. Possidonus, in the Life of Austin, reports, that he condemned parents who gave their estates away to monasteries, and pious uses, as they thought, and neglected their children: so for children to neglect and slight parents in the time of their necessity, and think to excuse it with the plea of having given it to the church, and being now unable to do any thing more, this will not suffice. This was the old way of papists, to get people to give to their mother the church. I find a tradition cited by some of the Jews, as used by them; when they fell out and were thoroughly angry one with another, they would tell him he should never have any benefit in any thing which they had, and thus they called Corban. In Matt. xv. 5, it is called "a gift," the gift of the altar. Therefore some of the heathens forbade this oath Corban; and yet this was the oath that these did swear by. And by some it is used in a similar manner even at this day, as thus; when any that we are related to have thoroughly angered us, we are wont to say, Well, you shall never be a penny the better for me: this is no other than this oath Corban which they used to swear by in this place.

4. Where the good of souls is concerned. And this is Christ's case, Matt. ix. 13, "Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Though men ought to prize ordinances, and to highly esteem God's worship, yet if it should so happen that instituted worship and mercy to souls come together, and interfere with each other, and both cannot be done, the former may be reverently omitted, and the work of mercy to the soul attended to before it. We are ready to think that nothing must give way to instituted worship, but certainly immortal souls are of more worth than ordinances. Paul was of such a disposition, that he could wish himself out of heaven and become an anathema for his brethren, that souls might be saved.

5. In case of human societies, and for the quiet state of kingdoms, and yet this without prejudice to God's ordinances. God has allowed to men the art of navigation: we read, Solomon sent ships to Tarshish to fetch gold; and were it not for this text, I could not see any warrant for the estrangement from ordinances attendant on it; when men shall be three or four years out, perhaps, and never hear sermons nor receive sacraments: and yet it is lawful upon this ground, that God will have the peace of states and quiet of kingdoms preserved and maintained, he will rather dispense with men in the use of his own ordinances, for the prosperity of civil states: therefore Solomon is not reproved for sending ships to Ophir for gold.

6. In the case of church societies, when the people of God are scattered and cannot meet together, God is content in such cases his people should be without ordinances, and yet incur no sin: as is clear in the case of the children of Israel all the time the church was in the wilderness, even for forty years together they wanted circumcision; but when they came to the borders of Canaan, and were about to enjoy any settlement, then they were circumcised again, and had the passover, which before they could not partake of. So that in some cases, and upon some grounds, the people of God may be without ordinances, and that for a long time, and yet incur no sin; and upon this ground in the text, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice." Therefore this may be the reason of those words which Christ spake to his disciples, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now:" so may we say, Christ has many truths to reveal which people are not yet able to bear, therefore he withholds the revelation of them at present.

7. In respect to our bodies: and this is Christ's case in Matt. xii. 7, "If ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless." God's care of the bodies of men is such, that he will rather have men do the one than the other, he will rather have mercy than the duty. Christ pleads not here for the disciples, that this was not a breach of the sabbath; but the case was such that their bodies required it, it was a case of mercy, and now God would rather have the mercy than the duty. A servant perhaps thinks much to stay at home, to tend a child or look to the house, upon the Lord's day; he objects, Why should I not go to the church? Is not my soul of greater worth and price than this child, or this house? Now these people go upon a good principle, yet err in their application of it: as, for instance, a father commands his child to do two services for him, the one to wait on him at table, the other to clean his shoes. To wait upon his father at table he is willing to do, because it is creditable; but the other he grumbles at, and is discontented. Now in which does he show most obedience? Surely in fulfilling the meanest command. So God requires of us two sorts of duties, one the more honourable, the other more mean, yet perhaps the meaner, a work of mercy. God is wonderfully careful of our bodies, and would have us also careful of the bodies of others. Men ought not to macerate their bodies. God does not require weak, sickly bodies to spend whole nights in fasting and prayer; God in this case will have mercy, and not sacrifice.

8. With regard to our own estates. But here some may say, What! may we regard our own particular estates before the service of God? Yea, in some cases we may, as thus: Suppose we were in the assembly at public ordinances, and there should be a fire in the town, or thieves breaking into a house, we might lawfully leave the ordinances to quench the fire, or to apprehend the thieves and save our goods. Numb. ix. 10, if a man were in a journey, and in the mean time the passer were to be delivered, he might go on in his journey, and do his business, and yet incur no sin. So may we, if in a journey or on special business, if not undertaken in slight or contempt of the ordinance, we may go on without sin; God will have mercy.

9. In the times of persecution, God allows his people to discontinue some ordinances; as is clear in Acts viii. 1. There was at that time a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem, so that the church was scattered and could not assemble to enjoy church-fellowship, and yet it was no sin to them: it had been an unjust charge if any had come and said, What! do you prize your lives so highly, and fear the loss of them more than the ordinances of God? Will you not unite in church-fellowship and constant assembling of yourselves together, because you think you shall suffer by it? No; in such a case, God will have mercy, and not sacrifice.

10. In the case of some eminent service for God. As in the case of Nehemiah; he being the king's cup-bearer must attend to it; and when he was to go up to Jerusalem, asked the king's leave; and when he had finished his work he returns to the king again to serve in his place: though he wanted the ordinances in the king's court, which he might have enjoyed at Jerusalem, yet, that he might be more serviceable in the church's cause, he is contented to deny himself in his own comforts. These are the cases, with others of the like nature, in which God will have mercy, and not sacrifice.

II. I shall satisfy some objections that may be made against this.

1. But men's hearts are deceitful, and they may pretend cases of mercy when there is no such thing in hand.

Know, though in such a case thou couldst not do it, yet do not thou judge another man that may or can do it. The rule is difficult, it is true, yet do not thou envy another man's grace, to whom God has given power to manage his business with Christian wisdom. Thou thinkest that if thou wert in such places and hadst such temptations as others have, thou shouldst miscarry, and aim at self in them; yet do not thou judge another man that may do it in sincerity, do not thou judge another man's duty through thy weakness. God's servants in this world are as his stewards: now we know that a steward has not every particular enjoined him by his lord, but only general rules given to order particulars according to prudence, faithfulness, and zeal; for the exercise of these three graces are required in a steward, prudence and wisdom, faithfulness and trust, care and zeal. So does God give general rules for the ordering of a Christian life; and these general rules being observed, particular cases are to be ordered in prudence, faithfulness, and zeal; wisdom to judge, faithfulness in doing, zeal to keep up life and spirit in action; and where there is a miscarrying through frailty, God will have mercy.

2. But it may be asked, Can any duty of the second be more excellent than the duties of the first table; of the one, God being the object; of the other, man?

The duties of the first table are to be understood, either for the substantial and internal duties of the heart, or some superadded duties materially connected with them: then there are duties of the second table, some more substantial, some superadded: now if we compare the internal and substantial duties with the superadded duties, there the substantial are above them, and to be preferred before them, they having God for their immediate object; yet in some cases God is pleased to indulge with men so far, that he will let the duties of the second table, duties of mercy towards men, take precedence even of the more substantial duties of the first table; so in the duties of the second table to men, some, which are but circumstantial and not so necessary, God allows should be done, when others more fundamental shall lie still omitted, yet without sin.

3. But if God's ordinances are duties, can they be omitted at any time, and that without sin? Are they duties or not duties?

For answer, Take notice, there are two sorts of precepts, negative and affirmative; a negative binds semper, et ad semper, always and at all times; but an affirmative binds only semper, but not ad semper, always, but not at all seasons; at one time we may omit a thousand actions which are to be done, but we cannot do many actions at one and the same time: therefore, for affirmative duties, if they be done in their season, God accepts of them as done continually; as for that command, Pray continually, if it be done in its season, God looks upon it as done continually, and always done. If Providence should so order it, that another duty require to be done at this instant, the duty which I was going to perform ceases then to be a duty to me at this time. If two good things come together, but one can be done at a time, so that the other is not a duty at that time to you, which otherwise is a duty; else if this were not, man would be necessitated to sin, and all the grace, and mercy, and assistance of God could not help, if two affirmative precepts were thus obligatory at the same time; therefore this must be remembered for a truth, that when two affirmative precepts come together, the one is a duty to be performed, the other not.

But what say you to the case of Daniel? when he knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house and prayed more earnestly. Dan. vi. 10. Might not he have saved his life according to this rule, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice?" yet his was a sacrifice that he tendered up to God, it was more than a prayer.

Daniel was then called to manifest Jehovah to be the true God, for he was forbid at the time, by a decree, to pray to any God, or ask a petition of any man save of the king, during thirty days. Now, had he done this, he had denied the true God, and acknowledged Darius to be God. The thing he had to profess was higher than the sacrifice, it was a duty of the first commandment, a manifestation of God to be the true God; and the case standing thus, who is the God that must be prayed unto? Daniel resolves it, saying, I will pray to no God but the true God. And surely, in such a case, profession is to be made whatever becomes of mercy; yea, in a lesser case of sacrifice than this, if profession of faith is involved, it is turned from a duty of the second table to a duty of the first, and must be done as a duty of the first: as thus, Suppose a man be forbid to do a duty which formerly he has constantly performed, and esteemed lawful, and his forbearing of it shall be to them a testimony of his denial of that truth which he formerly held; in such a case he is called to suffer the hardest things imaginable, yea, to sacrifice life itself, if necessary, rather than to omit that duty, or to do the least thing which, to the enemies of the truth, may interpretatively be a sign of denial. The doing of such a duty against such a command is a witnessing to the truth, and not offering up of sacrifice. It is not always that a man is called to this; but if it ever come to this case, interpretatively to deny a truth of God, then must we suffer rather than obey in such a thing, though never so small. And this was the case of the primitive times, they would rather suffer the loss of life, estates, and all, than do that which interpretatively should be a profession of the denial of any of the least truths of God. Tertullian reports of a soldier, who, when all the rest of his fellows carried bays on their hats, in testimony of their worship of a false god, carried a sprig in his hand, and on being asked the reason, answered, I am a Christian; this manifested him to be so, and he at the last suffered death rather than yield. How many among us would think this a small matter, and had it been their case would have done it! yet this man, regarding it as a note of distinction, chose rather to lose his life than comply; and this act of his was approved of, as lawful, by learned and godly men. If we lived in the times of our forefathers, when the question was, Who is a Christian, or who is not? and this by way of distinction, the case would then be different, changed from a sacrifice to a precept and duty of the first commandment. There was a time that the saints would not assemble together because of the persecution, Acts viii. 1; but at another time they would not forsake joining together, whatever became of them; when their assembling was made a note of distinction, who was a saint, who not; who held for such a truth, who would not; in this case, for them not to have assembled together had been a great sin in them, and interpretatively a denial of the truth.

4. But if God will have mercy in case of outward things, saving our estates and preservation of our persons rather than his own ordinances, is not this to prefer the body to the soul? &c.

The preservation of a man's outward estate and condition is to be considered in a threefold respect.

1. As it is in itself: and when a man shall love his estate only in reference to itself, certainly it is sin to regard it before sacrifice.

2. As it enables us to do service for God and our brethren: and this is in a higher respect than the other, of loving our estates for ourselves.

3. As a duty in such and such cases, that so I may be made more serviceable for God, and for his people. Now in this case it is an act of religion; the saving of our estates, as well as praying or hearing of a sermon, in this case is an act of sacrifice, for I do it in obedience to God, for religious ends; though the thing itself be an outward act, yet thus done it is an act of religion, for by this I manifest both my love to God and religion.

5. But is not a man bound to part with much of his estate, yea, and to suffer much, for the enjoyment of the ordinances?

Yea, certainly, very much: we ought both to give and to suffer much for the enjoyment of ordinances; yea, we should choose rather to live in a poor condition, so we may enjoy the ordinances in their purity, than to be in a rich condition and want the ordinances; we are to be liberal ourselves, and careful in exciting others to be so, even till it come to the case of unmercifulness, and then God will have mercy, and not sacrifice. But when may it be said to come to a case of unmercifulness, in which God will have mercy, and not sacrifice?

1. When a subsistence is so denied, that the subject would be destroyed; in this case God will rather have mercy than instituted worship performed to him.

2. When a greater opportunity is denied to do good to our own souls and brethren, than this is of enjoyment of the ordinances; then surely God will have mercy, and not sacrifice. It is impossible to give particular rules in every thing; this is left to the sanctified prudence of the saints.

6. But is not this the justifying of, and consenting with, those that took up innovations, and read the service book?

I answer, No; this Scripture gives no warrant for any such, for there is a great difference between the yielding to that which may pollute and defile the ordinances, and to forbear an ordinance: we must not do any thing to pollute an ordinance, though it were to save our lives; but the forbearing of an ordinance, and that for a long time, may be done, and yet without sin.

7. But is it not a greater mercy to enjoy ordinances than estates? we think it a great mercy, yea, and we have many mercies in the enjoyment of them, and though we suffer many hard things, meanwhile we enjoy communion with God and Jesus Christ in them.

Certainly the mercy is very great, and much communion is to be had with God in his own ordinances rightly administered, and happy are those souls which find this effect by the ordinances and communion with God:

But yet know, that the maintenance of the subject is to be more regarded than the comfort of it, though it be spiritual. But now have a care of turning what I have said into poison; do not ye say that you may now do any thing for the preservation of the subject; we must not do the least thing by which an ordinance may be polluted and defiled.

To be serviceable in public use is more than to enjoy ordinances; as for a minister to preach Jesus Christ to a people, is a greater mercy than his particular good can be; and this has been the judgment of all the churches, yea, it has been the practice of the churches to send forth men to preach the gospel, and to open the things of the kingdom to them, when they could not enjoy the ordinance of the sacrament: Paul would have been content to have been anathema for his brethren; the being of public use to the churches was a greater good to him, and more in his esteem, than his own private gain. Thus far of the objections; ten observations follow answerable to these.

Obs. 1. Carnal hearts which make little conscience of their duties, and are very cruel in their dealings towards men, yet may be contented to submit to instituted worship. This very scripture, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice," is a secret rebuke to such people. Such were those in Jer. vii. 4, who cried, "The temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord;" and yet were very wicked in their dealings. Those hypocrites in Isa. lviii. could be content to submit to instituted worship, frequent in solemn duties of fasting and prayer, yet were such as did smite with the fist, oppress, and grind the poor. In Ezek. xxiv. 21, the sanctuary was accounted their strength, the excellency of their strength, and that which their eyes did pity, and yet were they very wicked; and, in the 25th verse, their minds were on it, their hearts did love it, yet they themselves were carnal.

Because men may be exercised in instituted worship without any power of godliness, the outward act of performance is a very easy work to flesh and blood, there is little difficulty in it.

Because it has the most show of the power of godliness; they seem to be as sincere as any in their worship, there is a great show in the flesh, in the outward man; whereas God's worship is inward, soul worship, which carnal hearts cannot endure, nor do they desire it, it is outside worship which they prize. Now God forbid that any should have low conceits of ordinances, because wicked men join in them.

Obs. 2. Carnal men think to satisfy their consciences by joining in outward ordinances. Thus did they in this place think to put off God and their own consciences, by living in the external acts of worship, while they continued in the love of known sin. What a deal of stir had the prophet to convince these hypocrites of their wickedness!

Obs. 3. God and men's consciences will not be put off. God will despise both it and them. The heathen gods would not be put off with such outsides, in the judgment even of the heathen themselves. Plato saith, What a vile thing is it to think, that the gods will be put off with gifts! No, these are despised by them, they look that the soul should be just. And Seneca, It is not fat sacrifices, but inward performances, that God regards.

Obs. 4. The Lord has a high esteem of mercy; and it appears in this, that he will have it preferred before sacrifice, and this is called, a "sacrifice acceptable," and a sweet savour in God's nostrils, Phil. iv. 18. Chrysostom saith, that he had rather work a work of mercy than a miracle: and surely that must needs be high in God's eyes and esteem, which he pays so dear for.

O Christians! imitate God in this, let your esteems of mercy be raised higher than ever before, from this that you have heard concerning its excellency. The works of mercy are glorious works, there is more in such than in those acts of religion which men think are more spiritual. I speak the more of this, because it is a scandal which is laid upon godly men by the men of the world, that they are miserable and close-handed; now in this we should labour to convince the world by the practice of mercy.

Obs. 5. It is the Christian's skill, when two duties come together, which to choose. This is a snare in which many Christians are caught and foiled; they think both must be done at the same time, whereas the one is the duty, the other not.

Obs. 6. Though the object of an action be spiritual, yet it is not a sufficient ground to prefer it before another action, whose object may be but natural. The ordinances of God have God for their object, and the enjoying of communion with him; yet in the performance of other actions which may be only natural, I may show more obedience to God than in offering up of sacrifice.

Obs. 7. If God's own worship may be forborne in case of mercy, how much more men's institutions and inventions! Oh what a vile spirit is there in those men who will not suffer their superstitious vanities to give place to mercy! men must be undone in their bodies and estates, rather than their wills be disobeyed! The prelatial faction have themselves confessed, that the cross, the surplice, and the rest of that trash, were their own institutions; yet ministers must be silenced, bodies imprisoned, families starved, and thousands of souls destroyed, rather than their wills should not be fulfilled. Oh the intolerable pride of these men! had they been God's institutions, yet might they have been forborne. What did these men's actions say but this, Let Christ never be revealed to thousands and millions of souls, rather than these ceremonies shall be omitted or neglected?

Obs. 8. God will have mercy rather than disputing about sacrifice. Suppose there be a truth in that which is disputed about, yet God in this case will have mercy rather than sacrifice, rather than mercy shall be neglected he will have sacrifice omitted. We have ordinances and plenty of preaching, but the Lord knows how soon we may be deprived of them; let us not then dispute and wrangle away our mercy.

But must we not inquire after truth, and at this time also?

God forbid we should deny or speak against any which shall search into, or inquire after, truth, yea, at this time, when a case of mercy requires it; but, when young converts are taken off from fundamental truths, and led into errors, and souls hindered from coming in to Christ, in this case we should abstain from contending.

But young converts must abstain from all appearance of evil, and labour to come to the knowledge of Christ's will in every point.

True, they must, but this must be done orderly, they must first be established and grounded in fundamentals, and then they have liberty to do this; that rule is perpetual and holds in this case, Rom. xiv. 1, "Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations." Now let no man say, the point was a case of indifference: some would eat herbs out of conscience, others would forbear; now certainly it is a sin to do that out of conscience which God neither regards nor commands: the thing itself here was indifferent, yet in this case they must not receive them to doubtful disputations; now, if not to doubtful disputations, then surely not to disputation to hold up error, and to ensnare and betray young beginners in godliness. In Acts xv. 24, "certain" are spoken of, "which went out" from the apostles, and "troubled" the disciples "with words subverting their souls." The words in the original signify, as if a man had been packing up wares to send beyond the seas, and one should come and scatter and undo all again which was packed up; or as soldiers, who having packed up their artillery, their bag and baggage, are forced to undo it all suddenly again: so did these false teachers unvessel, scatter, and bring them all into confusion, labouring to subvert them from the faith.

Obs. 9. Mercy must be preferred before our own wills and lusts. God is contented, that we may perform our duties to our brethren, to forbear his own ordinances; and shall we stand upon our wills and humours? O proud spirit, that exalteth thyself against

τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν.

the Lord; we must be content to deny ourselves very far for the public good, and for our brethren's sake, since God is pleased to bear with men so far, as for a time to be without that honour, which he should have from men in their acknowledgment of him in public service.

Obs. 10. Men must be contented to forbear their institutions with those who cannot yield in their consciences to them. But let there be peace and quiet maintained by us; we should indulge and bear each with other in such cases, of merey especially; there should not be the urging of lesser things upon tender consciences with such severity as to undo them, though they be God's ordinances.

But if this be so, then what hinders but men may do what they list?

No. What has been said has been limited only to instituted worship, and so, punish them they may, but not to their ruin; nay, in these controversies in which men are so divided, some thinking this course, others thinking another, to be agreeable to Christ's ordinance, things ought not so to be urged, as to undo the other party that opposes; certainly such a practice as this is contrary to the rule of merey in this text. Is it not cruelty to insist, that men must unsatisfy themselves presently, and lay down their opinions upon such a day as shall be appointed them.

But you will say, It is sufficient that learned and godly men hold this opinion, they find sufficient to satisfy them, and we may mistake.

To this I answer, that those who are ignorant in any respect, must understand the grounds on which men hold their opinions. If their reasons satisfy you, then it is something; but to say, I must hold such and such things because others do, and I ignorant of their grounds, this is folly; for as we must not have an implicit faith, so we must not have an implicit judgment, to hold an opinion because others hold it: And thus I have given you the mind of God in this scripture, so far as God has revealed it to me for the present.

It follows,

"And the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings." For the understanding of these words, I shall first answer some questions, and then give you the observations.

1. What knowledge of God is here meant?

Certainly not a knowledge barely notional, but such as is joined with faith and obedience, a practical knowledge, which brings the heart to love and embrace the truth: Isa. liii. 11, "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many."

2. Why is the knowledge of God joined to merey here? was it not full enough before, "mercy, and not sacrifice?"

Because as God accepts not merey without sacrifice, neither does he regard knowledge without merey. Men are here in the extremes on both sides: some are very merciful, as the papists, but withal very ignorant of the knowledge of God and his ways; that, as the apostle saith of love, If I should give all my goods to the poor, and my body to be burnt, it were nothing; so, if we be never so merciful, and ignorant, it availeth nothing. Others have much knowledge, yet are very rugged and hard-hearted. Now when merey and knowledge are thus separated, God regards them not; but when they meet together, then are they well-pleasing in his sight.

3. Why is knowledge only named here, whereas there are many duties of the first table, as well as this?

Because both of the excellency and necessity of the knowledge of God; the knowledge of God has an influence on all the duties of God's worship.

Because many are very much exercised in instituted worship, yet very ignorant in the knowledge of God. It was so then, and is so now in our days; many who content for ordinances and Christ's government in his church, are yet very ignorant of Christ's redeeming the world, the way of God in reconciling himself and sinners together; ignorant of the attributes of God, and their working for his people's good: therefore he requires the knowledge of himself to be in men principally.

4. Why is the knowledge of God put after merey, it being better than merey?

The knowledge of God is not set after merey because merey is to be preferred before knowledge, but because merey is more apparent, most convincing to men: now when people are convinced of one duty, they are the sooner convinced of another; conscience will easily convince them of what is God's mind.

5. But why is it said burnt-offerings, rather than peace-offerings and sin-offerings, which we read of?

Because these have more respect unto God than other offerings, as has been shown to you at other times, with the differences between burnt-offerings and other offerings: as if the Holy Ghost should say, I require merey and not sacrifice, and the inward worship of God, faith and knowledge, rather than any natural worship. The notes from hence are these:

Obs. 11. The duties of the first and second table are to be joined together. Merey and sacrifice, knowledge of God and burnt-offerings, when in their place, are acceptable, therefore let us take heed of separating that which God has joined.

Obs. 12. The knowledge of God is a most excellent thing. This is that which sanctifies God's name, and manifests him to be very glorious in the world. Paul accounted all things but loss and dung in comparison of the excellency of this knowledge of Christ. Instruct then your children and servants in this knowledge, else how can God have his glory from them? How few are there which glorify God as God! and the reason is, because of the ignorance which is in their minds, Eph. iv. 18.

Obs. 13. Men may be very diligent in instituted worship, and yet very ignorant. None so acted in their instituted worship as these people, yet none so ignorant as they.

That you are forward in instituted worship is your commendation, but take heed this be not your sin, to be ignorant of fundamental things. It is the great design of the devil to set up the man of sin, to keep men in darkness and ignorance. Many who think themselves, and would be thought to be, opposers of antichrist, even by their very questioning of fundamentals of religion, and disputings about their new opinions, raise him up; the devil is wont to darken the truth of Christ and religion, by casting a veil over it: therefore, you that are guilty of this distemper, take heed, though you have light in some things, that a veil be not drawn over those things which do more nearly concern you, and are of greater consequence.

Obs. 14. Soul-worship must be preferred before all other worship. We must not give God a carrion service, a carcass without a soul. Strong are the expressions in Scripture which are used against such outside, formal worship. Isa. i. 11—13, God professes of them, that he regards them not, he is full of them, his soul loathes them, they are iniquity, and a trouble to him, they are looked upon as a burden to him, such as God will hide his eyes from, and when they make many prayers he will not hear them. In this one scripture we have fourteen expressions against outside, formal duties, beside the four which we find in Isa. lxxvi. 3. Thus you have the mind of God in this short but full sentence.

Now God forbid that what hath been said out of this scripture should be sinfully abused to carnal indulgence.

Ver. 7. But they like men have transgressed the covenant: there have they dealt treacherously against me.

Here is an argument, that mercy in the former verse is to be understood in a large sense; why? because it is the very substance of the covenant; they have been hard-hearted, cruel, and unmerciful, and thereby have transgressed the covenant. I am merciful in the covenant, and my grace is free and full to sinners there; but they have transgressed the covenant by being cruel and unmerciful: "But they like men have transgressed the covenant."

"Like men;" that is, like Adam; these men have sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression. Rom. v. 14, speaks of those who "had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression:" but these, as they have old Adam in them, so they have dealt with me as he did; and as he for his sin was cast out of Paradise, so these men have deserved to be cast out of the good land. But Vatablus, and Tremelius, and others, read the words thus, They have broken my covenant as a man, they thought that I had been as their fellow creature; as they made it their practice to break covenants with men, so they thought to do with God: so they have transgressed my covenant. This sense may be admitted; and hence it would be reasonable to observe, that the cause of breach of covenant with God is, because we consider not that it is with God that we make our covenants.

But the words are more usually read, as in our books, "But they like men have transgressed the covenant;" that is, not as I, who, like a God, have kept covenant; but they, like such men as themselves, i. e. weak, inconstant, frail, unfaithful creatures, have transgressed, Job xxxi. 33.

But may not this seem to be an excusing or diminution of their sin to say, "They like men," implying the common frailty of human nature, "have transgressed?"

No; it is rather an aggravation of their sin. Therefore the word here translated "men," is used for man in his corrupt estate, for weak, frail men; and so distinct from that which signifies generous and strenuous men: and so the comparison is not only between God and man, but between the several degrees of men.

Or thus, They have transgressed my covenant like men; that is, not like my people. Saints that are of my church, they have not transgressed my covenant so. Their ways have been the ways of ordinary men, and as such they have transgressed my covenant. The two last senses are principally meant here.

"My covenant." The covenant of God we usually divide into two parts; but the Scripture, to me, seems to hold forth a threefold covenant: the one of works, that which was made with Adam in Paradise. The second, that which was made with Abraham, the covenant of grace; the tenor of which is this, I will be thy God, and the God of thy seed after thee. Then the covenant made with them on Mount Sinai. Now the covenant here cannot be meant immediately of the covenant of works, nor of the covenant of grace, for this covenant here referred to is one especially made with them, and therefore must be understood of that at Mount Sinai, made many hundred years after the others; yet mediately it has reference to that of works, and of grace.

And were this knot rightly understood and untied, the Antinomians and we might easily be reconciled; for we grant that believers are delivered from the law in respect of the power of it, as condemning; from its rigour, but not from its duties; for the things commanded in the law were duties before the law was given, the law was written in the hearts of the saints from the beginning. But the opening of this point would require a whole exercise, and I shall reserve it to some other time.

Now, then, the covenant which they transgressed was the covenant at large, but especially that covenant which God made with them when they came into the land of Canaan.

"They transgressed;" the word is עברו they went over; the covenant was betwixt them and their sins, and they went over it to their sins, the bank was not high enough to keep them and their sins asunder.

"There;" they transgressed the covenant שם there, in that good land of Canaan into which God had brought them, and given them possession: so the Chaldee.

Again, "There" they transgressed the covenant, there where God had hewed them by his prophets, and thought to work them to good.

Lastly, "There," that is, in the covenant itself, and that in those things wherein they thought they kept the covenant, and thought they honoured me most; in those things they broke the covenant.

"Have they dealt treacherously." The Sept. renders it καταφρόνησε μου, they have despised me; they have forsaken me, and chosen other lovers; even as a woman leaves her own husband to whom she was engaged, and goes to other men. It denotes the heart's joining to some other rather than God, so as to be willing to leave the Lord, and, either out of affection to some other, or for private advantage, to forsake God and his cause, nay, to promote and further that which is against God. The notes from the words are these:

Obs. 1. It is God's goodness that he enters into covenant with such poor creatures as we are. It is made an aggravation of their sin here, that they falsified the covenant. The love of God in entering into covenant with such mean, worthless creatures, should constrain duty from us in the most difficult precepts, and that with willingness.

Obs. 2. God is constant in his covenant with men. This is in opposition to their unfaithfulness; they deal falsely with God in the covenant, but God is constant in his covenant, he confirms it with the strength of a giant. Dan. ix. 27, "And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week." The word there signifies, he confirms the covenant like a giant, or a mighty strong man: they, as weak men, break covenant with me, but I with strength confirm my covenant: therefore David saith, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5, "Yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure."

Obs. 3. Man's nature is very weak and unsettled. "They like men have transgressed the covenant." We must not lay too much upon men, for when most unfaithful they act but like men. Oh what folly is it in men to forsake the eternal God and run to the creature! We trust our servants in our businesses, and shall we not trust God much more? The word saith, "All men are liars;" nay, "every man at his best state is vanity." Psal. lxxii. 9, "Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity."

Obs. 4. The apprehension of our obligations should keep us within covenant. Oh never let be said, that our sins are so strong that they break covenant to attain their desires. It is a sign of a most vile, wretched spirit, so to desire sin, as to break over this bond of the covenant. Think of this, all you that are so easily overtaken with sin; when a temptation to any sin comes, say thus, Such a sin I would have, and my desires are after it, but did I never covenant against it? and what! shall I be so wicked as to break my covenant for it?

Obs. 5. Breach of covenant is a most grievous aggravation of sin; it provokes God highly against that people or person. "There have they dealt treacherously against me." Deut. xxix. 24, 25, "Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt." What cause have we to bless God that he hath not destroyed us for breach of covenant with him! Why should not our condition be the condition of this people here in Deuteronomy? Had God turned his hand and let our enemies prevail, this might have been our case.

Obs. 6. God expects that of his people which every one cannot do. They must not plead they are flesh and blood as other men, God would have you more than men; you must remember that you are saints and members of Christ, and therefore must live as the redeemed of the Lord. In 1 Cor. iii. 3, "Are ye not carnal, and walk as men?" the apostle rebukes the Corinthians for this; God looked that they should walk beyond other men, and that which the apostle makes the ground of his reproof, they make their excuse. Jesus Christ descended from on high, to this end, to purchase a peculiar people to himself, that might yield him honour in the world, beyond that which he has from other men. We should live as those which have the Divine nature in them; we should beware of passion and anger, even as God is slow to anger. How far are those from doing any eminent thing for God, who cannot deny themselves in their wills and passions, and have not even common humanity!

Obs. 7. Our keeping covenant with God is the effect of his grace; we have not that power of ourselves; therefore let us bless God for this mercy.

Obs. 8. Men may do many services and yet be covenant-breakers. It is possible for a man to have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and yet be a professor of Christ and the gospel; therefore we had need look to our hearts.

Obs. 9. We may be covenant-breakers even in those things in which we seem to be most religious. But may this be in the duties of God's worship? Yea, it may be, thus; when men shall think to cover any sin they live in, by their performing of duties, this is treacherous dealing, and playing false in the covenant.

Obs. 10. The sins of saints which break covenant are sins of a double dye; other men's sins are rebellions against God, but theirs are treacheries.

Obs. 11. The want of the right knowledge of God is the main cause of breach of covenant. Dan. xi. 32, "And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries; but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits." Who shall be corrupted by flatteries; those that know God? No, they shall be strong, and do great exploits; such shall be employed by him in his work.

Obs. 12. There can be no keeping covenant with God, where there is unmercifulness to men: let there be never such professions and expressions of religion in words, if there be cruelty and unmercifulness, there can be no keeping of covenant with God, Heb. iii. 10.

Obs. 13. The consideration that it is with God that we break covenant, is a humbling consideration. Against me who am their God, who have protected them from dangers, delivered them in straits, against me have they thus sinned. As, if a man should carefully bring up a poor child, and this child, when he came to years, should abuse and wrong him, would not this be ingratitude and unkindness indeed? so the consideration of what a God it is that we break covenant with, wonderfully aggravates our unkindness.

Ver. 8. Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity, and is polluted with blood.

We read in Numb. xxxii. 1, of the land of Gilead, which Reuben and the half tribe of Manasseh possessed, on the other side of the river; in it were divers cities of refuge, which were the cities of the Levites; one of them, the most famous, which gave name to the whole country, was Gilead: which thing is usual among us at this day; whole counties receiving their names from some eminent place in them, as Northampton, Northamptonshire; Leicester, Leicestershire. This city of Gilead, in which were the priests, should have been holier than the rest, but it was polluted, and from thence the rest of the places of the kingdom.

"That work iniquity." The words are פעלי און and signify, "that work iniquity," or vain things, with energy and effectually, as Pagnine saith פעל means, agere cum energia et effectu.

"And is polluted with blood." עקבה נמה supplanted or overturned with blood; the Levites who dwell there have undone the city. How many cities are supplanted and overturned by the priests which live in them, by their cruelties, by their subtrefuges, and subtle excuses for sin and wickedness! They supplanted these cities of refuge, which were for those who had shed blood at unawares, they flying to them being secure; and that they did in these four ways:

1. By taking those in which were wilful murderers, whereas the city was for the shelter of those who had killed any unawares; now these men would judge wilful murder to be but manslaughter, as we call it. And I wish our kingdom be not deeply guilty of this sin, even by this very distinction, when men in their passions shall make nothing of killing a man, and it is but accounted manslaughter; certainly God will never account it so, but even wilful murder.

2. By refusing to take in those whom of right they should, except they had good store of money to give them. When some that were poor applied for admittance, they would refuse or delay them, and by that means they were often taken by the pursuer of blood; for these priests were to judge of it.

3. By casting those out which were in, and could not be a source of gain to them: often they delivered such to the avenger of blood, when they should have protected them.

4. By their cruelty to those that would not join with them in their false worship. Perhaps they might some of them be men of tender consciences, and could not join with them in their superstitious worship; now these priests, perhaps, would complain of them to the magistrate, that they were troublesome persons and bred divisions, and by this means they got them out of the cities of refuge. And has not this been our case of late? Thus they supplanted these cities of refuge. The observations are,

Obs. 1. That through man's wickedness the best ordinances of God are corrupted. These cities of refuge were for special use, ordinances of God set apart for the saving, and they made them a means and instrument for the shedding, of blood. The sacrament is an ordinance set apart by God for union and communion; and what more prevents this than its abuse? men's coming unprepared separates tender consciences from joining with them. So likewise in civil ordinances for men's outward good, how have they been perverted! where have they tyrannized more, and used more cruelty and injustice, than in the very courts for the administration of justice? and such as should have seen equity performed, were the greatest instruments of oppression and mischief.

Obs. 2. We must not always judge of places from former circumstances. Gilead was a city famous for God's worship, yet now how defiled with blood! So Rome, how famous was it for the worship of God! yet now it is become the very filth of abomination.

Obs. 3. Places set apart for God's worship, if corrupted, become the worst of all. Gilead a city of refuge, yet where was there ever such a defiled and corrupted place? So in our universities and colleges, what superstitions and vanities have abounded! even like Augeus' stable, a place of filthiness and vileness. And this is no new thing, for Gregory Nazianzen reports of Athens, that it was the most full of superstitions, and acknowledges it a great mercy that God preserved him and Basil from those infections.

Obs. 4. To be a worker of iniquity is most abominable. "Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity." God's people sometimes are overtaken by sin, but they are never workers of iniquity; for the Scripture tells us, that he which works iniquity is of the devil.

Obs. 5. The clergy, if wicked, are the worst of all. No men can work out or bring to pass their own ends as they can. The priests were in Gilead, and they were the men who wrought the mischief. And have not our times sealed to this truth? Who have been so vile and wicked as our corrupted clergy? but how has God broken the plots, and crossed the designs, of these vermin!

Obs. 6. A wicked clergy overwhelms whole nations. These were they which overturned this city of Gilead: and thus would they have done to us, had not God, in his infinite wisdom and mercy, prevented their hellish plots.

Obs. 7. False worship and tyranny are joined together. Wherever you see tyranny there conclude there is false worship: therefore we had need to pray hard for the ordinances in their purity, that we may not have false religion, and consequent tyranny. Luther tells us, that the devil is a liar and a murderer; so that where there is a lie in God's religion, there is murdering.

Obs. 8. There are none so cruel as wicked clergymen; so they may have their wills and lusts satisfied, though it cost the blood of thousands of souls, they care not.

Obs. 9. Cruelty in the clergy is the worst of all; for it is required of them to be men of peace: but who are the great incendiaries of our times, and fomenters of these wars, but the vile, wicked clergy?

Ver. 9. And as troops of robbers wait for a man, so the company of priests murder in the way by consent: for they commit lewdness.

This verse has much of the former in it.

"Troops of robbers." The kingdom of Israel had their troopers robbing and spoiling up and down; and who were these robbers, but their priests? their priests were turned robbing troopers. And have not we this text literally fulfilled at this day in our kingdom? The gown is cast off and the armour put on, and now they are turned troopers. They were before murderers of souls, and now they are turned murderers of men's souls and bodies both; so that we might send their gowns after them, and say, as Joseph's brethren said to their father Jacob, Do not you know this? is not this your son Joseph's coat?

"Murder in the way." They stood in the way to rob; how was this? in what way did they rob? Jerome putting this question to a Jew, his answer was, That at the time of the passover, and the pentecost, the people used to come to Jerusalem, and as they were going in their journey, these priests would stand in the way and slay them: they were the least suspected of any; Gilead was a city which should have defended them from robbers, and they were turned robbers themselves. The notes are these:

Obs. 1. Wicked ministers are most outrageous against those that leave them, and cannot join with them in their superstitious and false worship. The priests were so.

Obs. 2. Wicked men, especially wicked priests, wait to do mischief; how much more should God's people wait for opportunities to do service for God, and for his people!

Obs. 3. Many people are nearest undoing when they think themselves most secure. It was the case of these poor travellers here; they thought themselves most safe and secure, and then were they slain and murdered by these wicked, robbing priests.

Obs. 4. Wicked men abuse the esteem which others have of them. These priests were the least suspected, and reputed harmless, innocent men, as at this day; and in other things, as in theft, many servants who are trusted by their masters, abuse their masters' confidence, and so are the more false.

Obs. 5. Judges are least called to an account for their wrongs, and therefore are the more bold to sin. These priests were to judge of murder done by others; now instead of judging others' murders, they murdered themselves; now who should judge of their murders? There follows,

"By consent." the word is שָׁמַח taken by Luther and others for the city Shechem, which stood near Jericho; and he saith, that Christ, in the parable of the man which fell among thieves between Jericho and Jerusalem, had respect to this place of Hosea. But I shall interpret it as in our translation, because I find it in another scripture signifying "consent:" "Then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent," Zeph. iii. 9. The word is שָׁמַח with one shoulder, and is a metaphor taken from oxen yoked together.

When God's people join together in a work, it should be a shame for any to withdraw from them. Thus these priests murdered by consent, they set to their shoulder in this wicked work, the one was not ignorant of what the other did. The note hence is,

Obs. 6. Wicked men can join together in wickedness, how much more should the saints join together for God! What shall we say to those differences which are made amongst us? It is not long since we were under antichrist's yoke; and were we not galled and pinched? Then why will you not take Christ's yoke on you, which is easy and light?

"They commit lewdness." זָמָה עָשׂוּ They studied wickedness, they plotted for it.

Obs. 7. None so plot wickedness as clergymen. Gilead is that wicked city of robbers; there the priests consulted together and plotted their wickednesses.

Obs. 8. Plotted wickedness is the most vile. Exod. xxviii. 6, the ephod was to be made of "cunning work," of a work which had much thought in it; so it is in the original. That work is מְשֵׁה הַמֶּלֶךְ Opere exsultativo. very good which has much thought and consideration in it; and that sin is wicked, with an aggravation, which is thought of and meditated upon; then it is lewdness. Think of this, all you that do plot and think of your sins before you do commit them: in those sins there is lewdness.

Luther renders the original here, "they do whatsoever they think," which may also be the force of the word "lewdness;" he saith that they had a proverb in Germany, that the monks were so wicked that there was nothing so bad which they could think of, but they would dare to do it. None so bold in sin, or dare to venture themselves so far, as wicked clergymen. Many men are vile and wicked enough, but they want capacity and confidence to vend and utter it; but these wicked priests could do it, calumniate and reproach without fear, these have impudent, bold faces; and concerning such I say no more but this, "The Lord rebuke them."

Ver. 10. I have seen an horrible thing in the house of Israel: there is the whoredom of Ephraim, Israel is defiled.

The Lord proceeds further in his complaint against Israel.

"I have seen an horrible thing." שְׁרִירָה a thing that may make the hairs of our head to stand on end; the Seventy translate it by φοκισθή, a word of something similar import, signifying, a storm in the sea. This word sometimes signifies the devil, as in Lev. xvii. 7, "They shall no more offer their sacrifices לַשֵּׁרִים unto devils, after whom they have gone a whoring."

Tremelius, in his comment, observes, that the letters are more than ordinary in this word here, to increase its signification; as if he had said, It is a horrible thing, a very horrible thing! What is this horrible thing? It was this, Ephraim had defiled himself. Whence,

Obs. 1. Idolatry is a very horrible sin. To worship a false god, and that for politic ends, as they did here, is a most horrible thing; to preserve their estates and their liberties, they fell from the true worship of God to worship at Dan and Beth-el. Jer. ii. 11, 12, "Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit. Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the Lord:" and chap. xviii. 13, "The virgin of Israel hath done a very horrible thing;" and chap. xlv. 4, "Oh, do not this abominable thing that I hate." God does not put an aggravation upon this sin beyond what is in it. It is usual with men, if any thing be done against them, to make it very horrible with circumstances and aggravations; but God never does so.

A notable example we have of man's aggravating an offence, Dan. iii. 14, "Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?" "Is it true?" the words in the original are, What desolations have these made, not to obey me! This is the manner of proud hearts, but not God's, he never speaks more against a sin, or punishes men more for sin, than it deserves. We can look upon God's judgments as horrible, but where is the man that looks upon sin as horrible? It may be you tremble at gross sins, but where is the man that trembles at false worship? The apparitions of the devil are very horrible to us; and sin is here expressed by the same words as the devil.

Obs. 2. Though we may seem to colour sin over, yet God sees it. "I have seen an horrible thing in the house of Israel."

Obs. 3. Idolatry is a provoking sin, but especially in the house of Israel. "I have seen an horrible thing in the house of Israel."

"There is the whoredom of Ephraim, Israel is defiled." Ephraim was the tribe of Jeroboam, and by Ephraim is to be understood the court and the nobles; there, saith God, did I see this abominable thing. Where the common people are generally wicked in a nation, it is a sign of much evil; if the gentry are profane, it is much worse; but if the nobility and those at the court are idolaters, it is night indeed. If Ephraim be vile, it is no marvel if Israel be defiled.

Ver. 11. Also, O Judah, he hath set an harvest for thee, when I returned the captivity of my people.

These words are something difficult; I shall show the meaning of them, thus: Judah has wrapped up herself in the same offence, in the same transgression received from Ephraim, the ten tribes, and it has grown up to a harvest of judgment, which has its set, appointed time.

But when? "When I returned the captivity of my people." This refers to the time mentioned in 2 Chron. xxviii. 6, where you find these three things: 1. The harvest set for Judah. 2. The captivity of Judah. 3. The return of their captivity. The harvest was set when "Pekah, the son of Remaliah, slew in Judah an hundred and twenty thousand in one day; because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers." What a harvest was here set! and the text saith, they "were all valiant men."

But what was it that provoked the Lord thus against them? Because they had forsaken the Lord, the God of their fathers. God's judgments in Scripture, cutting down a people, are compared to a harvest; Joel iii. 13, "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe." But where was this captivity? In 2 Chron. xxviii. 8. "And the children of Israel carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand, women, sons, and daughters." But when was their return? In the 9th verse, the prophet comes to them, and in the 11th tells them, they must deliver up their captives which they had taken from their brethren: these were brethren, as is clear, yet beheld their rage! yet, in the 15th verse, see how this affected them; they clothed, fed, and restored all their captives again presently. See the mighty power of the word to still the rage of the stoutest spirits. Oh that it might do so with us at this time, as it did here with this people! this would be a kindly work indeed. So that by this you may see what the harvest in the text is.

The notes from hence are,

Obs. 1. The sins of a people are seeds for a harvest of judgment, as their good actions are for a harvest of mercy.

Obs. 2. God has a fixed time for judgment; and though you have a time, yet know it is fixed; therefore sow as fast as you can, there will come a harvest ere long.

Obs. 3. In the time of God's judgments, he remembers mercy for his people. He has set a time for the return of their captivity.

Thus you have, I conceive, the genuine sense of these words. There are some that read them thus: Judah, since you are guilty also, you shall not enjoy your peace nor your lands in quiet, till God return your captivity; Israel shall not enjoy their harvest, but Judah shall.

Now that which makes me think this is not the meaning, is this, because the Lord still goes on to threaten Judah; I have "set an harvest for thee."

Some others interpret it thus: When God was about to turn away their captivity, Judah did so harden Israel in their way, that it was the cause of my hardening my heart against them, and not returning their captivity. Israel might think thus, Though we are bad, and in many things amiss, yet Judah, who are a people nearer to God than we, is also defiled.

Obs. 4. Many are ripened for judgment by the example of others, especially of great professors, and chiefly of professing and reforming churches, that have the name of pure worship in them. Let such be very wary what they practise, especially in a time of reformation, lest they harden others in their corruption.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1. When I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria: for they commit falsehood; and the thief cometh in, and the troop of robbers spoileth without.

This chapter is filled with complaints wholly against Israel. The two former chapters brought in Judah with them, but this chapter is spent wholly against Israel. Luther saith, that by the reading of this chapter, we may see that the church has always evils of one and the same kind, even at this day such as in those times. We have had a clear and lively pattern of this held forth to us in our times concerning our evils.

"When I would have healed Israel." Before, God took upon him the person of a husband, that would have recalled his adulterous wife: but in this chapter, he compares himself to a surgeon, who would have cured a wounded person; and his people he compares to such; but coming to cure them, he found their wound worse than he expected. As sometimes when a surgeon first comes to a wound, he thinks it not so bad and dangerous as indeed it is found on probing it, and all this while perhaps the patient remains very quiet and still; but when put to pain by searching of their wound, then they are froward, and struggle: So, saith God, many ways and means have I used to do them good, judgments, reproofs, and exhortations, but they grow worse and worse, the sins of Ephraim break forth, the sins of the court work out, and the sins of Samaria (which was the chief city) show themselves. In Isa. vii. 9, "The head of Ephraim is Samaria:" as if the wickedness of the court were complained of by some in the country.

"Then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria" did appear. The prophet looks upon Ephraim, the wicked court, and Samaria, the profane city, and sees death in the face of both; the sin of Ephraim and Samaria is in the head, which speaks them in a dangerous condition, Lev. xiii. 44. They add iniquity to iniquity, which shows their perverseness; and "he that is of a perverse heart shall be despised," Prov. xii. 8.

"The wickedness," רשעתם their wickednesses: "When I would have healed Israel, then the sin of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickednesses of Samaria."

Obs. 1. In great cities there is all manner of evils.

But now, when was God about to heal these ten tribes? to what period does this refer? Some interpret it to be, when God went about to cure the evils and the abominations that were in Rehoboam's reign, which was a very sad time: had he hearkened to the counsel of his wise, grave counsellors, it had been well for him and his people; but giving credit to the counsel of his young, inexperienced men, he endangered the very life of his kingdom by it; and when, through the pride of his heart, he would not hearken, God rent the greatest part of the kingdom from him, and gave it to Jeroboam; and now, when there were such hopes of delivering them from these their oppressions, then did the iniquity of Ephraim appear, then did they oppress and crush those which would not yield to their superstitious idols and false worship. But this cannot be the meaning of this passage, for at this time the ten tribes were not divided, nor broken off, neither was Samaria built, as we see in 2 Kings xvi. If this be not the time, then to what time does this refer? Surely to the period of Jehu's reign, who was made the surgeon of those times, who was anointed in Gilead, the city of surgeons: for God saith, "Is there no balm in Gilead, no physician there?" God used Jehu for the doing of a great deal of work for their cure, he destroyed and dissipated Jezebel and the priests of Baal; and when this was doing, the great courtiers of Ephraim and the citizens of Samaria came and gave him their counsel: Jehu, take heed what you do; be wise, consider what you do in such cases as these, take heed you do not overdo: you have done enough in destroying Baal's priests and putting down idolatry; but if, moreover, you pull down Dan and Beth-el, and suffer the people to go up to Jerusalem, you will lose all. Then farewell all obedience, your kingdom is lost. Then the citizens of Samaria come and tell him, that if he go on thus, they shall be undone and lose all their trading, and shall be separated: And why should this be, seeing there is no need of it? we may worship at Dan and Beth-el as well, and it will be more for our ease. This might be the language of the people; and in this the iniquity of Ephraim and the sin of Samaria appeared; and this was wickedness with a high hand. The observations are these:

Obs. 1. The sins of a kingdom are the sores of a kingdom. Isa. i. 6, "From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores." First in regard of their sins, then in regard of their miseries.

By this we may see that wicked men are the sores and wounds of a nation, parish, and family; therefore one having three wicked daughters calls them the imposthumes, or cankers, of his family; even so, wicked men defile wherever they come. Oh that people would think of this their condition! Thou that art a wicked man runnest up and down with filthy stuff, more odious in God's eyes than a leazar in our eyes.

As sin, so afflictions and miseries are the wounds of a kingdom, family, or person; and if we will not be sensible of the one wound made by sin, God will make us sensible of the other by suffering them. Our kingdom is like the man which fell among thieves as he went from Jericho to Jerusalem. Does not the nation lie now a bleeding? and where is the man that pities it? nay, are not men so far from pitying these wounds, that multitudes flock together to take advantage of our sores, even like the flies which suck out content and sweetness from the sores of poor creatures; I mean those who strive to suck out the blood of the kingdom in their offices and places, men that are altogether for themselves, and how they may make themselves and theirs great in the world, though the nation lie a bleeding. Aristotle tells us of a man, whose sores the flies using constantly to suck and lie upon, his friend coming by him, and seeing them upon him, beat them off; the man was discontented at it, saying, Alas! what have you done? I thought, replied his friend, I had done you a good turn. O no, for when these are off fresh ones will come, that will suck me worse than the others did before. Had we not those that did suck us before? have we forgotten those oppressions? shall we have worse now? It follows,

"When I would have healed Israel." Hence,

Obs. 2. The Lord is the healer of a people. It is he alone that can do it, and none but he; we may use many means to be healed, but all in vain, except the Lord heal us with pardoning and sanctifying mercies: Jer. xvii. 14, "Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved: for thou art my praise." So Psal. lx. 2, "Heal the breaches thereof; for it shaketh." How many are there that would go about to heal our wounds slightly! Jer. viii. 11. We are like many silly persons, who, feeling a little pain of their wounds, will needs have them skinned up and healed presently, and then they putrify and are worse than ever. But the Lord is the healer of his people, and when he heals he does it effectually. Many encouragements we have in Scripture to seek to God for healing, as the promise of God, 2 Chron. vii. 14, "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and forgive their sin, and will heal their land." Mark the connexion of these words; first seek to be forgiven, and then healed; if we should be healed before pardoned, we be to us, we should then be undone! Isa. lvii. 16—18, "I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made. For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him: I hid me, and was wroth, and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart." Now what may we think will become of him? Surely, now, nothing but desolation and destruction. No, saith God, "I have seen his ways, and will heal him: I will lead him also, and restore comforts unto him and to his mourners." Jer. iii. 22, "Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings." Oh that the answer of this people might be ours: "Behold, we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God."

Now the Lord cures accurately: as surgeons cure by purgation and allaying the misery; so the Lord heals his people by taking away the cause and the malignancy of that trouble which is upon them. So, thou that art under any particular trouble or affliction, if God sanctify that trouble by removing its cause, God may be said to heal, though the affliction be not quite taken away.

Then God may be said to heal by fomentation, as surgeons use to do, when the part is able to resist and oppose that which would feed the humour: so when the Lord puts strength into the soul to oppose disquieting and vexing thoughts, that sinks into the soul from its afflictions: now, where this work is accomplished, the soul is healed.

Obs. 3. God does not always will things according to his omnipotent power. "I would have healed Israel;" that is, I would and I did use all the means calculated to heal them.

But it may be objected, If God see that we are unable of ourselves to be healed, how can we be healed, when we have not the power?

Now, for answer to this, we must know, that men are not healed proceeds not so much from the want of ability as want of will; men do not do what they can, therefore they do not will to be healed. God does not make men unwilling, but speaks to us after the manner of men; though there be also an inability, yet because men think not of that in not turning, or because the inability is chiefly in the perverseness of the will, it is not a metaphysical inability, as I may so speak, but a formal wilfulness; and though men think that God is altogether to blame that they are not healed, God will make this one of his works at the day of judgment, to clear himself from those aspersions. Now men are so proud, that they think themselves too good and too lofty for God; but God will clear up all, and show himself to be righteous in their destruction.

Obs. 4. Much wickedness often lies hid in a kingdom, or person, till the means of cure appear. It was thus with Paul, Rom. vii. 9, "I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came sin revived, and I died;" yet, notwithstanding, God, by his almighty power, helped him over all difficulties. As, when a man begins to repair an old house which is rotten and decayed, he does not conceive the trouble of it, till he comes to remove the rubbish; who would imagine the wickedness that is in many men's hearts, which discovers itself when the means come? Had not God set many servants in good families, the vileness and the vanity of their spirits had not discovered itself. Certainly this is our condition. Some few years since there appeared much wickedness in England, but how much more since God has sent the means to cure it! as appears,

1. By a bitter spirit of malignancy against the power of godliness. No people so wicked as we were before, but now our wickedness is grown to a spirit of malice and opposition against the word and the saints. At the first, men cried out for a reformation, and cried down bishops; but when God's people began to rejoice, of a sudden what a desperate spirit of pride and malignancy was there raised to oppose strenuously the reformation so much desired! and this aggravated by a malice which, 1. Blinds men's eyes, so that they cannot see their misery by reason of the falsities, and flatteries, and treacheries used against Scotland, Ireland, and England. And, 2. Makes them, rather than they will be subject to the yoke of Christ, willing to be slaves to the worst of men, yea, to their vilest lusts: and doth not this show a desperate spirit against God?

2. A base, sordid spirit, that will rather endure perpetual slavery by vile men, than incur any risk.

3. A treacherous spirit. When men betray kingdoms, overthrow states, and deceive the trust and confidence reposed in them, undermine and destroy parliaments, does not this manifest a most vile spirit in the people of this kingdom? Heretofore the commonalty could not be brought to fight against the Scots, yet now there can be found a gentry to fight against the parliament.

4. A blasphemous spirit. This sin abounded before, but how much is it now increased! nay, are there not now new oaths invented and pressed?

5. A cruel, bloody spirit. Some few years since who could have imagined the cruelties that have been used by Englishmen?

6. A spirit of division. We should have thought that in a time of public calamity we should have sodered together; when there was private persecution more love was expressed; and that which makes the rents now the more sad is, that they are between the best people.

7. An oppressing spirit. Men formerly oppressed are now turned oppressors themselves. What doth this but presage what these would have done had they had the power in their hands? This iniquity is now discovered.

8. A spirit of envy. How are active men in public places envied and spited! and how many now stand neutral, and upon this very ground, because they see others not so rich as they employed! therefore they sit still and fret themselves, and seek to hinder them that are active in public service, and so the work is hindered.

9. A spirit of superstition. Would ever any man have thought that the parliament should ever have had such a party to oppose them in their reformations? We might rather have thought that there would have been a general spirit rising against these superstitious vanities, to have banished them for ever. Oh what misery do these rotten teeth put this kingdom to at this very day! This iniquity is also discovered.

10. A wanton spirit. Such opinions as were never known before, doubting of the immortality of the soul, that there is no visible church upon the face of the earth; and all this under the name of Christ and free grace. Now what does all this but show, that when God would have healed us, then did our iniquities appear? What sad presages are these of approaching miseries!

11. An unmerciful spirit. Every one seeking his own, and how he may make him and his great in the world, and neglecting the poor and those that are in distress. We have cause to say, O Lord, what shall become of us? Know this, that I may not altogether discourage you; though our times are miserable, yet are they not altogether like unto Israel. It cannot be denied but that our court has imitated Ephraim, which was their court; yet though the city of Samaria did join with Ephraim, the city with us has not sided with the court, but the bulk of it has kept faithful with their God; for which mercy the children yet unborn will have cause to bless God.

Obs. 5. When a people grow worse upon the means of healing, it is a sign that their condition is desperate. Isa. i. 5, "Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more." Jer. li. 9, "We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed." Ezek. xxiv. 13, "In thy filthiness is lewdness: because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more, till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee." Now, certainly, had not God found a party in this kingdom which closed with him when he would have healed us, we might have had occasion to make use of this scripture. How just were it with God to leave such a people as we are in our healing, because we are so impatient under the rod! Arias Montanus quotes out of Hippocrates, that the physicians in his time were bound by an oath to leave under their wounds to perish, such as were incorrigible, and would not endure the surgeons to cure them. When a man is engaged in a bad cause, and means are used to convince him, yet oftentimes he will become worse. Oh the vileness of men's spirits! We had need take heed that the cause we engage in be good, for how many men are there who defile their consciences, rather than yield to take shame to themselves for their sin! Oh what cause have we to fall down and be humbled for our iniquity, and to say as they in Jer. xiv. 18—20. So for particular towns and places where God sends the gospel, the means of grace, and that people is the worse for it, they have cause to tremble, and not to cry out against the preaching of the word as if that were the cause of it: this were most wicked and abominable. It was thus in Christ's time. We never read of any possessed with devils before Christ came; now shall we say it had been better that Christ had not come? O blame not the ministry, but your own hearts; and consider of this, you that God is working upon, the Lord comes close by the ministry of his word to heal you, and then you discover your wickedness and rotten hearts. The Lord stirs such a conscience, and begins to heal such a soul. Now it is the devil's policy to spoil such beginnings. Now, thinks the devil, if I can make such a soul commit a sin against conscience, or live in the omission of any known duty, the word then will never more work to benefit such a man. I have heard of one who, being troubled in conscience for committing that great sin of uncleanness, the devil tempting him to commit it again, told him if he would he should never be troubled more for it; the poor man yielding, and venturing upon it again, after he had done it was indeed never tempted again, nor troubled more, but lay afterward in a languishing, senseless condition, and so died. O take heed of this, you that are convinced in your consciences of the evil of such and such courses, for it is the great policy of the devil to make thee, who art convinced in conscience, to sin against conscience, and then he thinks the work is lost; the devil does not much fear the word's working upon him whom he has prevailed upon to live in secret known sins, and to venture upon the commission of sins against conscience. You who are under God's healing hand, be silent, and submit quietly: be not froward, you that are in troubles of conscience, hearken for a word from God; as the men of Ben-hadad did from that king, in 1 Kings xx. 33, they hearkened diligently whether any words of comfort fell from him, and caught at them hastily. Know that it were just with God to make you as the people spoken of in Isa. vi. 10. This concerns all, but especially those that are in trouble of conscience. Those that God begins to stir and work upon, take heed, I say; does Christ himself begin to work upon you? does he desire to heal you? is he willing to offer his blood to cure you by applying it to your wounded consciences? Let not the corruptions of your hearts now break forth, take heed now of sins against conscience, lest he let you perish in your lusts. Be willing to let God alone to do his work in you, lie quiet and still, take heed of murmuring and repining speeches, but follow on the work begun, and beseech him not to leave you till it be completed in you, and the great hazard of your mis-carrying over. Little do you imagine those sins will weigh down and burden conscience which now you commit against its light. What a torment will it be to thy conscience to think, that at such a time I felt Jesus Christ coming to heal my soul in the ministry of his word; oh happy had it been for me, if I had lain under his hand, and kept his salve upon my sore! but because it was for the present troublesome, I cast it off, and went into such company, and listened to such temptations, and by this means have wounded my soul anew most desperately; and now what can I expect, but that the Lord should for ever forsake me, and leave me to die in my sins and wallow in my blood, and his eye not pity me, and make me to inherit the curse of that people, whose ears should be deaf that they should not hear, whose eyes should be blind that they should not see, and be converted, and I should heal them?

"They commit falsehood; and the thief cometh in, and the troop of robbers spoileth without." Furthermore, in these words the prophet shows in what particulars their iniquity did appear: they committed falsehood, they wrought a lie in regard of their falsehood, their false worship; and then in regard of their oppression, wronging one another, but especially in falsifying their trust one to another, and in their relations, not performing the duties which their relations called for, and bound them unto; so the word in the original קָרָה properly signifies. "They commit falsehood" that is, they commit such a sin as the breaking of that duty which the law of their relation calls for from them. The notes hence are,

Obs. 6. It is the description of a wicked man, to commit falsehood. As the godly man is said to be for the truth, and to do the truth; so wicked men are against the truth, and do contrary to the truth: as the devil is said not to abide in the truth, even such are these who commit falsehood, and work a lie.

Obs. 7. It is a forerunner of great mischief, when people are false in their relations. In Micah vii. 5, 6, it was an ill time when all sorts of people were so unfaithful in their relations.

Obs. 8. There is much secret wickedness committed by men of false religions. "And the thief cometh in, and the troop of robbers spoileth without." Such as these are secret and cunning workers of mischief in church and state. Gal. ii. 4, "Because of false brethren un-awares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage." It is a great evil in a commonwealth to have secret oppressors, but far worse to have public spoiling. We have had much of the first formerly, and the Lord knows how much more of the second we may further taste of: I verily believe, there is none that ever thought the enemy would have spoiled in such a manner as he has done, and that ever Englishmen would have endured it; and we are the first people that ever endured such oppressions, that were not slaves before; and what the counsels and thoughts of God are in this thing concerning us we cannot tell. "Violence and spoil is heard in her; before me continually is grief and wounds." What then? "Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem, lest my soul depart from thee," Jer. vi. 7, 8. The first part of this scripture is ours at this day, grief and wounds are continually before us: but "be thou instructed," O England. In what? In this, that dreadful breach which sin has made between the king and parliament; be instructed in this. Jer. xv. 13, "Thy substance and thy treasures will I give to the spoil without price, and that for all thy sins, even in all thy borders." So Isa. xlii. 22, 24, "But this is a people robbed and spoiled; they are all of them snared in holes: they are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore. "Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers? did not the Lord, he against whom we have sinned?" Who among you will give ear and hearken to this? Men are wicked and tyrannical; but who is he that has given this our land to the plunderers? Is it not the Lord? Therefore we should look beyond the troubles, the hand that strikes, to God, who gave them their commission, and delivered us up into their hands. When God gives up a people to the robbers and spoilers in such a kind, his wrath is said to come upon them; as in the 25th verse, "Therefore he hath poured upon him the fury of his anger, and the strength of battle."

Ver. 2. And they consider not in their hearts that I remember all their wickedness: now their own doings have beset them about; they are before my face.

"They consider not in their hearts." וְלֹא יִחַשְׁבוּ לְלִבָּם They say not to their hearts. This phrase in other scriptures is used for saying in their hearts. Jer. v. 24, "Neither say they in their heart, Let us fear God, that giveth rain." And in Eccles. i. 16, considering, is communing with our own hearts; I spoke, or consulted, with my heart. From this phrase of speaking thus to our hearts, we may,

Obs. 1. It is a good thing to be often speaking with one's own heart, thus: O my soul, how is it with thee? how stand things between God and thee? what terms standest thou in for eternity? canst thou look upon God's face with comfort and not be afraid? what guilt is there in thy conscience? canst thou behold eternity and rejoice in the thoughts of it? Such meditations and questionings as these would be very profitable for the soul. Many people can talk abroad in company of these things, but where is the man that sets apart time to question with his soul about these? Psal. iv. 4, "Stand in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still." There are in the soul many times boisterous distempers, but then we should cause a silence and a calm in our hearts, bid them be still. There are great distempers in that family where the husband and the wife go two or three days together, and speak not one to another; so there is no less distemper in that soul, which can go two or three days without questioning itself, and examining its condition. But what is it they should speak? This,

"That I remember all their wickedness." The Vulgate renders it thus, Lest they should consider. Do not you think that God remembers the sins of your forefathers only, that they were vile and wicked; no, but I also remember the sins that are present before me. But the reading of the words in your books is most agreeable to the original; therefore Luther saith, that these words are a reproof of their security: the princes, they feel not the judgment, although the principal actors in the wickedness; and although the common people suffer much, yet they attribute their sufferings to any thing rather than to their sins. Hence,

Obs. 2. God remembers the wickedness of people, though long since committed. As we may see in the case of Amalek, God remembers this their wickedness many hundred years after; 1 Sam. xv. 2, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt." Amos viii. 7, "The Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob, Surely I will never forget any of their works." Nay, they are not only remembered, but recorded: "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond," Jer. xvii. 1. Every oath, every lie, yea, and every vain thought, which thou hast committed, and continest in under an impenitent condition, know, that thy sins are remembered; and that thou mayst be sure of it, see what is said, Job xiv. 17, "My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity." They are sealed in a bag: as the clerk of assize seals up the indictments, and at the assizes brings his bag and takes them out; even so will God; as God has his time to seal up men's transgressions in his bag, so he will have his time to take them out, to reckon with sinners for them, and then woe to them! Deut. xxxii. 34, "Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures?" It is sealed up to be remembered, though perhaps committed forty or fifty years ago; and it is thy sin if thou dost not remember them, when and where they were committed; and if thou wilt not, know, that God has his time to take thee know them.

Obs. 3. Wicked men consider not that God remembers their sins. In Psal. xciv. 5-7, they commit horrible wickednesses, daring sins, yet they force themselves not to believe that God takes notice of them and remembers them; "they say, The Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it." The Jews tell us, that when Jeroboam's hand was dried up, the false prophets told him that this was but by chance, and so kept him from thinking of God that had smitten him. Did men consider that it is God that remembers them, it would work humiliation in them, and stop them in their sins. Were the danger that sin brings men into always in their eye, they would think it both a great madness and folly to sin against God. Joshua thought it so; Is the iniquity of Peor a small thing in your eyes, that you should add more to it? Didst thou know that God remembers the sins of thy youth and thy maturer age, thou wouldst fear that, on the next sin thou committest, God might bring upon thee all thy previous transgressions. As a man that has used his body to drink poison, for a time may do well, but at last he is overcome, and destroys himself; so the next sin which thou committest, though it be less than former transgressions, it may set all the rest on working: as, suppose there be many barrels of gunpowder in a room, and a few grains lie scattered about, and a spark falls into that, and so fires all the rest; so thy former sins are as the barrels of gunpowder, the next sin thou committest, especially if a sin against knowledge, may be the grains which set all the rest on work to pull down judgment upon thee. There is no argument so powerful to keep men from their sins, as the consideration that God sees and knows them all, and will remember them.

Obs. 4. When God punishes for sin, he manifests that he remembers sin. 1 Kings xvii. 18, the woman of Zarephath questions the prophet, saying, "What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?" God's hand being upon her, brought her sin to remembrance. How do the consciences of men dictate this to them in their afflictions. This cross is for such a sin, this misery for such a base lust that thou wouldst have fulfilled at such a time; God now puts thee in mind of such an act of uncleanness, such a time thou wert cruel and hard-hearted. This is clear in Joseph's brethren, whose sin was committed twenty-two years before trouble came upon them. You that have committed many sins a long time ago, and think they are forgotten, it is not so; even if the guilt of them be taken away by Christ, know that there will come a time in which thou shalt be put in mind of them: as a man that in his youth gets many a bruise and rub, which then he undergoes well enough, and never complains of; but when he grows old, or has an infirm body, then every rain and change of weather will remind him of the previous injuries: but this is the saints' privilege, that God never so remembers their sins, as to condemn them for their sins. It follows,

"All their wickedness: now their own doings have beset them about; they are before my face." Luther saith, their studied wickedness, their contrived iniquities, have beset them round about, or their doings have compassed them round. These words have reference to malefactors, who shift up and down, but at the last are beset and seized: just so their sins had beset them, that they could no way escape. Or, as soldiers beleaguer a town, and will not let any in or out; so men by their sins are besieged, and brought into such a condition that there is no way for comfort to come at them, or for them to avoid the judgments which are coming upon them: men's sins are like the six men in Ezek. ix. 2, "And, behold, six men came from the way of the higher gate," to beset the gates of the city. And know, O thou bold sinner, that God has his time to beset thee with thy sins and his judgments, to awaken thy conscience by setting thy sins in order before thee; and this is the great reason why men cry out in the horror of their consciences, because they are beset with their sins. What a sad condition were this city in, if beleaguered with a hundred thousand men! Every man's sins are worse, and endanger a man more, than millions of enemies can do; man shall need no other enemy than his own iniquity: thine own iniquity shall find thee out, it shall find thee as in a snare. Prov. v. 21, "For the ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings:" that is, I so remember their sins, as if they were all present before me, committed at this very instant; so that thou art to consider that God does not only remember thy sins, but they are before God's face, so that God never can look about him, but they meet his view. Thou hast committed a sin, and perhaps art troubled for it, but after a while thou forgettest it, and the trouble is blown over; but God looks upon it as now presently committed: for as there is no beginning of eternity, so there is no succession. If thou wert to go to the Lord's table, thou wouldst not go in a drunken fit, or immediately after an act of uncleanness; but God at that very instant looks upon thee as drunken, unclean, and filthy, though the act may be past many years before.

Ver. 3. They make the king glad with their wickedness, and the princes with their lies.

"They make the king glad." First, By their ready compliance with his commands regarding false worship. The king and the princes were glad to see their edicts willingly yielded to and obeyed: at first, when the commands came from Jeroboam to change the way of God's worship, they had cause to fear that it might not take with the people, there would be some difficulty to make them change the way of God's worship; but when they saw it go on currently without contradiction, they rejoiced.

Secondly, By their flattering of him in his wicked ways. They not only yielded to his unlawful edicts, but commended them, and applauded him for his care and tender respect for them, in shortening their journey, that they should not go so far as Jerusalem to worship; and they flattered him in this extremely, telling him that this was the way to establish his kingdom.

Thirdly, By their own wickedness and profaneness. At this the king was glad; and why? because he then knew his design was accomplished; he had made them wicked in their lives, by letting them have their will in evil, and now he no longer feared their scrupling to worship the calves at Dan and Beth-el. Thus they made the king glad. Hence, Obs. 1. Wicked people are easily led aside by the examples of their governors. Which way superiors go, the multitude will go: if they observe external decorum, they will do the same; if they do wickedly, they will do so likewise; though they do not love their prince, yet, that they may have their prince's favour, they will sin against God.

Obs. 2. It is wickedness for any people to obey the unlawful commands of their governors. This people might think this was no sin in them; What! must we not obey our governors, and be subject to authority? yet we see the Holy Ghost calls it wickedness. So how many are there, who for their worship have no other authority but their superiors, their governors! this will never pass current in God's account.

Obs. 3. It is a vile wickedness to flatter princes. Yet, how has this been the constant course of courts! It is reported of Dionysius, that when he spit, his flatterers would lick it up, and say, it was sweeter than honey. It is vile in the people to flatter, and more vile in princes to love to be flattered. Cyril on this text saith, Had the fear and love of God been in this people, it would have kept both them and their princes; it would have balanced their spirits, and enabled them to have withstood such wicked commands.

Obs. 4. It is a most vile thing to make any glad with, or to be made glad by, wickedness. Yet how many are guilty of this sin! Some are so hardened in their wickedness, that they will make others drunk, and then laugh at them when they have done so: how far are these from David's temper, whose eyes ran down with tears because men kept not the law; and horror took hold upon him! There is no greater sign of a desperate heart hardened in sin, than to laugh at sin in others, and make a sport of it in themselves; and the higher men are in place and dignity, the greater is the aggravation of their sins: for princes, who are set to be punishers of sin and a terror to evil-doers, to rejoice at iniquity is most horrible! Prov. xxix. 12, "If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked."

"With their wickedness." Note,

Obs. 5. The king is in a sad condition, when his ends must be accomplished by the wickedness of the people. Such are the dispositions of these men, that they will do any thing rather than suffer the least punishment; as amongst us some men have no conscience left in them to check them; but these precise puritans, as they term them, will suffer and die rather than sin against God and wrong their consciences. Now these priests and their officers, whom the prophet here speaks of, they would reason thus: If I should cross the king's mind I would lose my place, be put out of my office, and suffer a great deal of trouble: and rather than they will run such risks, they will join any design to ruin that which crosses them. yea, though it be the worship of God. Ecolampadius saith, that bad princes are always enemies to the strict ways of religion; and such as are the strictest in those ways, and walk most agreeable to the word, and are tender in their conscience, fearful to sin against it, these are disregarded and discountenanced, but those that are most wicked are accounted the best subjects, and these they will trust; therefore, where there is no religion, slavery soon follows: that people may be brought to any thing, who have lost their religion; but where profession is maintained, it will teach men to stand for their liberties, and not to yield against the truth. But what! does religion teach men rebellion? does it deny obedience to governors? No, by no means; religion teaches obedience to governors, and the more religious any man is, the more obedient he will be to lawful authority: the gospel commands obedience to governors, but not to tyranny, not to the mere wills and humours of others, God never made such a difference between men; religion never teaches disobedience to lawful authority, to such as rule in the Lord.

"And the princes with their lies," Luther refers this to the lie of their false worship, their idolatry, which the Scripture calls a lie, Rom. i. 25, "Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator." This is not, however, the full meaning and scope of the words; but thus:

They put their false glosses upon their false worship, to make it to take with the people and with the princes. The priests did not only submit and yield to them themselves, but encouraged the people, telling them it was decent and comely in the worship of God.

Or thus: By denying whatsoever may hinder them in their false worship. If the prince should by any means hear that his commands were not likely to take with the people, and so his ends be defeated, they would boldly come and affirm the contrary; or if they had an ill success, they would deny it, and say they had none, it was but a slander which was put upon them by these factious puritans; they would make the princes believe they had good success, when their designs were crossed and hindered.

But chiefly, they made "the princes glad with their lies," by raising slanders and evil reports upon the names and persons of those who might stand in the way to cross and hinder them, they blasted such men as were in credit in the eyes of the people; and those in authority loved this at the heart, this was mighty pleasing in the eyes of the princes: and this certainly was the plot of the priests who, at that time, were enemies to the true worship of God.

The notes are,

Obs. 6. All idolatry is but a lie in God's esteem, he looks upon it as a deceitful thing.

Obs. 7. Idolaters are wont to further their false worship by lies; to tell of their good success when they have none; and when matters turn out ill, to say their success is as good as heart could desire; but this in special is their trick, to slander and disgrace those that stood in their way. The text in Jer. xx. 10, saith that they waited for the prophet's halting, and said, "Report, and we will report;" do you say the thing, and we will affirm it, we will spread it abroad; report, and let us alone with it then, we will never stand examining the truth of it, we heard it reported, and that is sufficient. In later times, what calumnies and reproaches were by the papists raised against Luther! men set on work on purpose to do it. You may perceive my strait at this time, how loth I am to rake in these filthy puddles, and yet led by this scripture so fully to it, that I must either balk the mind of God, or else touch upon these jarring strings; but I shall, for peace' sake, for the present wave it, and reserve it to its more convenient place; howbeit, this will stick to some whose course it has been: but how vile and wicked is this course! for what recompence can such possibly make for the wrong done? The evils of slander are many.

First, It cannot be expected that an answer should suddenly come to clear away the reproaches. Secondly, When an answer is come, it will be but one's yea and another's nay. Thirdly, If it should be satisfactory, all the amends that can be made is a recantation, I am sorry, I was misinformed, I had letters of it; and this is a poor requital. Fourthly, It is a question whether ever the answer shall spread as generally as the calumny.

Obs. 8. It is an evil thing to make men glad with lies. This was their sin here, they had made the princes glad with their lies.

You had need look to yourselves when you hear reproaches and slanders against instruments of public good. Do you secretly love and cherish them? If you do, it is a sign there is rottenness in your hearts. It is evil to sow reports and slanders, but to harrow them in is worse: he that reports, is he that sows slanders; and he that carries the report and spreads it, is he that harrows it in.

Ver. 4. They are all adulterers, as an oven heated by the baker, who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough, until it be leavened.

This verse needs but little opening, and the rather, because the 6th verse has much to the same effect.

"They are all adulterers, as an oven heated by the baker:" either spiritual or corporeal adulterers. Is the heat of either like to an oven? Therefore let every one take heed of that which may kindle this fire, either of corporeal or spiritual adultery: 1. An inward heat. 2. Violent, that turns every thing to its own increase. 3. A heat abiding, collected, and resting; not of a heart, which scatters the heat, but as the heat in an oven.

Now if wicked, sinful heat be so kept in and compacted, how much more should our heat be kept in and compacted for God, in the duties of his worship! When we come to prayer, perhaps we have a little heat, but it is scattered and confused: if a man were to heat a pot upon the fire, he would take it ill if another should scatter the fire abroad. The devil comes and scatters our heat, and spoils us in our affections: now, we should oppose the devil in this. It follows,

"Who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough, until it be leavened." Jerome and others greatly aid in understanding these words, by a tradition of the Jews, which was this: They say, the intent of Jeroboam for altering of religion was very hot, but not knowing how it would take, they sent abroad spies to see how the people stood affected, and gradually to leaven them; they thought if this their design were urged upon them of a sudden, it would not take, but if by degrees, it might gain upon men's minds. Thus Jerome and Cyril. As, when the baker ceases from kneading, he does not presently put it into the oven, but lets it lie, that the leaven may run through it; so Jeroboam and his princes were like this baker, they were set upon their design, and it they would have, but they would have the people first leavened previous to their putting it into execution: and Cyril adds, that those who went to persuade the people, artfully told them it would be for their ease and profit not to go up to Jerusalem, but to petition the king, that he, out of his princely love and wisdom, would permit them to worship at Dan and Beth-el. And here lay the top of the plot; the king's design, so much desired by him and his princes, must yet be brought about by the people, they must petition to the king that he would grant this liberty to them, to worship at Dan and Beth-el, and that they might not go up to Jerusalem. By this you may see, how wicked and wise idolaters are for the accomplishment of their purposes; by this means princes obtain their ends, and their plots remain undivulged.

Behold the cunning plots of the devil, to delude poor souls in matters of worship; therefore, we had need to look to our ways, we have to deal with cunning princes and subtle men.

This means was of late used among ourselves; our bakers have been kneading their dough, but they had heated their oven too hot, and so their cake proved over-baked, abortive, and came to nothing; and we have cause to bless God, who gave them up to this violence of rage. These in Jeroboam's time were wise enough to carry on their designs with moderation, policy, and secrecy, and so succeeded; our enemies were not.

And as wicked men do stay and are contented to wait, till the fittest time comes for the accomplishment of their wicked plots, so the devil is contented to wait; he first tempts the soul to sin, and when the temptation has prevailed, he stays and lets the sin work a while, therefore take heed of letting a temptation prevail; do not roll it up and down in your thoughts, saying, What if I should do such a thing? what if I should not? now know, that the devil is a leavening your hearts, and when your hearts are thus leavened, he will come in with such strength of temptation that you shall not be able to resist him; therefore, as Christ bade his disciples beware of the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees, so take heed of this leaven of Satan. In this the devil deals as God does with a sinner in the gospel. The gospel is compared to leaven in Matt. xiii. 33. God leavens the heart with some truth or other, and there lets it lie and soak a while in the soul; he casts into the soul some truth, and does not presently urge it on the soul with violence, putting it forthwith upon difficult duties, which it is not capable to perform at the first, but lets these truths lie, soak, and spread in the heart, till such time as the disposition and savour of the heart be moulded and changed into the truth; and then the Lord comes in with other truths, and works them upon the heart, which it was neither fit nor capable of before. And it were wisdom in the ministers of the gospel to take this course, not violently to urge strict and hard duties upon new converts; but press the gospel to them, and there let it lie and soak a while upon the spirit: and blessed is that soul which is thus leavened; the Lord will carry on this work to perfection; these beginnings, the Lord, in his time, will finish.

Ver. 5. In the day of our king the princes have made him sick with bottles of wine; he stretched out his hand with scorers.

There is no preposition "in" in the Hebrew, it is only יום מלכותו. The day of our king. The people being leavened with Jeroboam's idolatry, now make their acclamations in honour of their king, and rejoice in the forms of worship which he and his princes had set up, and would not regard the requests and petitions of some few who desired it might not be established; and though they were bound in conscience to go up to Jerusalem, yet, notwithstanding, the king would send forth his edicts, to tell the people there should be no more going up to Jerusalem, but to Dan and Beth-el; now at this they rejoice, and cry out, Oh the day of our good king, which has set his good people at liberty, and eased us of our great journey to Jerusalem, to the danger of the kingdom, and is an enemy to those precise people!

This day of their king, was either the day of his birth, or his coronation-day, or the day in which he set up the calves at Dan and Beth-el. Now it cannot be imagined but that there were some murmurings amongst some of the people, they were not all inclined to consent to the setting up of the calves; therefore they did it by a stratagem, taking advantage of the mirth and triumph in the day of their king. Or thus: If the people were not thoroughly leavened by this means, they would take this course; Come, we will go set up our king, and magnify our king, and this will prepare the people to receive any thing he enjoins. Let the citizens be in their gowns, and the gentry in their array, and let the king be amongst them, and show himself courteous and loving to the people, and now let us cry out, Oh our good king! This is the day of our king!

Those who refer this day to the day of his birth,

Obs. 1. That we never read in Scripture of any godly king that celebrated his birth-day, but of three wicked kings, Pharaoh, Gen. xl. 20; Jeroboam, in this text; and Herod, in Mark vi. 21: not that it is altogether unlawful to celebrate or observe a birth-day, or a coronation-day, if it be observed with two cautions:

1. That it be not made as a holy-day, a holiness put upon it; for God never gave that power to man, to set a day apart as holy for his use.

Obj. What! may not man set days apart for humiliation or thanksgiving? Yea, he may. Then what is the difference between God's setting of days apart for holy uses, and man's doing the same?

Answe. The difference lies in this: time and things set apart by God for holy employments and services, besides that they make the duties more holy, and the ordinances more solemn and spiritual, than they are upon a day which man appoints, (for man's appointment puts no holiness upon the duties which are done upon those days,) there is a continued holiness in them, as in ministers, &c.; but there is no more holiness in days and times set apart by man for God, than there is holiness put upon the paper on which the Bible is printed: the printer takes out so many reams of paper from his heap, and sets them apart to print the Bible; now will any man think this paper is more holy than the rest?

2. Provided that God do not at that time call for some other duty or service from us. Man must not so tie himself, by any institution of his own, as to cross God's providence: as suppose I have set a day apart for thanksgiving, providence may so order, that God that very day may call for a day of humiliation; now if I should keep a thanksgiving day, and so cross providence, being called to humiliation, I should sin. These two things being observed, I know nothing to the contrary but that it may be lawful to observe a day. A man may remember his birth-day with this view, to be humbled for not doing the work we are called unto; so men married may, at the revolution of the year, bless God for the mercies they have enjoyed in that ordinance entered into on that day: but how many are there who have little cause to remember either that, or their birth-day! nay, may they not rather, with Job, curse the day of their birth? Suppose you should hear a voice from heaven this day, that you must die and not live, that this must be the last day you should live, tell me then, could you bless God for the day of your birth? would the thoughts of it be delightful to you? Philip the Third, king of Spain, who lived so strictly that he never committed any gross crime, or known sin willingly; yet, when he came to die, is reported to have cried out, Oh that I had never reigned! that I had lived a private life in the wilderness, that I might not have to answer for not doing the good, or hindering the evil, which I might have done! It is a sad thing, when men come to die, not to be able to look back with comfort to their past lives, to a faithful discharge of their duties: had Jeroboam kept his birth-day in this manner, there had been no evil in it; but his keeping of it was only to satisfy the flesh, till he himself was sick with wine: in such days, Bacchus and Venus have the greatest portions.

Obs. 2. Festival days are usually made distemp'ring days, days of provocation. "Made sick with bottles of wine." This wine is like that in Deut. xxxii. 33, "Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps:" this wine of asps makes the spirits warm, and the body sick. Job knew the danger of feasting; therefore, when his children were feasting, he was sacrificing. They made the king drunk with wine. This was the way which they took to gain the king. And is not this the course which is taken now in our days, to betray the young gentry into base filthiness? This was the plot of these priests, first to make the king drunk, and then they could do any thing with him, could get any edict from him to serve their own base ends, to suppress the precise and godly among them.

Obs. 3. Drunkenness is an old court sin. See how the prophet, Isa. xxviii. 1, fills his mouth with wōds and threatenings against the drunkenness of Ephraim; "Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim!" The court, the crown of Ephraim, was at Samaria. A miserable thing it is, that those who have the most opportunity for God, should spend their time in such beastly vanities, and do to their bodies and souls as Richard the Third to his brother, drown them in a butt of sack.

Obs. 4. Drunkenness brings diseases. "Be not among wine-bibbers, among riotous eaters of flesh; for the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty." How many are there which carry about with them the marks of their lusts, as Paul carried about him the marks of the Lord Jesus! Men will venture much for their lusts, but if Christ call them to suffer any thing for him, then they are tender and sickly; but let their estates, healths, and credits stand in the way to hinder them in the pursuit of sinful desires, they will break through them all: now, a shame is it for a Christian not to do more for God, than these men will do for their lusts. Timothy is commanded to drink but a little wine, and that for his refreshment, to help nature; but when men drink and make sots of themselves by it, what diseases does this bring on them! The Scripture tells us, that the saints' bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost; do you think that such a body as this is like to be a temple? no, but rather like matter for the very sink of hell, where all filth shall be fuel for everlasting burning. How canst thou answer the weakening of thy strength by this lust, when God demands all thine energies? It may be thou wilt say, thou wert never dead drunk; but wert thou never so distempered as to weaken thy powers, and make thee unfit for service? How sinful then is the practice of those that drink others' healths, till themselves are sick through excess!

Obs. 5. Drunkenness is most of all vile in governors, men of place and power. Prov. xxxi. 4, "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink." It is not for them; and why? because they are above us, and how can any man endure to be under drunken beasts? they are gods, and how vile and abominable is it to have drunken gods! Therefore the Carthaginians made a law, that none of their magistrates in the time of their magistracy should drink any wine.

Obs. 6. It is much more vile to make others drunk, than to be drunk ourselves. Therefore in Esth. i. 8, "the drinking was according to the law; none did compel; for so the king had appointed to all the officers of the house, that they should do according to every man's pleasure;" none were compelled to drink more than they were willing. You may think they express a great deal of love to you, in drinking to you, and pressing you to drink; but when they have overcome you, then will they laugh at you, and make you a scorn; especially if they can get you who are professors of religion to be overtaken. Therefore you had need above all men to take heed of this sin, for if you fall, religion suffers, and the name of God is evil spoken of by your means; therefore Christ himself warns his disciples to take heed of surfeiting and drunkenness. Therefore you that are professors had the more need to take heed of this sin, and mind this exhortation of Christ.

Obs. 7. Drunkenness is especially vile when we pretend to praise God. When God shows thee mercy, and thou pretendest to praise him for it, then to take liberty to exceed in creature indulgence, this is most abominable. We have had many days of thanksgiving to praise God for his mercies; if we have been excessive in the use of the creatures, he humbled, it is an ill requital of God for his mercy.

"He stretched out his hand with scornors." יַצִּיף here translated "scornors," is variously rendered by the Sept. by λοιμῶν, pestilent persons, Psal. i. 1, and Prov. xxii. 10; by ἀκολαστος, untamed, or wanton, Prov. xxi. 11; and elsewhere, by ὑπερηφανεύς, proud, and ἀφρονεύς, without understanding.

Luther translates the word by κακοῦς, evil workers, and interprets it of false teachers, that delude the people and deprave the Scriptures; and this kind of scorning, by perverting the Scripture, is the worst of all others, it is most abominable. Job xx. 14, "His meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him;" the word in such men's spirits is turned into bitterness. These scornors, who were they? The nobles and the princes, the officers in the court, these were the men who scorned at the people for going up to Jerusalem to worship, and thereby forfeiting the king's favour, their places at court, their honours and preferments, and all for a mere circumstance, and a trifle, as they thought; and this was at the time of their feasts and jovialities, when they might both harden the hearts of the king and people. Now "he stretched out his hand" to them, that is, 1. He encouraged them, and gave them his hand to kiss. How unlike is this to God, of whom Job saith, that he will not give his hand to the wicked, to malignants! Job viii. 20. 2. To stretch forth his hand is to put forward any work, or further designs on foot; as Herod furthered the wicked designs of the high priests and scribes in persecuting Christ, he "stretched forth his hands," Acts xii. 1. "He stretched out his hand with scornors." Scornors are the basest of people, and, as if he were a common companion for them, this king put off all princely dignities, and made himself their associate, if they could but in any way further his designs. Hence,

Obs. 8. Sensual courtiers are for the most part great scornors. Experience proves this.

Obs. 9. Times of feasting are usually times of contemning all religion. Then they think none live such brave lives as they do; when they are thoroughly heated with wine, then they have a flout and a scorn for every one; then God himself is reproached by them, and his saints had in disgrace. Psal. xxxv. 16, "With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth." There are many who carry things very fair in the eyes of the world, who seem to be Christians, yet, when they come among scornors, have their scoff and private jeer; these are odious in God's sight. Where is there more scorning and scoffing, than in princes' courts, and great men's tables? If a court chaplain had but heard any thing of a puritan, or of a private meeting, was it not their music? Thus they informed the king, that they were none but a company of precise fools, giddy-headed people, and the king received this news with joy, it made him merry, and he gave them thanks for their pains. Oh how far is this below a true princely spirit!

Obs. 10. The right way of worship is by carnal hearts accounted a very slight thing; and God's people, who stand for God's ordinances in their purity, are regarded as foolishly precise.

Obs. 11. The devil has ever been wont to hinder reformation, by raising up men of pestilent wits to scorn at religion; and this way the devil prevails very much; when he cannot prevail by persecution, he gains much this way. Men that are of any spirit cannot endure scorning; therefore we read of mocking to be a cruel persecution in Heb. xi. 36, "And others had trial of cruel mockings." And Ishmael's mocking is said to be persecution. In the primitive times, they would set up an ass's head and a book by it, to show that they professed to learn, and yet were as simple as an ass. I have heard of a scholar in Queen's college, who professed he had rather suffer the torments of hell, than endure the contempt and scorn of the puritans. And this is the devil's old way: but men will not be jeered out of their inheritance, and God will scorn such scorers, Prov. iii. 34. That place is famous in Lam. iii. 62, 63, "The lips of those that rose up against me. Behold their sitting down, and their rising up; I am their music." What then? "Render them a recompence, O Lord, according to the work of their hands. Give them sorrow of heart, thy curse unto them."

Obs. 12. When kings' hearts are against religion, they shall never want wits to further their designs. History confirms this.

Obs. 13. Unhappy is that kingdom where princes give their hands to scorers, and deny it to the people of God. It was a happy and blessed time with that people in 2 Chron. xxxv. 1—3, when the prophets of God were encouraged by the king himself.

Ver. 6. For they have made ready their heart like an oven, whiles they lie in wait: their baker sleepeth all the night; in the morning it burneth as a flaming fire.

These words set forth the strength of Jeroboam's and his princes' desires to set up false worship, and their subtlety in taking opportunity and lying in wait to leaven the people. The notes are from the similitude.

Obs. 1. The heat of their hearts was so violent, that it did devour all that opposed it. As fire devours all combustible things, so they devoured all kinds of reason brought against them and their way; what was advanced in contradiction to their worship, was like straw or wood in an oven, they were so strongly set upon it, they devoured all presently. Therefore at any time, when we come to men, and see them wilfully bent upon their way, it is to no purpose to speak to them; but let them alone, and let God but humble them upon their sick-beds, and then they will hearken. No dealing with bees in a hot day, but at night there is.

Obs. 2. God will be hot in judgment as men are hot in sin. God will make as little of them as they do of God's people. "For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1.

"Whiles they lie in wait." Though they are as hot as an oven, yet they do not run headlong, imprudently, but wait their opportunity. And should not this be our wisdom in the ways of God, not to "make haste?" Isa. xxviii. 16. Let not our desires be so eagerly set after any thing, but that we can be willing to be without it, or patiently to wait God's time for it. They are as hot as an oven, and yet not cooled because they have not their desires presently fulfilled. So must we take heed of having our hearts cooled, when we have opportunities to further any design we have on foot for God and his cause. Though they had not opportunities to further their plots, yet they waited still, and were not discouraged. How many times do people, when God sends but a little famine of the word amongst them, grow cold, and lose all their heat!

"Their baker sleepeth all the night." It is as if men, who have a common oven, were to put fuel into it, and let it burn till they called their customers together, and when this was done, then slept. So the people were leavened. These people, by their bakers, were prepared; they had heated their oven, and now they thought they might go to sleep, they might be quiet. And did not our bakers do thus? they had heated their oven, but blessed be God, who disappointed them in their way. When these bakers slept, their oven heated notwithstanding, but ours grew cold.

Obs. When we think subtle adversaries to be most secure, they are still driving on their designs. Thus it was in Ireland, and here amongst us, even in their greatest shows of peace in their treaties. The truth is, if ever we will have the fire quenched, which now burns so violently, we must take away the incendiaries, and stirrers up of these unnatural wars. Though opportunities for work may cease, let not the fire of our good cause go out, let the oven be hot still. At the first their oven did but begin to heat, now it is all in a flame: at the first they would use fair means with the people, and persuade them with good words, and answer their arguments; but when their oven was hot, when they had brought their designs to maturity, and got power into their hands, then it is now no longer, Will ye worship at Dan and Beth-el? and, That is your best course; no more attempt to satisfy the consciences; but, To prison with them; such a prison for such, and the other strong hold for the rest. This has ever been the course of those who would set up any false worship.

Ver. 7. They are all hot as an oven, and have devoured their judges; all their kings are fallen: there is none among them that calleth unto me.

Not only Jeroboam and his successors, but also princes and people, at length grew hot in the pursuit of that great design of altering religion, insomuch that no man might dare to show himself against them. Many of the people, at first, scrupled to yield to their new way; but having overcome their consciences, now nothing troubles them; they not only yield themselves, but violently constrain the consciences of recusants. But this similitude we met with in the 4th verse of this chapter, and then opened it, and therefore pass it over here. It follows,

"And have devoured their judges." Jerome observes on this, that it is not probable but some of their judges had some light in them, to see that the altering of religion could not but be against their laws; yet, seeing both the princes and the people were set violently upon it, they also yielded.

Such are the vile, base, and low spirits of men in honour, and this honour depending upon the favour of kings, that, rather than hazard their places, and lose their gains, they will yield to any thing; and, to please the king, will tell him the law is for him, the bonds of the kingdom cannot control him. Micah iii. 10, 11, "They build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity. The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money." The princes and the prophets ask for a reward. The princes desire to infringe on some rights of their subjects; but to cover the vileness and injustice of the action, would ask the judges whether it were legal or no; now the judges, for their own profit, encouraged him, and told him it was lawful, he might do it. How have our judges imitated these! Though men had some integrity at the first, yet, the heat arising so high in the princes and nobles, yea, and in many of the high court of judicature, they could not endure it. Thus we see how one time answers to another in wickedness. The princes' designs increase in strength when they have got the judges to countenance and support them.

Others interpret it thus, They have mischieved and ruined their judges that did oppose them; and Merceer, that learned interpreter, in support of this sense quotes a tradition of the Jews, That the princes and rulers had so wrought upon the people, that they should come to the king with a humble petition, in which they should desire and entreat him to give them leave to set up an idol, which they did. When they came, the king put them off, telling them it was late in the evening now, and bade them return in the morning.

In the morning they came exclaiming, Arise, and set us up an idol. No, saith he, your sanhedrim will not give consent to nor suffer it. We have taken a course with them, replied they, we have killed them: which is the usual means persecutors adopt with those who seem likely to oppose them in their plots.

Or thus, They had devoured their judges and their princes by treachery. And this story refers to that in 2 Chron. xiii., a chapter of as much treachery as we read of. "All their kings are fallen;" that is, into that false worship into which Jeroboam was fallen. And it is very observable, that all the kings of the ten tribes were wicked. From Jeroboam the first, to the captivity, there were eighteen kings, and all of them wicked and naughty; and the reason of this was, that the modes of false worship suited with their politic ends; so that the observation from it may be,

Obs. 1. It is a hard thing to take men off from their strong engagements. It was a work so difficult, that all the prophets could not do it. It is very hard, especially when their engagements are in matters of importance. They were wise, politic men, and therefore could not choose, in all probability, but see, how point blank their ways went against God's mind; even Jehu himself, who was raised up so high by God, on purpose to root out idolatry, and did root out idols and Baal's priests, yet followed the calves, as well as his predecessors.

Therefore never wonder to see men obstinate, and not be convinced of the evil of their ways; this text shows clearly that many are willing to deny themselves in small things, but when it comes to great things they flinch and hang off; therefore we see what snares places of honour are to most men. Many ministers see the evil of ceremonies, and are convinced that they sin if they yield to them, and rather than sin they will leave their livings; but when did you ever see a bishop deny himself? when was it ever known that a prelate so far submitted to lay down his great dignities and fat livings for his conscience? It follows,

"There is none among them that calleth unto me,"

1. They were presumptuous and confident in their way, and none of them would ask counsel of me; notwithstanding their judges were devoured, they sought to other helps, or rested in their outward prosperity: or, 2. They are sottish and stupid, and call not unto me, though all be in a confusion in the state, their judges devoured, &c.

Obs. 2. When governors set up false worship, it should quicken our prayers. Micah vii. 7, "I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation: my God will hear me." So in Acts iv. 29, "And now, Lord," hear us. The Christians there got into a corner, and made their complaints and moans to God of the evil of the times; and do but observe the rise and ground of their prayers, "And now, Lord," hear us. They do as men that would leap a great way, take their rise upon a hill to further them: so these people make the miseries of the times their encouragements, not their discouragements. It is a desperate sign to see men sink under their discouragements, and murmur against God. Oh let us go to God and make our moan to him, and let us die calling upon his name; let David's resolution be ours, Psal. cxvi. 2, "I will call on the Lord as long as I live." And this is a very good argument that the cause of God will stand: if our spirit of prayer hold, the cause of God will hold; but if that go down, fear the sinking of the cause.

Ver. 8. Ephraim, he hath mixed himself among the people; Ephraim is a cake not turned.

"Ephraim, he hath mixed himself." There is a great evil charged upon Ephraim, and that is observable, he hath mingled himself among the people; the people did not so much seek to him, as he to them. Some here understand by "Ephraim" the court, because Jeroboam was of the tribe of Ephraim; and Cyril hath this note from thence, that it is a great dishonour for them that are in place of honour, to suit themselves and their minds to those that are of base, low spirits among their people; men of place and power should be men of honour and worth. But we take "Ephraim" here for the people of the ten tribes, for so it is more often taken in Scripture. They were guilty of this sin, in mixing themselves with the people, that is, the Gentiles, in these five regards:

1. In their marriages. The seed of the Israelites was too precious to mingle with the Gentiles; this was forbidden in Deut. vii. 3; and the good man Ezra, chap. ix., in the day of humiliation, confessed this sin unto God against them: and it was typified of the Christians under the gospel, that they should not mix themselves with the wicked and ungodly of the world; they must marry in the Lord: it is a sad affliction to be unequally yoked. It is reported of Maxentius, a cruel tyrant, that it was his custom to judge some malefactors to death after this manner, viz. To have a dead man chained to the living man, till the living man was killed by the dead man. How many living men have dead wives, and living wives dead husbands! Oh how comely a thing it is to see the delight of our eyes the delight of God's eyes!

2. They mingled God's worship with their superstitions and idolatries. They had not wholly defiled the worship of God, yet they had mixed themselves. Jeroboam had been in Egypt, where he had seen their idolatrous heifer, and he was much taken with it, therefore he would imitate them in his calves. 2 Kings xvii. 33, 34, in one verse it is said they feared the Lord, and in the next verse it is said they did not; "They feared the Lord, and served their own gods.—Unto this day they do after the former manners; they fear not the Lord." Never let us satisfy ourselves in mixtures of worship: though we have never so much true worship among us, God will never be put off with such excuses.

3. They mixed themselves in their persons, and suffered others to join with them. Neither must Christians suffer the wicked to join with them in matters of worship; and surely if fornicators, adulterers, and profane men are crept in, they must (when discerned) be cast out speedily. Now if such as these must be cast out when crept in unawares, then surely such must not be received in when known beforehand. And certainly a bare confession of faith is not sufficient to admit a man to the ordinances, for those that are vile and wicked in their lives, may make a verbal and outward confession; men may confess with their mouths, and yet deny all in their lives: as if a man should confess his faith in English, and deny it again in Latin: yet if any should creep into a church in which thou art bodied, if thou dost thy duty in admonishing them, and if they will not be warned to profess against them, thou mayst certainly, yea, and with good conscience, partake of the ordinance notwithstanding.

4. In their leagues and covenants they mixed themselves. They made covenants and leagues with other people, which was forbidden them in Exod. xxxiv. 12, "Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee." Deut. vii. 2, "And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor show mercy unto them." Isa. xxx. 2, 3, "That walk to go down into Egypt, and have not asked at my mouth; to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt! Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion."

5. They were mixed in their societies with other people. Psal. cvi. 35, "They were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works;" they served their idols, which were a snare unto them. It is a very dangerous thing to be mixed with a wicked society. "And the mixt multitude that was among them" (people that came out of Egypt) "fell a lusting," Numb. xi. 4. The mixt multitude fell a murmuring; this is an affliction in any society, but especially in church societies. But suppose Providence cast me into a family where there are such as these? In such a family thou mayst be as oil in water unmixt; put never so much water amongst oil, the oil will be above it, swimming upon the top. Psal. xxvi. 9. "Gather not my soul with sinners, nor my life with bloody men:" if you would not be gathered with them in the day of judgment, do not you gather to them now in communion in ordinances, nor in intimate society. The Lacedemonians would not suffer a stranger to be with them above three days; and shall we associate ourselves with such as are strangers to God? God had made a great difference betwixt Israel and other people, they were a people separated from all the people of the earth, Exod. xxxiii. 16; in the original it is, marvellously separated, or set apart, for God; they were a people whom God did own in a more peculiar manner, and his eye was upon them for good, therefore it did not become them to mix with other people.

"Ephraim is a cake not turned." We read this expression and make little of it, but there is very much concerning us in it. Mark well the expression; the repetition of the word Ephraim, "Ephraim is a cake not turned." The prophet here speaks in a consoling manner, O Ephraim, what! my dear son, and do thus? Ephraim was a cake not turned in these four respects:

1. In their plots and counsels. They did not turn their designs and proceedings up and down; they thought of one way of false worship, but not of another; to wit, at the time which might have carried on their plots, they did not weigh circumstances.

2. In their indifference. You could not tell what to make of him; he was so indifferent that it mattered not much to him whether God were God or Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 21. How many men are of this garb among us, both in their opinions and practices!

3. Their perverseness. Although heavy afflictions were upon them, that they lay as it were burning upon the coals, and took no means for their help and cure, they cried out, and lay howling upon their beds, yet they turned not to the Lord; they could not devise a way to escape, they were good for nothing, as a cake not baked; like those in Jer. iii. 5, "Will he reserve his anger for ever? will he keep it to the end? Behold, thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest." Just thus it is with souls in their spiritual estates; in terrors of conscience and sorrow for sin, they lie pining away in their iniquities, and take no course to deliver and help themselves. When thou art in this condition thou shouldst be acting upon God, and looking after him; thou shouldst not lie scorching and burning upon the coals of thy transgressions, but shouldst make out after the mercy of God in Jesus Christ.

4. Luther and Vatablus make the sense of the words to note the greediness of Ephraim's adversaries; they were like a man pinched with hunger, who, coming to food, falls upon it presently, and eats the cake forthwith, and will not stay till it be baked; thus Ephraim's adversaries fell upon him. But this I conceive not to be the meaning of the words, but the second and the third.

Ver. 9. Strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not: yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth it not.

"Strangers have devoured his strength." By "strength" we must understand Ephraim's rich and warlike power; and here we may see the poor shifts and strength of carnal hearts: the Almighty is the strength of the saints; such a strength is God, that all the devils in hell, nor men on earth, cannot take away from them. Strangers devoured the strength of Ephraim. Such as were not in covenant with God may rob the saints of their outward supports and comforts: a good cause may miscarry when the managers of it are rested upon, and too much confidence placed in them. We see how just it is with God to cross and turn the designs of men against themselves when they forsake him; and this is a great curse, when wicked men are suffered to take away what we have and do enjoy in our estates and liberties: and metaphorically this may be applied to our spiritual strength; we should take special care that strong lusts do not devour our strength for God: and this is the reason of our flatness in duties. You often complain of deadness in prayer; examine whether there be not some secret lust which takes away your strength. And is it a misery for strangers to devour the strength of our bodies and estates? much more of our spirits.

"And he knoweth it not." The note from hence is this,

The hearts of the wicked strongly work after their lusts. Although they meet with never so many difficulties in their way, yet they know them not. But in good they know every little difficulty they meet with, and have repenting thoughts in them that ever they were so engaged in a good cause; but their own ways, the ways of their lusts, trouble them not. It follows,

"Yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him." That is, such miseries as make them gray. There were at this time many troubles upon the ten tribes, often afflicted by the Assyrians plundering and spoiling of them. And it is no strange thing to see men gray with very grief and sorrow. Scaliger tells us of a young man, whose hair, through the extreme trouble of his spirit, was turned all gray in one night. How much more should our spirits be affected with the miseries of our times!

Or, their miseries were so long upon them, that they made them gray. They were lasting sorrows; they were old in sin, and God made them old in miseries and punishments for their sins. Thus Germany has been gray-headed for many years together, in respect of the length of their miseries.

Or, they have been a long time, and might have gained more knowledge of me, and got large experiences of the goodness of my ways, yet they know me not, nor my ways. The whiter men's heads are, the blacker often are their sins: it is a most dreadful sight to see a white head and an old sinner. I have read of one Eleazar, who would not do any thing which might seem to be evil, because he would not spot his white head. Gray hairs should be a strong argument to move men to walk blamelessly in their lives.

Or, they had many symptoms of their ruin and destruction upon them; as gray hairs show that men's ends are near. Men that are gray, and would not be thought to be old, will pluck out their white hairs; but if there be gray hairs upon us, let us know they are admonitions to us, and warnings of our ruin, Heb. viii. 13. There are many symptoms of a kingdom's gray hairs: I shall instance some of them; as,

1. Oppression in courts of justice.

2. Idolatry and superstition in God's worship and ordinances.

3. The secret curse of God upon men and their estates.

4. The taking away of the valiant and righteous men out of the kingdom, is a sad gray hair in that kingdom. A kingdom where these gray hairs are in a dying condition; and happy were it for us if these gray hairs were not to be found amongst us: we have lain a long time at the grave's mouth, and yet many gray hairs continue still, and what God will do with us we know not. How covetous and self-seeking are men in these days, notwithstanding God's wrath burns so hot, threatening an utter desolation of all! We had need therefore to prepare for a dying kingdom.

"And he knoweth it not." Does not this speak our condition likewise? Gray hairs are here and there and we know it not. How have the ministers of God forewarned us long since of these times! but we would not regard them, both they and their message were slighted. This people was so stupified they knew not who it was that smote them, nor for what it was they were smitten.

Ver. 10. And the pride of Israel testifieth to his face: and they do not return to the Lord their God, nor seek him for all this.

In the fifth chapter we opened words similar to these, only the scope of the place is different. They would not take notice of God's hand, but proudly braved it out, and would not learn his meaning in the rod. Let us, on the contrary, learn humility, to accept of the punishment of our iniquities, submitting, and acknowledging that our Father hath smitten us and spit in our face. Whence,

Obs. 1. God expects we should turn upon afflictions. He "sealeth their instruction;" "he openeth also the ear to discipline, and commandeth men" thereby "that they return from iniquity," Job xxxvi. 10.

Obs. 2. Afflictions, if not sanctified, will never turn the heart.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation of men's sins not to turn under afflictions.

Obs. 4. Though afflictions may work repentance, yet such repentance is seldom true; it will not often sustain the trial; yet people should try and see what it will do. Repentance coming from afflictions has a promise: Lev. xxvi. 41, 42, "If then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled," if then, even when my hand is upon them, "they accept of the punishment of their iniquity:" "then will I remember my covenant with Jacob," "and I will remember the land."

Obs. 5. True repentance is rather a seeking of God's face, than our own ease from afflictions.

Ver. 11. Ephraim also is like a silly dove without heart: they call to Egypt, they go to Assyria.

The word מִיָּדָה translated "silly," signifies easily seduced, persuaded to any thing. We are wont to say that children and fools are easily persuaded to any thing. Men that are hardly persuaded to believe in God, and what God saith, are yet often easily induced to believe errors. These thought themselves very wise in going to Egypt, but they did very foolishly, 2 Kings xvii. 4; the leaving of God's ways and following our own is very foolishness. How many, when it has been too late, have cried out of this their folly! From whence this may be observed:

Obs. 1. Though men may be misled by others, yet are they not excused. This will not excuse them before God at the great day, to say, Others did thus, and I followed them, thinking them to be in the right.

"Without heart;" that is, without understanding. Prov. vi. 32, "But whoso committeth adultery with a woman lacketh understanding." Chap. x. 21, "The lips of the righteous feed many: but fools die for want of wisdom," or for lack of wisdom. Now of all creatures the dove is the most silly: as appears,

1. The dove defends not her young ones as other creatures do; the hen and other flying creatures will preserve their young ones, but the silly dove lets them go quietly. So was Ephraim, in this respect, like unto the dove, they were destroyed and made a prey of by others, yet never laid it to heart. The Lord in mercy look upon us. Is not this our case? We suffer our brethren to be destroyed and made a prey of, and never lay it to heart, because we for the present are quiet.

2. The dove will keep by the place of her nest although you take it away. Yea, Pliny reports of some doves which will fly many miles to their nests. Even in this also is Ephraim like unto a silly dove; where he was many years ago there he is still. And so it is with many men; they know and are convinced that such company, which they have frequented, has done them mischief, and yet they cannot leave them: here is a silly dove without understanding indeed.

3. Doves, though swift in their flying, yet being dull in preventing of danger, are easily caught with the net. So was Ephraim easily insnared and preyed upon by his enemies.

4. The dove is delighted in the beauty of her feathers, and prides herself in the clapping of her wings, and cutting of the air, as it were. Ephraim was priding herself in her ornaments. We are very ready and prone to imitate the creatures in that which is evil, but not in that which is good. There are some good properties in doves which they would not follow, as their innocency and simplicity, their unity and chastity, meekness without gall, cleanliness, and purity. Prudentia absque bonitate malitia est, et simplicitas absque ratione stultitia est. From whence we may

Obs. 2. Godliness does not sanction men in their folly. When men will not go from the rule, but adhere to that as the guide in all cases of their lives, this is godly simplicity. It is matter of wonder to see how subtle men are to damn themselves. Those are only wise men who are truly godly; they then begin to be wise when they begin to be godly. Our simplicity may aggravate our misery, but it can never bear us out in it, nor excuse it. True godliness will undermine all sinful simplicity; therefore take heed of putting that upon the Spirit of God which is nothing but the simplicity of our own hearts. "Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

Ver. 12. When they shall go, I will spread my net upon them; I will bring them down as the fowls of the heaven; I will chastise them, as their congregation hath heard.

In the former verse the Lord, by the prophet, charges Israel for their silliness as the dove; but, as silly as they were, they thought to provide for themselves well enough by their going to Egypt; but, it being out of God's way, it proved but silliness, for God was resolved to meet with them. "When they shall go, I will spread my net upon them;" my providence shall so begird and straiten them, that although they may seem to escape, yet they shall be insnared. This place has reference to 2 Kings xvii. 4, the Assyrian was God's net to take them in. The emphasis of the word lies here,

"My net," in the pronoun "my." Men by their cunning and policy may bring men into great trouble and straits; but when God sets himself, by his attributes of wisdom, power, and justice, to bring a people down to ruin, they shall be taken, they shall not escape. The notes are:

Obs. 1. It is just that those who go out of God's way shall be insared. Job xviii. 7, "The steps of his strength shall be straitened, and his own counsel shall cast him down." Chap. xxii. 10, "Therefore snares are round about thee, and sudden fear troubleth thee." How many can from experience testify to this, who, going out of God's ways, have met with snares! It is God's curse upon the wicked, that their table shall become a snare to them; and in Isa. viii. 14, he threatens that he would be "for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel, for a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem." And therefore in straits it is good to think thus, Where am I? what am I doing? am I in my way or no? have I not followed my own counsel and left God's? If we have, mark what God saith, "I will bring them down as the fowls of the heaven." You think to escape by flying, but when you imagine you are the most secure, then I will meet with you.

Obs. 2. God may for a time let wicked men prosper in their ways, insomuch that they may think all danger is past; but when they are high, then is God's time to pull them down; at the highest God can reach them; yea, even then it is God's delight to pull them down. A remarkable text we have to this purpose in 2 Sam. xxii. 28, "But thine eyes are upon the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down." Thine eyes are upon them; that is, as a fowler sets his eyes upon a bird that sits on high, which he would take in his snare or net. The proud and haughty spirits fly on high, and think themselves very secure, and bless themselves in their way; but God's eyes are upon them, waiting for a fit time to pull them down. A philosopher, on being asked what Jupiter did in the highest heaven, replied, He pulls down the haughty, and exalts the humble. Obad. 3, 4, "The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee, thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, whose habitation is high; that saith in his heart, Who shall bring me down to the ground? Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord." Thus also of that proud king of Babylon in Isa. xxiv. 21, "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall punish the host of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth." This cannot be understood of the devil, but of the king of Babylon, whom God threatens to pull down.

"I will chastise them." The word translated "I will chastise," signifies both to bind, and to chastise, or instruct.

First, I will bind them; sinners shall be bound with the cords of their lusts.

Secondly, I will chastise and instruct them; noting that chastisements should be with instructions. "I will chastise them."

"As their congregation hath heard." Moses and the prophets have instructed them, but they disregarded them; but I will make good what they said of them.

Obs. 3. Sinners had need to regard what they hear out of the word of God, for it will take hold on them some way or other. Zech. i. 6, "But my words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not take hold of your fathers?" O thou impenitent sinner! take heed how thou goest on in thy wicked ways, for know, that all the power in God is engaged to make good his word against thee. Therefore when Christ sends forth his disciples to preach the gospel, he engages all his power to make good what they, in his name and according to his mind, deliver. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations. And, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world," Matt. xxviii. 18—20. Oh how should we, from this consideration, be stirred up to hear the word with trembling!

Obs. 4. When judgments come upon impenitent sinners, it is a humbling consideration for them to reflect, that that word which they heard in the congregation was true. How do multitudes on their sick beds prove this to be true! Now God makes them believe the truth of that word which before they had slighted. It is the office of the Spirit of God to bring the forgotten word into the minds of the saints: John xiv. 26, "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." But God is wont by another manner to bring the word into wicked men's minds, even by his strokes, and that not for their comfort, but for their horror and destruction.

Ver. 13. Woe unto them! for they have fled from me: destruction unto them! because they have transgressed against me: though I have redeemed them, yet they have spoken lies against me.

"Woe," in Scripture, sometimes signifies pity, sometimes misery; here it is to be understood of misery.

"For they have fled from me." The word here interpreted "fled from," signifies to wander. It is a woeful thing to depart from God, much more to wander from God. Woe be to you, when I depart from you! but if you depart from me, what will you do? In wandering from God, thou wanderest from the only infinite good; and then, where wilt thou rest the sole of thy foot? what shall comfort thee in the time of thy distress? It is evil to wander from God, but much more to make haste from God. It is the devil's plot and custom, to hurry backsliding sinners from God, that they should not consider what they do, and whither they are going; he posteth them on in their evil ways, "as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life," Prov. vii. 23. Oh how earnest should the saints be after God! not to be kept off with impediments, but, with David, in Psal. lxxiii. 8, follow hard after God; and Psal. cxix. 60, "I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments." It follows,

"Destruction unto them!" This is always the end of such as depart from God: and happy were it if thou couldst see it beforehand. Oh how many, when they have come to see the end of their ways upon their death-beds, have given a most dreadful shriek, as seeing themselves past recovery!

"Because they have transgressed against me." They have not only sinned against me, but have broken covenant also; they have dealt perfidiously with the Lord. Before, God said he would chastise them; but now, he would destroy them, make an end of them. Utter ruin is the portion of those that break covenant with me.

"Though I have redeemed them." Some read it in the future: Though I would, and was ready to do it; yet, they say that the way of worship I prescribed is not so successful, and no such blessing follows it; they say my prophets threaten nothing but judgment and utter desolation: now, saith God, all these are lies, it is no such matter, I was ready to do them good. But the future is often used for the preter-tense in the Hebrew, and so here: the sense is, I have not only redeemed them out of Egypt, but very often since out of the hands of their enemies. And the story which this scripture refers unto, is in 2 Kings iv. 27. The Lord wonderfully prospered them in their wars; "And the Lord said not that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven: but he saved them by the hand of Jeroboam the son of Joash." It follows, “Yet they have spoken lies.” That is, they attributed their redemption to those helps which they had, or to their idols, saying in this manner: Other people that served not God were delivered as well as we; we see not so much of God’s hand in our deliverance as you speak of. Or else, they fathered their errors upon me because I delivered. Now, saith God, in this you lie against me. They made false interpretations of God’s mercies; as, that God was no such enemy to this way of worship, because he had redeemed them. The notes are:

Obs. 1. God’s redeeming mercies, are great aggravations of our sin. When God delivers, and we attribute it to any thing in us, or that we have done, it is mighty provoking to God, because it takes away his glory in delivering.

Obs. 2. Such as take occasion to sin more freely against God after deliverance, give God the lie. As they in Jer. vii. 10, said, they were “delivered to do all these abominations.” Or, as Philip, that wicked king of Spain, being delivered in a storm, said it was to this end, that he might root out all the Lutherans. So, are there not many so vile, who, being delivered in a sickness, or from any great danger, think it is that they might sin more freely? which is a most horrible wickedness, and lying against the Lord.

Obs. 3. For a man to urge any false doctrine upon another, is a lying against God. Therefore take heed how you bring scriptures to prove any error which you or others hold, for God will look upon it but as a lying against him. It is a dangerous thing to counterfeit the king’s stamp; and is it not much more to counterfeit the truths of God, by errors seemingly maintained by Scripture?

But to apply this spiritually: many whom God has redeemed from sin, hell, and wrath to come, the hazard of their miscarriage being over, yet dare not, will not say, that God has showed mercy unto them; they are ever complaining, that they are still in their sins, that there is no work of God’s Spirit upon them; or if they do grant there is some change, that God has done something for them, yet are they full of fears that it will pass away, that God will leave them at the last. Now take heed of this kind of speaking, beware what you say, lest you be found liars against the truth of God in your hearts.

“Against me.” Luther, upon these words, takes much notice of God’s speaking so in his own person: They have departed from me, they have transgressed against me, done wickedly against me, spoken lies against me, called not upon me, &c. Hence,

Obs. 4. The great evil of sin lies in this, that it is against God. This consideration laid David very low; “Against thee, thee only, have I sinned.” And this it is which humbles a gracious heart, that it should sin so unkindly against God.

Obs. 5. The more directly a sin is against God, the greater is the sin. For now God suffers more immediately in his glory, and that aggravates the sin.

Ver. 14. And they have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds: they assemble themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me.

“And they have not cried unto me.” The Seventy render it, Kai ouk ebohan pros me ai kardia autōn, Their hearts have not cried to me. Where we may see, that it is not enough to cry with the mouth, except the heart cry as well as the mouth. We read of Moses, that though he spake not a word that is expressed in the text, yet he prayed: it is the working of the heart that is the heart of prayer. Therefore, when Elijah prayed, it is said, he prayed in praying, James v. 17. And by this we see the great difference there is in praying. Heart-prayer pleases God. A workman who wants words to express himself, yet may be able to perform his business very well in God’s account; so he that is able to express himself in fine language, eloquent sentences, and multitudes of words, may yet not pray at all: therefore, when you pray, look that your hearts go along with the duty, otherwise, your cries will be but as the prayers in the text, which are called howlings, and that in these four respects:

1. The hideousness of their cry; crying unto God as the heathens used to their idols; and so the Hebrew seems to imply, intimating something remarkable, by setting a letter more than ordinary to this word, howling. Thus the heathen Indians at this day howl to their gods. יילי

2. Their distempered and unquiet spirits: they were in their spirits very turbulent, in their lives unquiet, and froward in their carriage in prayer. Even thus it is with many in trouble of conscience, they are very boisterous, make much noise. The shallowest waters make the greatest noise, but the deepest rivers run the stillest so those that have the deepest sense of sin, and are kindly troubled for it, are quiet, still, and submissive, under God’s hand. And certainly such a boisterousness of spirit under the sense of sin, is not from the Spirit: although there may be some legal terrors when God has subdued the heart to himself, the heart will seek earnestly for mercy, and yet in a quiet, humble way.

3. Their pain. The brute beasts in their pain and trouble will cry out and roar: even thus did these men here, the extremity of the misery they were in forced howling from them. No men complain more of judgments when they are executed, than those that were least sensible of them when they were threatened. Carnal hearts cry out altogether of the misery of the times; the judgment it is that troubles them, more than its cause, sin. See this between Pharaoh and David, Saul and David. Saul cries, he cries to Samuel, saying, I have sinned, and done foolishly, yet honour me, I pray thee, before the people. David, he confesseth his sin, and accepts of the punishment of his iniquity; Lord, it is I that have sinned; as for these sheep, what have they done? Pharaoh, he cries to Moses, that he would pray to God to deliver him from the plagues that were upon him. David, he cries to God, “Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant.” If iniquity be done away, judgment will soon be removed, sin being the cause of all misery.

4. Because God regarded their cries no more than the howlings of beasts: Amos viii. 3, “The songs of the temple shall be howlings in that day.” As the prayers, so the sacrifices; in Isa. lvi. 3, they are but as the cutting off a dog’s neck; and their cries were but as the cries of that dog whose neck was cut off. In their pride they were wont to speak contemptuously of God, his ways, and servants; and so God contemns and scorns them, their prayers, and their sacrifices: Prov. i. 26 is verified here; he will laugh at their destruction, and mock when their fear cometh. Oh how vile are wicked men in God’s eyes when they are in trouble and misery! None so vile but we pity and relieve them; but for the infinite, merciful, pitiful God, who is full of goodness, and has bowels of tender love and compassion, for him to have in derision the cries of his creature, oh the consideration of this is most sad! oh vile is the sin which makes man thus odious!

And here we see what little use there is of wicked men’s spirits; they are of no use, there is for them in the places where they live nothing that they can do. Thou canst easily sin, and bring down judgments by thy sins; but when they are come upon thee, what wilt thou do? Perhaps thou wilt pray and cry to God: God abhors thy prayers, thy cries are abomination, unto him: it is the saints' prayers that are so acceptable unto him; "The prayer of the upright is his delight," Prov. xv. 8. The least sigh which comes from a godly heart, is such a strong cry that it fills heaven and earth, so that (as I may speak with reverence) God can hear nothing else but that, because he both prepares their hearts to pray, and prepares his ear to hear; therefore we find in Scripture such expressions as these, Psal. x. 17; and Neh. i. 6, the good man prays that God's ear would be attentive, and his eyes open, that he might hear the prayers of his servant. Psal. lxxxvii. 1, "Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me: for I am poor." 1 Pet. iii. 12, "His ears are open to their prayers." And Psal. lxxxvi. 6, God gives his ear to their prayers and attends to the voice of their supplication. What does all this hold forth to us but this, that the prayers of saints are very delightful to him, they are pleasant music in his ears? Were there no other difference between the godly and the wicked than their prayers, it were sufficient to make men out of love with the ways of sin, and join with the saints in the ways of holiness. The saints send up sweet breathings, and God takes pleasure in them: the wicked howl and cry out, and God rejects them.

"Upon their beds." Men in their prosperity go up and down uncontrolled in their wicked ways, but when God confines them to their chambers and their sick beds, then they howl.

"They assemble themselves for corn and wine." The Vulgate renders it ruminabant, not comedebant, like beasts they feed, the Seventy, κατετιμωτο, they cut themselves, as Baal's priests; but it rather signifies to assemble. 1. They flock together that they might get corn and wine; so they had it, they did not care what became of God and his ordinances. 2. Assemble to feed themselves with the wheat; so they might be pampered, they looked at nothing else. 3. Or, more probably, were assembled at their temples to cry for wheat. The notes are these:

Obs. 1. The vilest men in times of common calamity will assemble themselves to pray to God. Now, certainly, if they will pray to have trouble taken away when upon them, it is our duty to pray to prevent danger ere it comes.

Obs. 2. When hypocrites assemble, it is for themselves, not for God; for corn and wine, and outward mercies. Were it not that they wanted some outward good, God would seldom or never hear from them.

Obs. 3. Hypocrites seek God more for sensual things than for others. We assemble together in our fasts to seek God, but what is it for? if only or principally for outward things, it is but carnal and not spiritual seeking.

"And they rebel against me." 1. Præ frumento, when they are fed like unto the ox when it is fed fat, they kick against their master. Or, 2. They rebel after they have assembled themselves; when once the duty is over, they go to their old courses again, and undo all their prayers: as Jer. v. 3, "Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved; thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction." We should learn hence,

Obs. 4. Duties should mightily engage us against sin. Hast thou in prayer either confessed sin, or asked mercy of God to pardon thy sins? Know, there lies a great engagement upon our hearts now to be humbled for our sins, and to walk according to our prayers. Dost thou in prayer beg power against thy sins? and in thy life dost thou rebel against God? Are there not many who will be long and very earnest in prayer, and judge themselves for their sins, yea, and in words justify God, if he should for ever condemn them for their sins, and yet afterwards rebel anew against God? Oh, may it not be said, Is this the man that even now was in heaven in prayer, and is now, as it were, in hell in his conversation? methinks the very next time thou goest to pray to God, thy mouth should be stopped, and thou shouldst not be able to speak unto him: as we read Origen was, when he had apostatized; coming to preach again, and reading that text in Psal. l. 16, 17, "What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth? seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee;" his mouth was presently stopped, and he was not able to speak a word more. So thou prayest to God, and after thou hast prayed, thou goest and sinnest freely again: O thou wretch, tremble at this; go and humble thy soul before God for thy sins, and tremble at coming thus into God's presence. I put this dilemma to you: either you pray against your sins, or you do not; if not, O consider how thou art departed from God; if thou dost pray against them, then how darrest thou live in those sins which thou hast prayed against? Tertullian has an excellent observation to the purpose: Prayer must always be with remembrance of God's precepts, lest we are as far from God's ear as his precepts are from our hearts. But further,

"They rebel against me;" that is, when their own turns are served, and their own ends satisfied, then they rebel against me; as if now they had no more need of God, nor never should want help from him. Oh how many are there, who upon their sick beds cry out to God, that he would pardon their sins, and show them mercy, making large promises to God of future service that they would do! God has taken them at their words, and raised them up again and restored them to strength. And what have they done? Nothing, but rebelled against him more than formerly, and are like the wild ass that snuffeth up the wind.

Ver. 15. Though I have bound and strengthened their arms, yet do they imagine mischief against me.

God in this verse compares himself to a skilful surgeon, who binds up broken arms and wounds: so God had often bound up their arms when broken by the enemies. In 2 Kings xiv., there we find God bound up their broken arms.

Obs. 1. God alone can bind up broken arms.

Obs. 2. To be sinful after great mercies is a great aggravation of sin. God finds us, as surgeons do their patients, all out of joint, and crying out from pain, Oh that I had ease! I would give my estate that I might be cured! and when the surgeon has used his skill, and cured you of your pain, and given you some ease, if then you should stand disputing with him for a shilling matter, would it not be an unworthy act? and would not the man think his time and skill ill bestowed? Oh how many people are there who deal thus with God; haggle and shuffle it with God in their distress! Oh if God will deliver them, what promises do they make, but when they have peace and quiet forget again!

Obs. 3. It were an argument of an excellent spirit indeed, if, when after our strength is restored and any mercy anew given to us, we would study how we might glorify God with the same. Have our arms been broken, and has God bound them up for us? O let us now use them for God. But this people were far from such a disposition, they imagined evil against God. As if a patient, cured of some desperate wound or disease, should seek to stab his surgeon or physician.

"They imagine mischief." The word imagine signifies all kinds of evil; and to imagine mischief is in some respects worse than to practise it; it was not a weakness or sin of infirmity in them, for it was an imagined mischief, it was a most vile, provoking sin, for it did aim at the dishonouring of God himself: they who live in sin, live as if they were born for nothing but to do mischief to God.

What was this mischief they imagined against God?

Why thus, When the arm was broken, they were more remiss in urging and pressing their false worship: as if God should say, Now they are low and in trouble they want opportunities, and have not that power to set up and press forward their designs against my true worship and servants; but now that their arms are bound up, and they have a little more ease and liberty, now they set their wits to work to invent mischief against my people and worship. And it may be, this is the cause why the Lord keeps our arms still broken, that we might learn to submit; for when at any time God has begun to bind up our arms, how have many improved all opportunities to set up themselves and their ways!

Ver. 16. They return, but not to the most High: they are like a deceitful bow: their princes shall fall by the sword for the rage of their tongue: this shall be their derision in the land of Egypt.

“They return, but not to the most High.” They make shows, yea, do something. This verse refers to the story of Jehu, who did very much; there were very great beginnings in his time to cast out idolatry, but neither did he nor the people come up to the full height that God required of them, but would have some mixtures of their own. And thus it is in many people’s reformation, they are very hot in the beginning; and even among us, how high did the hearts of people rise! but what a damp is there since that time! though, blessed be God, great things are done amongst us. But, saith God, that is not yet done amongst them which I would have done; it is true, they honour me indeed, but it is as the nations round about them honour their gods, they do not honour me as the infinite, eternal, First Cause of all things. People should so labour to reform themselves, that they may hold forth the honour of God as he is infinite, glorious, eternal, and having all power in his hands. The observations from the words are these:

Obs. 1. God is the most high God, the Supreme Majesty of heaven and earth. He is so high, that he humbles himself to behold things done in heaven; it is a stooping in him that he takes notice of things in heaven, surely, then, much more for things done on the earth. Surely, then, he is a high God, and whenever we come before him in prayer, we should come before him as to a God who is so glorious, and high above all things, that betwixt him and us there is an infinite distance.

Obs. 2. A true penitent should have this high God always in his eye. And great would be the efficacy of such a sight as this upon the spirit, it would be very profitable for the soul. For,

1. It would make the soul to be very serious with God, not daring to dally with him who is infinitely above it.

2. It would make the soul abhor itself in dust and ashes, Job xlii. 6: there is nothing humbles the soul more than this sight of God’s majesty.

3. It shows the soul the infinite evil which there is in sin.

4. That there is no standing out against this high God: I must crouch before him, for he will prevail against me.

5. That he is infinitely worthy of all that I am or have, and all that I can do: and this very thing would answer all temptations against God.

6. It would inform us that it is not every sorrow and slight mourning for sin that will serve, but it must be such a sorrow as is becoming such a God.

7. In this sight of God I behold that which has power in it to raise my soul above all things here below: self, the world, and all creature-comforts, all things must be looked upon as under our feet, else we cannot close with God.

8. I see, by this sight, enough in God to make me blessed, and that I may bless myself in him, in the loss of all the world; there is enough in him to make me amend for all the troubles I have met withal for him. These are the thoughts of a true penitent heart, concerning God. Now the soul can say, The Lord is God, and there is no such God as the Lord. And by this, your thoughts of God, you may put your repentance to the trial, whether it be of the right kind or no. Have you sorrowed for sin, as before such a glorious, high God as the Lord is, that those that see your humiliations, may see glory, and honour, and praise, written upon them to the Lord? The want of this these people here were charged with: and this has often been our case. The Lord help our reformers to carry on the work of reformation begun, as before the high God. If we lose this opportunity, we lose such an opportunity as yet was scarce ever granted to any nation upon the face of the earth. Now proud, wicked men may lift themselves high in the world, and be thought to be somebody for it; but it is the low, broken, penitent soul, which is the high man, because he returns to the high God.

They return, but it is not to the yoke, as some render the words, they will not come under obedience to God’s commands; for there is no difference, but in the points, between by jugum and by altissimus: and if we understand the word thus, then it notes, that they promised much, and made many fair shows of doing much, but would not come under the yoke; they will still be sons of Belial, without yoke. So many people, upon exhortation and entreaties, will promise fair, they will return, and they will do much; but when it comes to see the yoke, they flinch back and hold off, Oh, it is too hard for them.

“They are like a deceitful bow.” Thus did their progenitors; they trod in the same steps: Psal. lxxviii. 57, they “kept not his testimonies; but turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.” Now a bow is deceitful two ways.

1. When it causes the arrow to turn from them against whom it was levelled, and recoil upon him that shoots it. These people were God’s bow; Zech. ix. 13, God saith, I have bent Israel as my bow to shoot at evil-doers. How vile and wicked is it for those, into whose hands God has committed power to execute justice and judgment against evil-doers, to turn all their power against the saints, and those who work righteousness.

2. When it carries away the arrow quite contrary to the aim of the archer. Many of these acted thus, they had good aims, and intentions, and purposes, but yet they carried the matter quite contrary; these words refer to Jehu’s time, he was notoriously “a deceitful bow:” “Come, see my zeal for the Lord;” yet, a hypocrite. O let us look to our hearts, there may be secret warpings in them, which may cause us to miscarry for ever, if we take not heed; many who have good intentions, good purposes, aims, and desires, may yet, almost unconsciously, have some secret warpings which may make them miscarry to all eternity. A man may with a deceitful bow aim at a beast, and yet kill a man; so many may think they strike at sin, and yet, with that very goad, may at the same time wound the saints.

“Their princes shall fall by the sword.” These were they who had the chief hand in the setting up of false worship, and in oppressing those that would not join with them: now God would reach these great ones. In times of battle, princes stand at a distance, secured by their life guards; they put on others and think to be safe themselves; they will bring others into straits and miseries, and care not though thousands be slain in a battle, they shall do well enough: but, saith God, They shall not so escape, "their princes shall fall by the sword," it shall not distinguish them from others.

"For the rage of their tongue." Ἐν δὲ τῷ ῥαγῶναι, so the Sept. render the words. They raged against God, his people, and ordinances, and thought themselves too big to be contradicted. We may note here,

Obs. 3. When men grow very wicked, they grow outrageous; like mad-men, there is no ruling of them, there is such a world of wickedness in them they take a liberty to say what they please. We find many strong expressions about the tongue in Scripture: as,

1. Job v. 21, it is called a "scourge;" therefore the saints are promised to be delivered from it.

2. Psal. lvii. 4, "a sharp sword." Prov. xii. 18, "the piercings of a sword;" and in chap. xxv. 18, "A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a maul, and a sword, and a sharp arrow."

3. It is compared to "fire;" yea, said to be "set on fire of hell." James iii. 6; to the "coals of juniper," Psal. cxx. 4, which are quickly kindled, but abide long. All these expressions, with others, we find about the tongue of the wicked. But now, see what is said of the tongues of the saints: Cant. iv. 11, "Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb: honey and milk are under thy tongue." And Prov. x. 20, "The tongue of the just is as choice silver."

4. An outrageous tongue is such a poison as poisons itself, which no other poison doth: other poisons hurt no further than they are applied, they cannot poison at a distance; but this is such a strange working thing that it will both hurt, and so destroy men, that they shall never recover themselves, and this it will do at a distance. These men have such dispositions, that they will let none pass without a lash of their tongue. Now, the Lord, he will not let such escape, he will scorn the scorners. When these men are in their rage, none are spared, no, not God himself; but Christ will convince them of their hard words. Consider, how, in your families, or in some companies, you have been guilty of the rage of the tongue in these respects. It follows in the last words,

"This shall be their derision in the land of Egypt." When they come to Egypt they think to find that they will help and befriend them; No, saith God, instead of helping, they shall scorn them. One part of the rage of their tongue, was in speaking basely of the worship of God and of his people; and now the Egyptians shall speak basely to them: Why do you come to us for help? Where is your God, that you so boasted of? Therefore just is it with God, that those who forsake him and his help, and go to men for succour, should by them be made a scorn. Oh it is a most grievous judgment for God's people to be made a scorn by such, the Egyptians! And it should be our care and duty, not to put our brethren into such straits, that the poor saints of God should be forced to go to the wicked for help, lest they should reproach them, saying, Why do you come to us? What! cannot your holy brethren relieve you? Do you expect help from us? But, in special, this is their derision in the land of Egypt, the rage of their tongue and mutual contentions. When the Egyptians shall see this, they shall deride them, and regard them as the greatest possible objects of scorn.

The Lord deliver us from this judgment! When were there such divisions amongst us as at this day? Oh the rage of the tongue, which abounds in every place! The devil himself has a chief stroke in this rage, and, as well as our adversaries, laughs to see it prosper and increase; and what should move us more to agree one with another than this, the consideration of the woeful scorn and derision we should be to them, if God should deliver us up into their hands? Now, as this, their rage, was a symptom to them of their ruin, so the Lord grant that we may betimes repent of it, lest it prove also unto us a sign of utter ruin and desolation. Thus, through the Lord's help and assistance, we have gone through this seventh chapter, and showed you the meaning of the Holy Ghost in it.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1. Set the trumpet to thy mouth. He shall come as an eagle against the house of the Lord, because they have transgressed my covenant, and trespassed against my law.

THE prophet still continues the denunciation of judgment against Israel, with the declaration and aggravation of their sins.

"Set the trumpet to thy mouth." Let there be a full, free, and open manifestation of the sin and the danger of Israel. The same commandment here given to the prophet, we have in Isa. lviii. 1, "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins."

Obs. 1. Ministers must not only be trumpeters of the gospel, trumpeters of mercy and peace, but trumpeters of judgment and of war. They are set to warn people of danger, and woe to them if they do not! God will require their blood at their hands. However the spirits of people may be against the free and bold work of the ministry in denouncing judgments, yet the spirits of God's ministers must go on in their way. Luther, for the freedom and holdness of his spirit, in inveighing against the sins of the times, and threatening God's judgments, was called the trumpet of rebellion. If a town be besieged by the enemy, the crying of children or women must not hinder the beating up of the drums, nor the roaring of the cannon. God takes it exceeding ill at his ministers' hands, to be mealy-mouthed when his wrath is incensed; and therefore he calls the watchmen that did not give warning by an ignominious name, "dumb dogs, that cannot bark," Isa. lvi. 10. Pliny relates, that, when the Book xiii. chap. 4. Gauls sealed the capitol of Rome, the dogs which were set to keep it, being fed too full, lay sleeping, and did not give warning; they therefore not only hazarded them up, but every year the Romans, in memorial, on that day hung certain dogs upon an elder tree in the city, crucifying them alive, by way of punishment, as it were; and upon this ground it is thought that the Romans so hated that kind of death. And therefore the death that Christ died was the more cursed. God is exceedingly provoked against his watchmen if they give not warning.

Obs. 2. God's ministers must not be weary of their work, though they see little good result. Hosea had proclaimed war before this, in the name of the Lord, but he must do it again; so far from being weary, or discouraged, his spirits must rise in intenseness, strength, and fervency. Before, Hosea's voice was the voice of a man; but now, it is the sound of a trumpet. Let wickedness stop her mouth, but let the mouths of God's servants be opened; yea, let a trumpet be set against their mouths, in declaiming against the wickedness of the times in which they live.

Obs. 3. The denunciation of threatening in the name of God, is a terrible sound. If men be not afraid of this trumpet, and awakened by it, there is a time that shall awaken them, when the archangel shall blow his trumpet. Those who are most awakened, and fear the sound of this trumpet, shall have the most comfort when the trumpet of the archangel shall blow.

"He shall come as an eagle." Luther thinks this prophecy meant against Judah, because of the subsequent mention of "the house of the Lord." And then this eagle must be understood of Nebuchadnezzar, who is called an eagle, Ezek. xvii. 3; Jer. xlvi. 40. But rather I think it refers to the Assyrian, for the prophet here is prophesying against the ten tribes, and seems to take away the two great confidences on which they leaned, which were these:

First, That they had made a league with Egypt, which was nigh; as for the Assyrian, he was a great way off, and there was not so much danger to be apprehended from the Assyrians.

Secondly, They imagined they had "the house of the Lord" with them, and worshipped the true God. Now the prophet takes away these two. "He shall come as an eagle against the house of the Lord;" that is, the Assyrian; Shalmaneser is called an eagle, because he was to come with an army. It may be his ensign was an eagle, or, as some parts of armies are called wings, so here an army is compared to an eagle. To show to them that their danger is not so far off as they imagined, "He shall come as an eagle," that is, swiftly, with mighty force and vehemency. He shall have an eagle's spirit, an eagle's eye: the eagle is quick-sighted, and the spirit of an eagle is not easily daunted. Yet it is observable, that in the law the eagle was an unclean bird, though the king of fowls, and of a brave spirit; God would not have the eagle offered in sacrifice, but rather the dove. God often regards not eagles' spirits, those that soar aloft and fly on high, but receives dove-like spirits, such as are of a meek and quiet temper. But "he shall come as an eagle," swiftly, that is upon the prey before it is aware.

Obs. 4. Men flatter themselves when danger is at a distance from them. If it be not just upon them, they think themselves safe; but God can bring evil suddenly and irresistibly upon them. "He will lift up an ensign to the nations from far, and will hiss unto them from the end of the earth: and, behold, they shall come with speed swiftly," Isa. v. 26. Gaultier applies this place to the Turks coming suddenly from the uttermost part of Europe, yea, from Asia, into Germany, and so into Spain, Sicily, and Italy. God, to punish the contempt of the gospel, brought them suddenly upon them. However, the Lord has delivered us hitherto from foreign nations; we think ourselves secure because God has put work enough into their hands for the present, with the Danes, French, and Spaniards; but how easy is it for the Lord in an instant, even when there is no fear of them at all, to bring them swiftly!

Obs. 5. All the swiftness, fierceness, quick-sightedness, and spirit of an enemy is from the Lord. If an enemy be swift in his course, quick-sighted and fierce, and has a strong spirit, we are to attribute it to the Lord.

Obs. 6. Wicked men, in satisfying their rage and malice, are as eagles; much more should we be in our service for God. If they, to satisfy their rage, are as eagles, we should imitate them in this, and even be much more so, in the service of God.

"He shall come as an eagle against the house of the Lord." Interpreters differ much about this phrase, "against the house of the Lord." Because Hosea prophesied against the ten tribes, Luther and others think that this clause must be meant against Judah, as if God, threatening Israel, should say, Do not you think to escape, for the enemy shall come as an eagle, even "against the house of the Lord." But we need not strain it so, for it may be meant against the ten tribes notwithstanding this expression, and for this reason: because they called the eminent place, where one of their calves was set up, Beth-el, the house of God; and so ironically here the houses of their idols may be called "the house of the Lord," because they chose those houses and places instead of the house of the Lord. "He will come against the house of the Lord;" that is, against that which you account so: but I think that is not satisfactory, but rather this; the church of Israel, though very corrupt, yet, before their actual divorce, is called "the house of the Lord:" so that from thence the note is,

Obs. 7. God does not presently cast away a church so as to unchurch it, though it be guilty of many heinous sins. Great sins do not ipso facto unchurch a church, therefore there should be much patience before any decline from a church by way of renouncing it.

Obs. 8. It is a high expression of the privilege of a true church, yea, though it be very corrupt, that it is the house of the Lord. But you will say, What do you mean by a true church? I take it for the present nothing but this; Any united company of saints who set up what ordinances of God they know, is a church, wherever it is; and here God dwells, here God keeps house; and it is good keeping house with God. He is worse than an infidel that provides not for his own house; certainly God will provide for his own house. Moses was faithful in all the house of God, that is, in all the church of God. What, then, though thou dwellest in a poor cottage, if thou art a member of the church of God, if God give thee this blessing, to dwell in his own house, you are well enough. In Psal. xxvi. 8, "Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth." The church is not only God's house, but the house wherein the honour of God dwells. Princes may have some houses where they retire for a time, but they have some principal houses to show their magnificence and glory; and such a house is the church of God to the Lord. All, then, who are in the church, especially officers, must behave themselves and be faithful in it as in the house of God: "He shall come against the house of the Lord."

Obs. 9. Though we are God's house, yet the enemies may be suffered to come upon us. It will not profit us, if we transgress the covenant. Joab was plucked from the horns of the altar; and so may we be plucked even out of the house of God. God's own house is no security to sin and wickedness.

"Because they have transgressed my covenant." God loves to clear his justice, and to show the cause of the evil that comes upon us; he would have it clearly charged upon ourselves, that they may not put it off to God's decree, that they were predestinated to such and such evils. The Lord has his time to charge all the evils that come upon sinners upon themselves; Thy destruction is of thyself. The bond between God and his church is his covenant, and all the good or evil of a church depends upon the covenant; and therefore it was the way always of the people of God, when they were far declined from God, to return to him by way of renewing covenant. "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant," Psal. xxv. 10; especially now all our good depends upon the covenant, more than formerly the good people of the Jews did, because the Lord has sealed the covenant with the blood of Jesus Christ actually, which was not so then. But we had this expression formerly, when we opened the covenant of the Jews, and showed what kind of covenant it was.

"And trespassed against my law." וְעָלְתִּימָרְתָּ אֶת־חֻקֵּי יְהוָה Calvin saith, that, further to convince them, and show that it was not through ignorance they transgressed, they could not say, Lord, what is thy covenant? For, saith God, I made it known clearly in my law, they had it plainly set out in my law. The heathen can know the mind of God only by looking into the book of the creature, where it is written but very darkly, and they can see but little of it there. Yes, saith God, but my people have my law, where my mind is written plainly; they may see it, and know what my covenant is with them, and therefore their sin is so much the greater, they have transgressed against my law. The Seventy translate these words, καὶ κατὰ τοῦ νόμου μου ἡσίβησαν, and against my law they have dealt ungodly: the words seem especially to refer to the worship of God commanded in the law, they have not worshipped me according to my instituted worship; for though God looks at every part of his law, yet more especially at that which relates immediately to his worship. נִסְתֵּי properly signifies, they have prevaricated against my law, they have made a show that they would do what my law requires, but they do quite contrary. What people is there in the world but will make some show that they would obey God's law? no people but say it is fit that they should be obedient to God's law; still what variety of opinions and practices are there among men, and yet all will father their opinions and practices upon God's law; and mark, but they prevaricate in this; they pretend one thing, but go quite the contrary way: and this is that which God charges upon his people, on account of which he would send his enemies, even an eagle, upon them.

Ver. 2. Israel shall cry unto me, My God, we know thee.

In the Hebrew the words somewhat differ from our translation, there Israel is placed first, but in the Hebrew last, לִי יִשְׂרָאֵל יִקְרָא וְיִשְׂרָאֵל To me they shall cry. My God, we know thee, Israel. The words thus read have more elegance in them, and hint some observations that would hardly arise from our version.

If you read it as it is in our Bible, then it is only a speech of God to them.

But if you read it according to the Hebrew, To me they shall cry, My God, we know thee, Israel, they seem to put God in mind who they were; as if they said, We are Israel, who know thee, remember we are not strangers to thee; They shall cry unto me, My God, we know thee, Israel. It is Israel that cries to thee, O my God!

Or, as if they put God in mind of their father Israel, in whom they placed confidence; They shall cry to me, My God, we know thee, Israel; O remember our father Israel, and deal graciously with us for his sake. Just like those who cried, "We have Abraham to our father;" so this people, in the time of their affliction, would cry to God that they had Israel to their father, who prevailed as a prince with God; and therefore they hope they shall fare the better for Israel.

Or thus, They shall cry to me, My God, we know thee, Israel; that is, we know thee to be the God of Israel, we have known thy ways in former times for the good of thine Israel. Remember, Lord, how thou hast wrought for them, and work now for us in the same manner. Thus there is more in this word, Israel, if you set it in the last place in the verse, than if you set it in the beginning.

Obs. 1. In affliction men see their need of God. So the Chaldee paraphrase upon this place, When I bring straits upon them, they always pray before me, and say, Now we see plainly that we have no other God besides thee; O, redeem us, because we are thy people Israel.

Obs. 2. Even hypocrites and the vilest wretches, in the time of their distress, will claim interest in God, and cry to him. Those who have departed most from him, will be ready to claim an interest in him in their distress. What impudence was it for this people, who had so grossly departed from God, and so contrary to their light, to come boldly and claim their interest in him in the time of their affliction! Truly, we see the same spirit in men at this very day, the most wicked and ungodly man or woman will be ready in afflictions to claim interest in God. I appeal to you, if one should take the circuit of the congregation, and speak particularly to every one, Do you hope that God is your God? every one would be ready to say, Yes, we hope he is. This is the impudence of men's hearts, who will take liberty to go on rebelling and fighting against God all their lives, and yet in the time of their distress claim an interest in him.

Obs. 3. Knowledge and acknowledgment of God in an outward and formal way hypocrites think will commend them much to God in time of affliction. They expect favour from him because they have made some profession of God. "We know thee;" as if they said, Lord, we were not as others who forsook thee; we continued Israel still; we did not turn to be heathens. It is very difficult to take away men's spirits from trusting in formality, in outward worship; We are all Christians, say they, we are not turned heathens. Oh how sweet and comfortable is it then to have a true interest in God! in the time of affliction, to be able to say, in truth, Lord, we know thee; and blessed be thy name, Lord, we have known thee; we have had experience of thy goodness, faithfulness, mercy, love, and tender compassion towards us; we have known thee an infinite, all-sufficient good; thou hast satisfied our souls with thy love; the light of thy countenance has been the joy of our hearts. O blessed be the time that ever the Lord made himself known to us; we can say, Lord, we have known thee, and, therefore, now, Lord, have mercy upon us. Let us all learn to make more of our interest in God, and to labour to know him more and more, that we may have this comfort in our afflictions, and be able to say in truth, O Lord, thou art our God, we have known thee. If hypocrites think it so great a comfort that they are Israel, what is it then to be a true Israelite, in whose heart is no guile!

Obs. 4. Degenerate children think to have favour for the sake of their godly parents. We have known thee, Israel. Children should imitate the virtues of their godly parents, and then they may draw comfort from the godliness of their parents.

Obs. 5. Hypocrites, though degenerate, will not only think to fare better for their godly parents, but to have the same mery as their godly parents had. They little think of the difference there is between Israel heretofore, and that Israel now so basely degenerated.

Ver. 3. Israel hath cast off the thing that is good: the enemy shall pursue him.

They cry, We have known thee; but they "cast off the thing that is good;" they profess to know God in words, but in works they deny him. What is it to say, We know God, and yet to "cast off the thing that is good?" הָרַח here translated "cast off," signifies, hath put off a great way, yea, hath abominated the thing that is good; not only forsaken the thing that is good, but cast it off with a kind of abomination.

"Israel hath cast off the thing that is good." That is, first, cast off God himself, who is, as Anselm speaks, that good in which there is all good; God, the highest and chief good, they have cast him off. Secondly, "the thing that is good," indefinitely; that is, they will not be ordered by any rule, they care not for the good of any one, but only to have their own lusts satisfied.

But that which I think is most properly aimed at by this phrase, "the thing that is good," is, the worship of God, my worship: they say, We know thee, but in the mean time they cast off that good thing, that which I hold indeed to be the thing that is good. Hence,

Obs. 1. The true worship of God is the good thing, by way of excellence. We account our estates are goods, we speak of the goods of such a man. Are our estates such good things? Oh what then is the worship of God! The worship of God is good by way of excellence above all our goods, the good thing that a spiritual heart can prize, that which God delights in, and wherein his people enjoy so much communion with himself; the thing by which God lets out so much good to his people; it is the safety, protection, and blessing of a kingdom. Where the purity of God's worship is, all other good things will follow; that is the good thing; and it is a sign of a gracious heart, to prize the worship of God in its purity, above all good things that a kingdom can enjoy.

Obs. 2. God's own worship, though such a good, is repelled, and cast off as evil, if it suit not the carnal hearts of men. The spirits of men rise against it, they will not so much as examine things in a peaceable and quiet way, but by prejudice; because they see it not suitable to their own ways, their spirits rise, abominating that which God himself prizes.

Obs. 3. Though at first men only leave God, forsake the thing that is good, yet at length they grow to such ripeness in sin, that they cast it off with abomination. Merely to neglect that which is good is an evil; but to cast off that which is good as an abomination, shows the sin of a people is grown to a great height, that they are near to judgment indeed. Men who have been very forward in the profession of religion, and who seemed to love the thing that is good, by degrees have their hearts drawn from the ways of God; and now they cannot bear the sight or the hearing of those things in which they delighted. Their hearts rise against any who practise them; they shut their eyes, and stop their ears, and with violence repel the truth; as those in Jer. xlv. 16, As for the word of the Lord that thou hast spoken to us, we will not hear thee. Oh, are there not some present, who thought they had received much sweetness in the ways of God, and now have not only left them, but their hearts rise against them; and if any thing be spoken for them, cast it off, and even abominate it? Let such take heed that God cast not them off. "If thou seek him, he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever," 1 Chron. xxviii. 9. O my brethren, let us take heed of casting off the thing that is good; we may pass over many truths of which God has convinced us, but let us take heed of casting off any truth, for then we are ripe to judgment, then the Lord may justly cast us off for ever.

Obs. 4. If the hearts of wicked men be so vile as to cast off God and his worship, how much more should we cast off with abomination, that which is abomination itself! How much more should we cast off false worship with abomination, and say, Get thee hence! and, in the same manner, all kind of evil and sin that would stick so fast upon us! "Abhor that which is evil," Rom. xii. 9; abhor it as you would abhor hell itself; such is the force of the original, Ἀποστύγετε τὸ πονηρὸν. Thus we should learn from wicked men casting off what is good, to cast off that which is evil and wicked.

Obs. 5. Whatever knowledge we have of God, or profession we make of worshipping him, yet if we cast off the thing that is good, it deprives us of any interest we have in God, and of any comfort in crying to God in our afflictions. I beseech you, take notice of this; They "cry to me, My God, we know thee;" but, saith God, they have "cast off the thing that is good." Though it be meant of the worship of God principally, yet it is spoken indefinitely; and to cast off violently, and that against light, any thing that is good, any truth of God, deprives the soul of comfort and interest in God, or crying to God in the time of distress. O sinner, how dearly dost thou pay for thy beloved sin! at what a costly rate dost thou buy every beloved lust of thine, when it deprives thee of all comfort and interest in God, that otherwise thou mightest have in crying to God in the day of distress!

Obs. 6. When the good of duty is cast off, evil of punishment will come in. "The enemy shall pursue him." By casting off that which is good, we cast off mercy and protection; we open a door to all kind of misery: if we retain that which is good, we retain God; but when that which is good is cast off, we lie exposed and naked to all kind of misery, for God owns us not.

Ver. 4. They have set up kings, but not by me: they have made princes, and I knew it not: of their silver and their gold have they made them idols, that they may be cut off.

Here we have their civil apostacy, the other was a moral apostacy. "They have set up kings, but not by me." Though all government is dependent on God, yet we are to know that God had an especial hand in the government of the people of the Jews. It was not merely civil, but a spiritual, and a kind of divine kingdom and typical government that God set over them, to typify the government of Christ. And hence we are to take this caution; we may easily be led into many errors, if we argue, That because the kings of Israel and Judah did so, therefore it is in the power of any king to do the same now; for certainly there was much difference between government in that state, and government now. State and church were mixed together, and the government was typical, to set forth the kingdom of Jesus Christ. Therefore, though God now leaves states at liberty to set up what government may best suit them, yet that was not permitted to the Jews; they were to have only that government which God revealed from heaven, for their civil state. When, therefore, they would change the form of their government from judges to kings, God said, they had rejected him in casting it off.

"They have set up kings, but not by me." Some think that this has reference to the choosing of a king at first, because they did it without God's warrant; and so they have set up kings, but not by me. But I rather think it refers to Jeroboam and his successors; they set up Jeroboam and his successors, but not by God. This, you will say, is a strange opinion, for Scripture clearly states that it was from God that Jeroboam should be king, and that the ten tribes should be rent from Solomon's posterity for the punishment of Solomon's sin. So 1 Kings xi. 29—31. The prophet Ahijah the Shilonite comes to Jeroboam, rends the garment of Jeroboam in twelve pieces, and saith to him, "Take thee ten pieces: for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee." The Lord sent his prophet to tell him expressly, that he would rend ten tribes from the house of Solomon, to give them to him; and yet here it is said, "They have set up kings, but not by me." Again, in chap. xii. 15, Rehoboam "hearkened not unto the people; for the cause was from the Lord, that he might perform his saying, which the Lord spake by Ahijah the Shilonite unto Jeroboam the son of Nebat." It was from the Lord that Rehoboam gave such a churlish answer, it was from the Lord that he was left to such a tyrannical, cruel spirit, that the Lord might fulfil the word that he had spoken by Ahijah the Shilonite.

Abulensis thinks that the ten tribes for the matter of the thing did no more than was right, and he gives this reason,

These tribes were free tribes, but Rehoboam would bring them into slavery, and reign over them as a tyrant; therefore they might lawfully depart from him and make to themselves a new king. And then he puts the cause, viz. a people, or commonwealth, first gave the power to kings and princes, but upon certain conditions; therefore, as they first gave power to them, so they may diminish it if they abuse it, and tyrannize over them. When a people choose a chief governor, they do not give themselves to him as a man gives to his friend a piece of money, or a horse, that is, give all out of their own possession, and that he may do with them what he will, but upon certain conditions.

Now, though I do not altogether approve of what he has said, because at least the case between people and princes now is different from what it was; then God challenged a peculiar prerogative over them for ordering their government; yet thus far in divinity is true: There is more reason that people should now have more power to cast off tyranny than there was, because now none arrives at government over others, orderly and ordinarily, but by agreement; therefore if the agreement and law of the country be elective and not hereditary, or that males shall only inherit, or that they may deliver themselves from tyranny, so far certainly God allows in his word.

But now, to answer the case more clearly, "They have set up kings, but not by me;" though God had foretold that the ten tribes should be rent away from the house of David, and that Jeroboam should be set up, yet they did not this thing in a lawful manner, for they should have consulted with God about the manner of it, and when God would have it done. It was not enough that God foretold it should be done, but when they did it they ought to have consulted God, and have been directed by God. They did not aim at fulfilling the prophecy, for the people generally merely minded their own passions and lusts, and looked no further. Though God overruled it to fulfil his own counsels, yet they aimed at no such thing.

Obs. 1. We may do the thing which God would have done, and yet sin highly against God. God would have Jeroboam set up, but as they only looked at the matter, and did not observe God's way, God rejected them.

Obs. 2. In doing that which God would have done, yet if we do not know that it is God's mind, we sin against God. Though we do the thing that God would have done in his secret will, yet we sin against God if we know it not to be his revealed will. Now no action can be good, not only materially good, but formally also, but that is which is done in obedience to God; and that shows the dangerous condition of ignorant people, all their actions are sin, because they know not in them God's mind.

Obs. 3. To go about great businesses without consulting with God, is sin. Even the heathens were conscious of this, therefore Publius Scipio would never enter upon any great business without first going to the capitol to pray to the gods.

Obs. 4. Alteration in civil government is a great business. God had need be much consulted, especially if there be any church work mingled with it. Never was there a time when England required such consulting with God as this. Now England is about the greatest and weightiest business that ever it had since it was a nation. The very alteration but of an officer is a great matter, and requires much consulting with God, and especially if it be in the church. Our Saviour's conduct in sending out his twelve apostles as officers for the church is very observable: he was in prayer all night before, then in the morning he calls his disciples, and so sends forth twelve of them, and gives them his commission; but he makes preparation in praying to God all night long, Luke vi. 12, 13. Surely those that are about choosing church officers, ministers of God to be their pastors and teachers, had need spend days and nights in prayer. Here they did not consult God in setting Jeroboam over them, and therefore, saith God, they have made them kings, but not by me.

Obs. 5. When we are about great businesses, we must look at God's designs. We must take heed of our passionate wills, and our own self-ends, else we do it not by God. In civil affairs, a magistrate may do that which is just, but if he is urged by his passion, this is not by God; and so in church affairs, if the elders excommunicate, the party may deserve it, but if they be guided by passion and self-ends, this is not done by God. "They have set up kings, but not by me."

And then, further, as the people sinned, and God would not own that which they set up, so Jeroboam sinned too. Jeroboam might say, Lord, didst not thou send thy prophet to tell me that I should have the ten tribes, and yet wilt thou not own me? No, God would not own him; because,

1. Jeroboam did not seek God.

2. Jeroboam did not stay God's time. David was appointed by God, and though he had many opportunities to take away Saul's life, and to gain thereby the kingdom, yet he would not, but waited till he saw the time was come that he should be brought to the kingdom. But Jeroboam would not do so.

3. Jeroboam's ends in taking the kingdom were not right.

4. Jeroboam did not administer the kingdom for God, and therefore God would not own him. And so some read the words, They have not administered the kingdom by me; but administering the kingdom by their own lusts, therefore I will not own them.

Obs. 6. We can have no comfort of God's mercies if we stay not God's time.

Obs. 7. When we have a mercy promised, we must take it by lawful means. "He that believeth shall not make haste," saith the Scripture. Many there are so greedy of places, preferments, and other things they desire, that they make as much haste to obtain them as if they feared that if they stay for the orderly coming into the place they desire, they must go without it. What blessing, then, can there be in that which we would seek to get in our haste, without God?

Obs. 8. When we have a mercy, if we improve it not for God, we thereby deny that we are indebted to him for it. God has given thee an estate, or honours, or preferment. What dost thou? Dost thou now abuse this for thine own lusts? If so, thou hereby deniest that thou hast had it from God. "They have set up kings, but not by me." I will not own that. Why? Because in the form of their administration they have renounced any right I have to their government. And so the Seventy translate the words, Ἐαυτοῖς βασιλευσαν, They have reigned to themselves.

Yea, but it may be said, How were the people that were living now guilty of this? It was long since the people did thus set up Jeroboam, and rend themselves from the house of David; how came these to be guilty of this?

The answer is, That they, continuing and retaining the government of Jeroboam upon the same ground their progenitors first raised it, are guilty of their sins. Children, imitating their parents' sins, contract their parents' guilt.

And Mercier, on this place, quotes a Hebrew, David Kimchi, as saying, that now, when the people saw what Jeroboam and his successors did, that they would keep them from going to Jerusalem before the Lord, and make them to serve idols, and forsake God's true worship, they should have driven him from the kingdom. Such was his opinion: but it is scarcely correct; we cannot do so merely for religion, except the law of the country will bear us out in it. War is not to be undertaken merely for maintaining religion immediately, but for maintaining those laws by which religion is established, and the civil right that men have to the practice of their religion confirmed. So wars may be undertaken; but in a place where the laws of the kingdom were utterly opposed to religion, to take up arms were unjustifiable, except those laws were previously annulled by competent authority.

But now our taking up arms is justified in this, because we do it to maintain the civil right that we have to the practice of our own religion: so that our case is not the case of the Christians among the heathen. There is a law of nature (I confess) beyond the right of any law, and the right in that cannot be given away by any predecessors. But because the mischief would be infinitely great, if it were left to every man to judge when by this law of nature he might resist; therefore there is a necessity that men should, for their particular, suffer, rather than so resist; it is necessary for us to stay till we be helped in some orderly, legal manner. I say, the God of order never leaves people to such miserable inconveniences and mischiefs; and therefore, in the case of individuals, they are rather to suffer, though they should be tyrannized over against the law of nature.

But certainly, a state, or country, may judge when the law of nature, and the right of a kingdom that the law of nature gives, besides that which is given by positive laws, are to be maintained. The right of the law of nature is never taken away by positive enactments.

"They have made princes, and I knew it not." They made some in a very sinful manner, and God might well say, I knew not them. But God speaks of them all, not only of those, but even of Jeroboam himself, and Jehu, who though in part set up by God, yet he saith of them, "I knew it not;" that is, I approve it not, I approved it not as they did it; I let them alone in their way, and let them go on: as if God should say, I neither did, nor will, take cognizance of what they do to bless them in it. When we seek not God for a mercy, when we enjoy it God will not even own it to be his.

The Seventy translate the words, kai ouc ἐγνωστῶν μοι, and they have not made it known to me. When we ask not God's mind, and seek not a mercy from God, we act as if we would get it without his knowledge. We must tell God what we would have, before we presume to take it; and by this means we may go to God with more comfort for help and direction, if we meet with straits. Whereas, otherwise, whatsoever difficulties occur, if we should seek to God to help us in them, God would say, I knew nothing of the matter, you undertook it without me, and you must shift for yourself in it; look to it now as you can, sink or swim, I will have nothing to do with it. We are wont to put off men in this manner, if they will go and undertake a business of their own heads, and then in their difficulties apply to us for aid; Nay, as you undertook it without me, so go on without me. However, I make no question but now many thousands of the servants of God in this great business of the state, where they meet with so many difficulties, can go to God and say, Lord, we did advise with thee, and we undertook this in obedience to thee, and now, Lord, help us in our straits. Oh! it is a comfortable thing to have previously advised with God, for then we can apply to him with confidence in all our difficulties.

Further, there are these two notes from this:

Obs. 9. God knows how to make use of men's sins. They sinned, and yet God brought about his own ends by it.

Obs. 10. God often suffers sinners to prosper for a long time. Even this kingdom of Israel, that was thus set up without God, did prosper outwardly for two hundred years together; therefore this is no argument to God's owning a business; it is but as a cipher; add a figure to it indeed, then it will make somewhat; if you can warrant it is God's work, then you may, when it prospers, have comfort.

"Of their silver and their gold have they made them idols." See the ill success of their actions, and all because God was not sought. Whatsoever we do to satisfy our passions and lusts for our own ends, without seeking God, must be attended with bad results. Though God suffered this kingdom to prosper outwardly, yet woeful, mischievous fruit ensued upon the alteration of their government without God; it fell into, and continued in, idolatry for two hundred years. We had need take heed to our hearts that we be upright, and seek God, in setting up any new form of government, lest, though it be so very specious to our eye, that we may think that we are delivered from many yokes and burdens, yet such effects may result that we may thereby be brought under a bondage still more grievous. They cast off the house of David because of the burdens that were upon them, but yet have they brought greater upon themselves; for now Jeroboam and his successors lay a very heavy yoke upon their very consciences, the yoke of idolatry: the burden before was upon their backs and shoulders, but now it comes to be a burden upon their consciences, and that is worse to bear.

"Of their silver and their gold have they made them idols." God here instances their zeal in their idolatries; they were content to contribute their silver and gold for their idols, they had rather be without them than without their idols. Covetous spirits had rather be without God, and Christ, and his ordinances, than without their silver and gold; let them have their silver and gold, and let God, and Christ, and his ordinances go. Yet these idolaters say, Let us have our idols, and let our silver and gold go. Yea, they parted with their gold and silver to make them gods; but many of you keep your gold and silver and make them gods too. The sun (saith Austin) is a more beautiful thing than thy money, Aug. de Disciplina Christi. but it is not thy God. That which brings in silver and gold, drossy, carnal minds love; but if it brings not this in, they care not for it whatsoever it be. Chrysostom has another expression: A covetous man is not delighted with the beauty of heaven, nor with the motion Chrysost. in Matt. xxviii. Hom. 81. of the sun. Why? Because the sun does not send forth golden beams into his house.

"That they may be cut off." The word עֲבָדִים translated "idols," signifies things that cause much labour; and then follows, "that they may be cut off;" as if he should say, They are at a great deal of charge to undo themselves. Many men make their own damnation chargeable to them. "Of their silver and their gold have they made them idols," saith God, "that they may be cut off." My end was that they might be cut off, whatsoever their end was. When we are busied in compassing our own ends, God may be working our ruin even by those very things we bless ourselves in, and from which we expect great advantage. O consider this, while I am plotting for myself, and blessing myself in hope of gain, God's thoughts, and counsels, and workings, and ends may be cross to mine, even intending my ruin, my eternal ruin!

Obs. 11. Whatsoever we do, from which evil necessarily follows, is accounted by God as if we brought the evil designedly on ourselves. Surely they set not up silver and gold with an intention to destroy themselves; but because destruction necessarily follows, therefore God accounts it done on purpose. Thus in Prov. viii. 36, "All they that hate me love death." Surely no man loves death; but when you do cast off the instruction of wisdom you, as it were, say you love death: as here, "that they may be cut off."

Ver. 5. Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off; mine anger is kindled against them: how long will it be ere they attain to innocency?

"Thy calf, O Samaria." He calls the idol a calf by way of contempt. But why is it called the calf of Samaria? We read only of two, and neither was set up in Samaria; yet here it is called, "Thy calf, O Samaria." The reason is this, that Samaria was the chief city; and because the calf was maintained by the power, and riches, and countenance of the chief city of the land, therefore it is called the calf of Samaria. Where the chief city is corrupted, the whole land will quickly become corrupt; and where that stands right, it goes well with the whole land. That is the reason why the adversaries seek to corrupt and overthrow our chief city. As all depended on what Samaria did, therefore the corruption of false worship is attributed to Samaria, it is "thy calf, O Samaria." So if God had not moved the hearts of the people of this city, but we had brought popery in, it might have been said, it was the popery of London. Whereas, on the other side, if God please to work their spirits to go on to the end aright, children yet unborn may have cause to bless this city, and say, This is the reformation for which we may bless London.

"Hath cast thee off." Hath cast thee off from me; so some have it. But rather as you have it in your books, "Thy calf hath cast thee off."

Obs. 1. Though idolaters promise themselves safety and protection by their idols, yet they will fail them at last. All you that go on in sin, know that its ways will fail you at last; as they say, the devil leaves the witches when imprisoned. When Judas went to the scribes and Pharisees in the anguish of his spirit, and cast down the money, and said, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood;" "What is that to us?" say they, "see thou to that." Therefore the best way is to cast off our sin and wickedness first. But God will not do thus, he will not cast off his people in the time of trouble; and when our unbelieving hearts fear that God will cast us off in the time of trouble, we make God an idol, as if God would do as the idols did. We may, in God's cause, be brought into straits, but God will never cast us off in them: when in difficulties we are ready to think ourselves utterly forsaken, but then God may be working the greatest good for us. We have a most notable scripture for that in Isa. xlix. 13, 14, "Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains: for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy upon his afflicted." But mark, "Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me." All around were in a singing condition; and God calls the heavens to sing, and the earth to be joyful, and the mountains to break forth into singing, because of the great work that God was accomplishing for his people: "But Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me." And so it is with particular souls, they are ready to say, The Lord hath forsaken me; but God will not do so.

"Mine anger is kindled against them." When wicked men are brought into the greatest straits, then God's wrath is hottest, and then also conscience upbraids most. As men's countenances sometimes change red and pale with anger; so here, metaphorically, God's anger is said to be "kindled against them." Though the superstitious may think that outward, pompous worship pleases God most, yet we see here that it stirs up his anger and kindles his wrath.

"How long will it be?" Men's hearts are stubborn in their own ways, they will not be drawn off from them; wicked men will be true to their own principles.

Obs. 2. There is a stubborn constancy in evil, as well as a gracious constancy in good. "How long will it be?"

Obs. 3. God is very patient: "the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering."

Obs. 4. Continuance in sin is no excuse, but an aggravation of sin, it makes it grievous to God. When God chastises us, we are ready to cry, "How long, Lord?" "Will he retain his anger for ever?" Know, that our continuance in sin is as great a burden to God's Spirit; he cries out, When will they be made clean? when shall it once be? "O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved. How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" Jer. iv. 14.

"Ere they attain to innocency." The words are לֹא יִכְרְוּ עַד כִּי יִבְרֹאוּ they cannot innocency, that is, they are so deeply engaged that they cannot attain to innocency: when men are engaged in evil ways they cannot deliver themselves. The observations are,

Obs. 5. We should take heed of engagements in that which is evil.

Obs. 6. If, by custom in evil, we have no power to get out, this will not excuse us. In 2 Pct. ii. 14, "Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin;" this is the aggravation of sin, not its excuse.

A learned man of late renders this, they cannot bear innocency: and indeed, according to the Hebrew, this may as well as anything else be added for explication; for, as we have observed, the original is, they cannot innocency, the word attain not being in the Hebrew; and to this he gives the following interpretation, suiting very well with the time wherein Hosea prophesied; They cannot bear with those who will not join with them, but will go to Jerusalem to worship, and who seek to free themselves from defilements in the service of God. There is nothing in the world wherein men can less bear one with another, than in dissensions about the worship of God, and commonly the nocent party is the most bitter; as the Lutherans were worse in their ways than the Calvinists, especially in respect of superstition, but were a great deal more bitter against the Calvinists than the Calvinists against them; it was a saying of Calvin, Though Luther should call me devil, yet I would honour him as a servant of Jesus Christ.

The word כִּי here translated "innocency," signifies purity, or cleanness: whatsoever holiness may seem to be in false worship, yet it is not clean; but God's worship is clean, "the fear of the Lord is clean:" such wickedness attends it, as if God should say, You are never like to wash off the guilt of it as long as you live. It is not so easy as men think, to get off the guilt of superstitious worship. We cannot but acknowledge, to our own shame, that we have formerly sullied ourselves with superstition: we had need wash and rinse our hearts again and again, and be willing to lay abroad a frosting whole nights, that we may be cleansed from the filth that we have contracted; yea, we should not think it much, nor marvel, though the fire of God's wrath come out against us and burn hot and long; if it be but to purge, and not to destroy us, it is well: for it is not easy to be cleansed from superstition; it is only the blood of the immaculate Lamb that is able to wash away its stains; its filth sticks very fast.

Ver. 6. For from Israel was it also: the workman made it; therefore it is not God: but the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces.

The prophet proceeds in his conviction of Israel's sin, with the threats of God against it.

"For from Israel was it." That is, their idolatry was from themselves; it was hard to get them off from their idolatrous worship, for it was from themselves. Others worshipped idolatrous images, as being deceived, being made to believe that they came from their gods; as that wise town clerk of Ephesus, in his grave, sage speech, Acts xix. 35, said, their image "fell down from Jupiter;" or else they were such as were brought from the temples of other people, whose original they knew not. But, saith God, My people are more sottish than any, for from Israel themselves come these their images that they worship, they have set them up themselves; they know that the other day they were but pieces of wood, overlaid with gold and silver; for their calves were idols that Israel invented themselves, not the same (as some think) with the Egyptian Apis, for that idol was a live bullock with several spots and divers things wherein it differed from the calves that Israel worshipped, so that the calves of Israel's worship were their own invention. Hence there are these notes:

Obs. 1. None are so sottish in wickedness as apostates. Israel was more sottish than any people.

Obs. 2. To be devisers and inventors of evil, and especially of any thing false in the worship of God, is a great aggravation of sin. Those that are the first inventors and devisers of wickedness, and especially of any false worship, are most wicked and abominable before God. It was from themselves.

Obs. 3. Men hold fast by their own inventions in the worship of God. This is given as a reason why they could not be brought off from that false worship; it was from themselves. And hereby men show that they honour their own fancies and wills above the will and the mind of God: we will a great deal more easily part with the worship of God that comes from Israel, than with worship that comes from ourselves.

"Also." "For from Israel was it also." There is somewhat in that "also;" and it is this, As formerly in the wilderness they set up a calf, so here again, "from Israel was it also." Former examples of God's wrath against their progenitors will not deter them, they still follow the guise of their ancestors in false worship.

Obs. 4. No sin is more hereditary than idolatry. "From Israel also." Hence, the second commandment alone threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children.

"The workman made it; therefore it is not God; but the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces." There are two arguments, why their calf was "not God."

I. "The workman made it."

II. It "shall be broken in pieces."

I. "The workman made it." It is the greatest folly to look upon that which derives its excellency from ourselves, as superior to us, and that in the highest degree; to forsake the God that made us, and to make that to be a god unto us which we have made ourselves. The father looks upon his child as inferior to him, because he was the instrument of his being, and so he well may; and if one be maintained or raised by another, he is expected to be serviceable to him. In both these relations we stand to God, but idolatry makes men go against the very principles of reason. They fashion the idol, and yet account it their god: they are made and sustained by God, and yet forget him. Hence, especially,

Obs. 5. Man cannot by any act of his own deify a creature. They "made it, therefore it is not God." Man cannot so much as impart holiness to a creature, much less divinity; all the workmanship of man, by his consecration, or any thing that he can do, cannot make stones and mortar holy, so that, in case of need, it should be a sin to put them to a common use. Man takes too much upon him to think to raise the creature so near to divinity; he cannot, by any work of his, so put religious respect on a place, or on any thing else, that God there shall be nearer to him, or he nearer to God. Whatsoever is of man's work, in God's worship, perishes in the using of it; surely then man's creation cannot be God. "The workman made it; therefore it is not God."

Indeed there is a creation of man which the Scripture speaks of, that is called god, not truly, not God really, but metaphorically; thus in 1 Pet. ii. 13, kings and governors are called man's creation, man made them; and you know the Scripture calls governors gods. "I have said, Ye are gods," Psal. lxxxii. 6; but it is added, "ye shall die like men;" this text shows, if man made them, they cannot be truly gods; and the former scripture tells us, that kings and governors are man's creation; in your books it is translated man's "ordination," but it is in the original κρίσις ἀνθρώπινη, man's creation. Man made them, and therefore they are not gods; therefore we must not give them the honour of a God, to subject our consciences unto them; no, neither are we bound to subject our outward estates, and liberties, and lives to their humours and lusts, for to the mere will of God alone are we all subject.

If all the art and skill, power and riches, of all the men in the world were put together, and all the wisdom and power of angels, and all the created excellency in all things and in all creatures, joined to it, yet this surely could not be a God to us; I say, if we conceive all art, skill, power, and riches, of all the world, brought together into one man, yea, all the skill and power of angels put into him too, and if he were able to extract all the excellencies out of all creatures, and combine them in himself, yet could he not be a God unto us; because he was made. And shall we say further, God himself, by his infinite power, cannot make any thing to be a God to us; nay, if God himself were made, he could not be God: therefore, surely that which the workman hath made cannot be a God.

How vile then are our hearts, and how do we debase ourselves, to subject ourselves to every vanity, as if it were a God, whereas all the power in God himself cannot so exalt a created excellency, as to be a God to us! How vain is the heart of men that makes pleasure their god, as the voluptuous, his belly; that makes money their god, as the covetous; that makes honour and the applause of men their god, as the ambitious! Bernice and Agrippa came with great pomp, with much fantasy, μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, Acts xxv. 23; all the excellency of their pomp was but a show, a mere fantasy.

In this God shows the excellency of an immortal soul, that it is such, that only an infinite, eternal being, like himself, can be a God to us.

But further, This is an argument against the idol of the mass: a common priest, vile perhaps in himself, makes it a god: what kind of a divinity must it be? Can there be a greater stumbling-block to Jews, Turks, or heathens, to keep them from embracing the Christian religion, than this, that Christians should make their god, and then eat him? That is the first argument: "The workman made it; therefore it is not God."

II. It "shall be broken in pieces." "But the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces," "therefore it is not God." No God, surely! He speaks here with indignation. It is not God, it is a calf; as doth the psalmist, Psal. cvi. 20, "They changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass." It "shall be broken in pieces," it shall not be able to help itself, much less help them; it shall be as Dagon before the ark, broken all to pieces.

Jerome on the place saith, that he learned from a Hebrew, that this word (which is not a verb, but a noun, signifying, breaking in pieces) carries with it the idea of a web, such as you see at some times of the year in the fields, upon the grass, thin webs, like spiders' webs, that presently dissolve into atoms; so that their calf shall, like them, dissolve and come to nothing. All the confidence and hopes in any thing we set up in the place of God, are such to us. What difference is there between such a thing and "a strong rock," and "an high tower," such as God is to his people.

And again, The word signifies saw-dust, that comes from timber that is sawn, and so it "shall be broken in pieces;" look, as the calf in the wilderness was ground even to dust, to powder, and Moses made the people drink of it in water; so God will serve this calf. Hence,

Obs. 6. Idols are to be broken in pieces. So God commanded, Exod. xxxiv. 13; Deut. vii. 5; Ezek. xx. 7; with many other scriptures; and thus godly magistrates have ever done, broken idols in pieces. And blessed be God for what has been done of late among us, that so many idols, and especially that great idol which was in the most eminent place of the city, God put a spirit into those in authority to break in pieces. This must be done by the magistrate, as those in authority alone possess power over public places.

I remember Austin in his sixth discourse on Christ's sermon, speaking of Deut. xii. 1—3, saith, First you must possess the land, and then you shall overthrow their altars; and thence notes, That it is for those alone who have the possession of the land to break the idols in pieces. In the city of Basil, we read, that every Ash Wednesday (as they call it) is observed a festival, instead of the popish fast on that day, because of the burning of popish images. And though we have no warrant to observe such a day as a holy day, yet certainly as a day of outward, civil rejoicing, we have cause to observe those times wherein notorious and abominable idols have been broken in pieces.

Obs. 7. whatsoever may be broken in pieces, we are not to make our god. Now, all creatures in the world are subject to breaking: your estates are in danger to be broken in pieces, therefore they are not gods; that is the argument of the Holy Ghost here: yea, it may be many of your estates are broken in pieces already; oh what poor gods were they then to you! and so with any other creature whatsoever: therefore let us "trust in the Lord for ever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength," Isa. xxvi. 4.

Obs. 8. Deifying a creature makes way for the destruction of that creature. "The calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces," because it was made an idol. If you would use your estates to fit you for God's service, you might keep them; but if you set them up in God's place, it is just with God that they should "be broken in pieces." Yea, if you set your husband, your wife, your child, your friend, in the place of God, they must be broken to pieces; broken to pieces, at least with respect to you. Many great instruments of God, God has been fain to break to pieces, because that men have set them up in the place of God, and made even gods of them.

Ver. 7. For they have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind: it hath no stalk: the bud shall yield no meat; if so be it yield, the strangers shall swallow it up.

"For they have sown." Sowing is a laborious work, and this idolatrous people were very laborious, took a great deal of pains, about their false worship. Hence,

Obs. 1. Idolaters are laborious; they are willing to take pains and go through many difficulties for the furtherance of their false worship. Those that sow must be abroad in the wind and the cold. Let not us be sluggish then in the true worship of our God, let us be willing to pass through many difficulties to promote his cause.

Obs. 2. Idolaters sow in hope. Sowing is a labour without any present profit coming in by it, the benefit of the labour lies in the future expectation. We are forthwith weary of a little labour, except we receive some present return; we cannot wait for the blessing of "the former and the latter rain" upon our endeavours; we must be always reaping, or else we are wearied and discouraged. Idolaters would work hard though they get nothing for the present; how much more should we labour for God in expectation of the harvest that God has provided!

Obs. 3. Idolaters labour to maintain their false worship for the sake of posterity. "For they have sown." Sowing is a work for the maintenance of the succession of provision from one generation to another: so idolaters are not content to enjoy their idolatries during their own times, but adopt means to continue the enjoyment to future generations. Thus we should do, and with great reason, in the true worship of God; not think it enough to enjoy it ourselves, but use all means in our power, that we may leave it to our posterity; that we may sow for posterity as well as ourselves, that we may leave a stock of provision for our children afterwards. Through God's mercy our forefathers did so, and we have reaped the harvest of their seed; and as through their endeavours we have enjoyed much of the worship and of the truths of God, let us likewise sow for those that will succeed us.

Obs. 4. Idolaters observe their seasons. "For they have sown." Sowing is a work that must be done in its season, or it is done in vain: so idolaters mark the times fit for the furtherance of their false worship; much more should we for the worship of God. We have had a fair season, and have seemed to be very busy; the Lord grant we do not sow the wind, as follows in the next words.

"The wind." "They have sown the wind." This is a proverbial speech, signifying the taking a great deal of pains to little purpose; as if a man should go abroad in the fields, and spread his hands about with effort, and yet grasp nothing but air. The wind is an empty creature in respect of things solid, therefore the Scripture often makes use of it to signify the vanity of the hopes and laborious endeavours of wicked men: you find several expressions in Scripture illustrative of this; as, "Labouring for the wind," Eccles. v. 16; "feeding upon the wind," Hos. xii. 1; "bringing forth the wind," Isa. xxvi. 18; "inheriting the wind," Prov. xi. 29; and here, in the text, "sowing in the wind."

Obs. 5. Many do nothing all their lifetime, but sow the wind; they labour and toil, but what comes of it? It is no good account to give to God of our time, to say that we have taken a great deal of pains; we may take pains, and yet "sow the wind."

Who are those that sow the wind?

1. Some students; men that spend their thoughts and strength about things no way profitable to themselves or others, such sow the wind; with a great deal of earnestness they do just nothing, for what they do is but a trifle. Many scholars study night and day, tire themselves with reading, and musing, and writing, and yet are no way useful; either their studies have been in useless things, raking among rubbish and lumber, or else they know not how to turn to advantage their reading and learning. And indeed it is a pitiful object to behold one who has been all his days a great student, has risen early and gone to bed late, grudged the very time of his meals, yet a useless man in the place where he is, and of no service, after all, to church or common-weal: such a man has all his days "sown the wind."

2. Idolaters; all those who take pains and are at great cost in superstitious worship, all their intentions that they have to honour God, come to nothing, it is but a sowing the wind : and this is that which is here especially meant, they sow the wind. All idolatrous worshippers but sow the wind : how many papists are there, that dare not for their lives but rise at the hours that they have vowed, and spend them at their beads, wear out their bodies by their fastings and watchings, deny themselves the use of the creatures, wear sackcloth, lie very hard, tire their bodies by pilgrimage, forsake the revenues that their progenitors have left them, vow perpetual virginity, shut themselves up in cloisters ! What a deal of labour and toil is all this to the flesh ! and it is for conscience' sake, with a desire to honour God, and to afflict themselves for their sins. And yet this, not having warrant from God, being but "will-worship," is but sowing the wind ; they lose all their labour, cost, and charge, all their thoughts, and devotions.

3. Formalists ; such as content themselves in the outward part of God's worship, having no power nor life of godliness in the services they perform. You have many that do things out of custom, content themselves in the outward act, dare not for their lives neglect prayer, not one morning nor evening, nor at other times, and are often with God's people in fasting, or coming to hear the word ; but yet all this while, not having the life and power of godliness in these their duties, they do but sow the wind, they lose all their labour : and when they come to die, and desire comfort from what they have done, they shall find nothing but the wind to feed upon, they will have no solid comfort to satisfy their souls in the day of their distress.

4. The vain-glourious ; they who do all that they do out of vain-glory, who, to set up themselves among others, spend a long time in prayer, and an ostentatiously scrupulous observance of all rites and ceremonies, a principle of vain-glory actuating them throughout ; these have been but sowing the wind. Men of public gifts, who do abundance of good in the church of God and in the commonwealth, but are moved thereto by a principle of self and vain-glory, lose all, they sow but the wind.

5. Carnal politicians ; these leave the rule of the word, and carry on their actions altogether by the rules of carnal policy, thinking to effect great things by their devices. These, despising the word and worship of God as things beneath them, sow but the wind while they profess to be engaged in weighty matters. The people here were moved by carnal policy, and God calls it all but sowing the wind : they thought they had framed to themselves a notable piece of work, but, saith God, it is but sowing the wind.

6. Such as serve themselves of sin ; such as seek to shift for themselves by sinful means when they are in any straits, and forsake lawful courses to help themselves out of trouble ; these are they that sow the wind to themselves, nothing will come of all the labour they take. Now to apply this :

1. The church of God may have much comfort in this, that all their enemies, in all they do, but sow the wind ; they can never prevail, be not afraid of them.

2. Life is the seed-time for eternity : it is an evil and dangerous thing therefore now to sow the wind, to lose this seed-time, and to have nothing for our souls to feed upon to all eternity. Oh ! how sad will it be when we are entering on eternity, to see then that we have all our lifetime but "sown the wind !" Did men consider that their actions were seeds for eternity, certainly they would take more heed what they do. Men are very careful of their seed ; what husbandman that is to sow his ground would go into a market to buy chaff, to buy blasted stuff to be his seed ? no, he would buy the largest and plumpest corn he could get for seed. So should we be careful of all our actions, for they are such seed as must bring forth a harvest of eternal happiness, or else eternal sorrow ; and especially we had need look to our seed when God gives us a fair opportunity of sowing. All hypocrites, formalists, and false worshippers, sow the wind, their actions are but as the wind ; but the servants of God, whose works come from faith, and are indeed godly, they sow to immortality and glory, their seed will bring forth a glorious harvest. I remember that Luther, though a man that seemed to beat down works very much, yet has this passage concerning works : Take works out of the cause of justification, and no man can too magnificently commend good works that come from faith. And speaking of a good work that comes from faith, he saith, Any one good work is a more precious thing than heaven and earth. Yea, he himself, though no merit-monger, yet extols good works that come from faith, and saith, The whole world is not sufficient reward for one good work resulting from faith. Indeed the works of the saints have a great deal of excellency in them, one gracious work has more of the glory of God in it than all the creation of heaven and earth besides : I say, the whole frame of heaven and earth has not so much of the glory of God in it, as one good work that comes from the grace of God in the hearts of the saints ; and my reason is this, because a good work that comes from the grace of God in the hearts of the saints, is a reflection of spiritual life, that is, of the very life of God, as the Scripture calls it, the life of God, and the Divine nature. Now an action of spiritual life more sets forth the glory of God than any glory that God has passively ; the glory that he has in the frame of the heavens and earth is but a passive glory, but here the very glory of God is reflected upon his own face, it is a glory of spiritual life. A man does not account one so much honoured in an image that is drawn of him, as when he sees his child act as he himself acts, his own character impressed on the offspring. Now all the frame of heaven and earth is not so much as a picture, it is but as the footsteps of God, the skirts of his glory ; but in one gracious action of the saints God sees his child act as he himself doth, he sees the workings of his own holiness and his own virtues ; we show forth the virtues of him that "hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. ii. 9.

3. Ministers must most of all men take heed that they sow not the wind. God has made them seeds-men of that eternal seed, his word, and they fail to sow it truly, when, 1. They are loth to take pains, or to be at the charge for good seed, they sow husks and chaff, and bring merely empty words to their people. 2. When they do take sufficient pains, but bring their own fancies and counsels instead of the precious immortal seed of the word : in both these cases they do but sow the wind. The Seventy translate the כִּי רִיחַ יִרְחַק words which we render "for they have sown the wind," thus, for they have sown things corrupted by the wind. Those actions that pride corrupts, will never bring forth good fruit.

"And they shall reap the whirlwind." As we sow, so shall we reap. The word in the Hebrew (Tremelius upon this place observes) has a syllable more than usual added ; and that, saith he, to increase its signification ; to note, that this is not only a whirlwind, but a most terrible whirlwind. And mark, he does not say they sow the wind, and they shall reap the wind ; no, there is more in the harvest than in the seed ; if men will "sow the wind," they must expect to "reap the whirlwind." If thou hast but a little pleasure in thy sinful ways, thou must expect a great deal of misery as their fruit. Their labour shall not only be in vain, but much evil shall come, sudden and violent destruction. All sinful actions are like the sowing of the wind in the earth : now we know, if windy vapours get into the earth, they break forth into whirlwinds, they cause earthquakes ;

so wicked actions break forth into violence and irresistible evils, and will cause heart-quake at last. Great is the power of the whirlwind, the Scripture describes it as very great; so, in 1 Kings xix. 11, it "rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks." Sabelicos reports, that Cambyses' soldiers being at dinner in a sandy place, there arose a whirlwind and drove the sand upon them so that it covered them all. And yet, what is the wind, but many vapours conjoined? and yet what mighty strength is in them! By the way, this meditation may be raised here: What! shall the conjunction of many such weak things as vapours prevail so mightily? what then must be the strength of the infinite God, to which nothing can be added! Add many vapours together, and they form strong winds, which rend up the mountains by the roots. If many weak things put together (I say) prove thus powerful, what must be the strength of an infinite God, to which no strength can be added! But out of the words,

Obs. 6. It is just with God, that those who sow the wind should reap the whirlwind; should be brought into trouble and vexation, into miserable and irremediable distresses. You that spend your time about trifles, whereas God sets you in the world on work of great importance, it is just with God that you should have horror on your spirits hereafter, when he shall make you see how you have spent that time upon which eternity depended: and you that spend your time in false worship, and so think to put off God with your own inventions, it is just with God that you should reap the whirlwind. Ye formalists, who spend your strength and time in the observance of mere external rites, and never sanctify the name of God, it were just with God that horror, and distress, and trouble should fill your souls. And you, ye hypocrites, who aim at your own vain-glorious ends, whereas you should desire to bring glory to the name of God, it is just with God that fearfulness and trembling should possess you. How many have lain upon their death-beds, and cried out, Oh I have done all in hypocrisy! and so horror of conscience has been as a whirlwind to their souls. Carnal politicians, too, that have left God, and sought to provide deliverance for themselves and others out of difficulties by sinful courses, the Lord often brings into most dreadful straits, and, the worm of conscience gnawing upon them, they find by sad experience that they have reaped the whirlwind. And indeed we begun of late to corrupt the worship of God, and were carried on by carnal policy, and did sow the wind; and how has the Lord now made us in great measure to reap the whirlwind! Job saith the whirlwind comes from the south; but indeed the truth is, we have had whirlwinds coming from the north and west, and may yet have whirlwinds coming from all parts of the kingdom; for what has the land done of late, but "sown the wind?" Let us not wonder, though God at this day speak unto us out of the whirlwind, as once he did to Job.

Yea, but many may say, That which we have sown has some substance in it, it is not only the wind, for we see that it comes to a blade, it comes forth.

Yea, but, I beseech you, observe the words that follow,

"It hath no stalk: the bud shall yield no meal: if so be it yield, the strangers shall swallow it up." It may be a stalk may come forth; but, saith God, it shall be crushed before it comes to the bud. But what if it does bud? It shall be blasted, it shall "yield no meal." But what if so be it yield meal? Then "strangers shall swallow it up," saith God. This serves most elegantly to show God's watching over an apostatizing people for evil, and that howsoever they may seem to prosper for a while, yet at the last the curse of God will be their ruin.

Obs. 7. Sometimes wicked actions may seem to prosper, though God's curse is upon them. God may let them come to a stalk, or to the bud, or to the meal; this notes the possibility. It may come to the stalk, possibly to the bud, possibly to the meal, but then all shall come to nothing.

My brethren, we have found it so by experience; as it was here with this people, in their wicked idolatry and their carnal policy, has it not been so with our adversaries? some of their actions God has crushed presently; others have grown up to a blade, and have seemed to have meal in them, but then the curse of God has come upon them. Oh the uncertainty and the vanity of the comforts of ungodly men! When can they bless themselves in any one project? When it comes up to the blade? No, saith God, it shall not come to a stalk: God watches so that it seldom comes so far. Well, but then may they bless themselves if it has risen up to a stalk? No, not then either, God's curse is on them. But if it bud, may they not then bless themselves? Our projects, say they, begin to bud, and thrive bravely, may we not bless ourselves now? No, God still watches over you for evil. But what if it come to a full issue, "yield meal," and they be ready even to feed upon the fruit of their projects, may they not then think all is sure? No, the curse of God pursues them, "strangers shall swallow it up." Blessed be that God who has thus followed our adversaries: how often have they blessed themselves, and when some designs have succeeded according to their desires, thought all was well, and then God's curse came upon them! We are, my brethren, too unbelieving, too ready to fear if we hear of any thriving in any measure of our adversaries; if any stalk appear, and especially if they begin to bud, O, then we think they ripen; and we do not look up to the great God, who delights in blasting the projects of the adversaries. As the blessing of God is upon the good actions of his people, so the curse of God is upon the wicked projects of his enemies. God may seem often to leave many a good action, but he carries it through at length, though many things conspire to crush it in the very bud. God carries good projects through many difficulties, and crushes wicked projects through much prosperity.

Obs. 8. To have our desires satisfied for a while, and then destroyed, is a great judgment. But that it should be so is just in God; for ordinarily we are thus in our obedience, which usually withers before it comes to any ripeness; if it get up to the stalk, it may be, it comes not to a bud; if to meal, some strange lust or other comes in and devours it. Oh how often do our strange lusts devour our good actions, when ready to be performed! Of how many in their youth have we thought that very gracious seed began to sprout forth, and that the seed grew to a stalk, and when they came to act for themselves, that it budded in gracious actions; in their middle age we thought it yielded meal; but in their old age strange lusts came and devoured all. It is a great judgment for strangers to devour our estates which we have acquired by a great deal of labour; but truly, for strange lusts to come to devour thy hopeful beginnings, is a far greater judgment. Many have laboured diligently all their lives, and that which they have done has seemed to come to something; and the truth is, in the conclusion the devil has had the advantage of all.

And God seems to be out against us in some degree, even in the ways of his judgments, at this day. Thus as many of the adversaries' projects, so many of ours, the Lord has blasted before they come to a stalk; and when they have budded the Lord has blighted them, by the unfaithfulness of some or others; in the midst of our greatest expectations, the Lord has seemed to blast us, and what God will do with us we know not; only let us make sure that our seed be good, and though this does not prosper, or that does not succeed, yet at last God will bring the greater harvest upon us.

Ver. 8. Israel is swallowed up: now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure.

"Israel is swallowed up." Israel had made leagues among other people, till they were even swallowed up by them. And truly, my brethren, if great care be not had, there is much danger in making leagues with other nations, lest in time of our need they should enroach upon us, and at length even impose upon us laws. It was so with Israel; by their league with other people they at length became subject to their laws, and were swallowed up by them. And thus many of the people of God, yea, of the churches of God, by mingling themselves with the world, are even swallowed up, so that they lose their beauty, and at length no difference appears between them and those who surround them. None certainly can expect that any church in the world can continue without a mixture of wicked men and hypocrites, but it is one thing when they creep in un-awares, and another when the fence is broken down, so that it is very hard to discern the appearance of a church amongst them: thus it was with Israel.

"Now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure." By these words, vessel of no pleasure, is meant, a vessel that is for the carrying up and down of excrements; only the Scripture, when it mentions such vile things, speaks euphemistically; but that is the force of the word: as if he should say, My people shall be in a vile, contemptible condition among the Gentiles, as a vessel that is fit for nothing but excrements. Thus Jehoiachin is threatened, Jer. xxii. 28, though a great man, to be as "a vessel wherein is no pleasure." They had wasted their substance in seeking help from the Egyptians and Assyrians, and these made a prey of them: so long as any thing of value remained, they made much of them, but their estates being once wasted by them, they regarded them as vile and contemptible. And this is the way of wicked men, while they are serving their own turns upon any, they will flatter and caress them, but when their end is gained, then they treat them with scorn and contempt. None, when their estates are consumed, are more scorned and contemned than professors of religion who have basely crouched to wicked men, and sought to shelter themselves under them: therefore let us learn wisdom, and venture with caution to make use of men, and not please ourselves in their commendations, if they have ends of their own to serve; when they have attained them, they will scorn you, and look upon you as base and contemptible.

Again, "A vessel wherein is no pleasure." The Seventy translate it, σείως ἀχρηστων, an unprofitable vessel. But there is certainly more intended in this expression; a vessel employed in base and contemptible uses; Israel shall be so employed; and thereby they shall find a difference between my service, and the service of their enemies. Oh it is a sad expression, What! Israel a vessel employed and received to empty out excrements! Israel were a people "precious" and "honourable" in the eyes of God, Isa. xliii. 4. "An holy people unto the Lord," God's "peculiar people," "above all the nations that are upon the earth," Deut. xiv. 2. "The Lord's portion," Deut. xxxii. 9. God's "inheritance," Isa. xix. 25. God's "peculiar treasure," Exod. xix. 5. God's "glory," Isa. xlvi. 13. God's "delight," Isa. lxii. 4. Israel were "the dearly beloved of my" (God's) "soul," Jer. xii. 7; and yet now Israel is become a vessel fit only for excrements! Oh what a change does sin make! They were holy vessels, employed in holy services, in attending upon God and his worship, so as no people were; but now, see the ruin and degradation brought upon them by sin! How doth sin vilify men, employ them in base services, most degrading to an ingenuous mind! A young Spartan being taken by Antigonus, and sold for a slave, whilst employed by his master in any thing creditable, he did it; but when he bid him go and empty a vessel wherein is no pleasure, No, saith he, I will not serve you in such matters; and his master being angry with him, he went to the top of the house and cast himself off, rather than be forced to obey. And certainly there is nothing so beneath the excellency of an immortal soul as sin, for by means of it, though high in thine own thoughts, thou comest to be a vessel for the very devil to empty his excrements into: and that is lower than to be a scavenger employed in collecting the filth of the street; yea, as low as if thou wert condemned to go from morning to night, to carry away the filth in thy very hands and mouth. Some men are vessels of mercy, chosen vessels, vessels of honour fitted for the Master's use: and it is an infinite mercy of God to us, when we have deserved to be cast out as vessels wherein there is no pleasure, that God should take us out of the common lump, and should employ us to be vessels of his sanctuary; whereas others are vessels of wrath, used only in base services that are beneath the excellency of an immortal soul.

Yea, some there are who have been eminent in the church heretofore, who have been vessels filled with the gifts, I do not say graces, of the Holy Ghost, but now they are vessels in which there is no pleasure. Many of the saints, heretofore, have been refreshed by those gifts of the Holy Ghost that have been in them, but now their gifts are gone, they are fit for nothing but the meanest services; yea, some of them filled with poison, vessels wherein neither God nor man can take pleasure: yea, and some very forward professors of religion, that once were as the polished sapphires, are now turned apostates, are become more black than the coal; they were as golden vessels in the house of God, and are now become "vessels wherein is no pleasure." Demosthenes once desired the Athenians not to make a urinal of a wine pot; to employ men, that had been eminent, in base services. But now men whom God himself heretofore made use of for great services in church and state, the Lord has left to be "vessels of no pleasure." O remember, all you, from whence you are fallen! Thy heart is now exercised upon low things, thy work, it may be, now is only to further the wicked designs and desperate malice of other men; and dost thou think to be a vessel of glory, to stand before the presence of the holy God, and join with saints and angels in the eternal praises of his name? O remember from whence thou art fallen, and rest not till the Lord has been pleased to purge thee, and make thee fit for thy Master's use, and to become a vessel of honour in thy Master's house.

Ver. 9. For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by himself: Ephraim hath hired lovers.

The Lord, by the prophet, proceeds on in his charge against the ten tribes.

"For they are gone up to Assyria." They look not up to the high God for help, but "are gone up to Assyria;" Assyria is higher in their eyes than the God of heaven. How vile a thing is it to forsake confidence in God out of suspicious thoughts of him! for so it was here, they retained suspicious thoughts of God, as if he would leave them in their extremity, and therefore forsook they him, and sought for help elsewhere; they expect more good, more faithfulness, more love, not only from the creature than from God, but from the very enemies of God than from God himself; yea, that people that professed interest in God, that would seem to bless themselves in this, that God was their God, even they looked to have more good and to find more faithfulness in the very enemies of God than in God himself. Let the heavens be astonished at this wickedness: and yet this evil abides deep-rooted in the hearts of the children of men.

"A wild ass." This the Scripture mentions in divers places, as one of the most unruly, untamable, and fierce of all creatures; such as cannot be brought to be serviceable, nor to live with, no, nor even to keep company with, their own kind, but they run up and down in the wilderness alone. In Job xi. 12, mention is made of this creature; "For vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt." And in Job xxxix. 5, "Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?" And, to name no more, in Jer. ii. 24, "A wild ass used to the wilderness, that snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure; in her occasion who can turn her away? all they that seek her will not weary themselves; in her month they shall find her." Those that desire to know more of the nature of this beast, may find divers things in Pliny and other naturalists. But now we are only to speak of it as the Scripture suggests.

Why does God compare Ephraim and the ten tribes to the wild ass?

For two reasons. 1. To show the extreme stubbornness and fierceness of this people. Wicked men that have forsaken God and are left to themselves, not only become like to savage creatures, but to savage creatures of the worst kind, they run up and down satisfying the lusts of their own hearts irresistibly, and bear down all before them; they stamp, and rage, and are mad when at any time they are opposed in their wicked ways: this is the scope of the Holy Ghost here; thus Ephraim was when he was opposed. Do you not find many such, many that are so resolved on ungodliness and sin, that they will hear nothing, they snuff at the wind and all that is said against them, and madly pursue their own ruin? Jeremiah saith, "in their month you shall find them;" that refers to the very last month which the wild ass goes when with young, then, when great with young, and not till then, can it be dealt with. Some historians say that the wild asses are so fierce, that they will tear asunder armour of proof; but "in their month" they are so big that they cannot wield themselves, and then "you shall find them." So, though sinners be never so stubborn, yet God has his month, and perhaps then "you shall find them." When at any time you find your children, or servants, or others, stubborn and stout against whatsoever is said to them, and even raging in their madness, for the satisfying of their wicked wills, you may remember this text and creature; they are as wild asses that are alone by themselves. And of all wicked men, idolaters are the most stubborn and stout in their impieties; their hearts are set upon their idols; yea, as the phrase of Scripture is, in Jer. l. 38, "they are mad upon their idols." Nothing can be said to those whose hearts are taken with false worship; nothing will prevail with them without an exertion of the infinite power of God; no sinners are more bold, more untamable and fierce in their ways; and therefore is it, that if they be opposed in their superstitious such tumults arise, stones flung against windows where God is truly worshipped, any thing in the world, they care not what. Because they think themselves condemned in their sinful ways, therefore they run like wild beasts in a furious manner, even against those that worship God better than themselves.

2. By way of contempt. As in Job xi. 12. "Vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt:" he would fain think himself somebody, yet he is a most base and vile creature. And if any of you be not so fierce in your wicked ways as some others are, if God has tamed your spirits by his word and Spirit, bless him for it; for all men are "born like a wild ass's colt," they are mad upon their wickedness even to their own ruin. But because stoutness and stubbornness evermore proceed from pride, and none think it such a dishonour as the stubborn for their wills to be crossed in any thing, therefore the Scripture casts the more contempt upon them, and calls such "wild ass's colts;" and indeed there are none more contemptible in the eyes of God than stout sinners.

"Alone by himself." This expression tends to show that Ephraim and the ten tribes would have their own wills "alone." There are these two things implied in it:

1. That they would be under no government, but alone by themselves, and have liberty to do what they list, acknowledging no commander; and so the Chaldee paraphrase, Because that they would walk in the evil of their own lusts, and acknowledge no commander. And thus many at this day love to be alone, that is, to live at their own hand, to be from under government.

2. That they were unfit for society, they were so furious and fierce in their ways. "Alone by himself." Some are of such untoward and perverse dispositions, that they can agree with no one, so that they are only fit to live in solitude. I suppose you have met, in your families, with those that are so extremely perverse in their ways, and of such untoward and crooked dispositions, that they are fit to live in no society: to them this reproof of Ephraim is applicable.

"Ephraim hath hired lovers." אהבים loves. Before, they put their confidence in the Assyrians, Egyptians, and others, and now they make them their loves. Our observations are these:

Obs. 1. Where we place our confidence, there our love should be placed. If God be the confidence of our hearts, let our love be placed there; yea, let God be our loves, in the plural number, for so it is here, they "hired lovers." She would fain have the Assyrians to love her. When God is forsaken, and we have lost our interest in God's love, no marvel though there be such a seeking after the creature's love. Men that forsake God, seek to make up what they have not in God, in the creature; as a dog, when he has lost his master, is ready to follow every one he meets with.

Obs. 2. The unlovely will use unworthy means to purchase love. "Ephraim hath hired lovers." Because they had nothing lovely in themselves, therefore they seek even to hire love; though the truth is, love cannot be hired nor purchased: although men may fawn, and flatter, and crouch, that they may gain the love of others, yet if they be unlovely in themselves, although those whom they fawn on and flatter may use them for their own turn, yet the truth is, they will despise them in their hearts, and often discover to their intimate friends how they scorn and contemn them. Therefore, if others would secure love, they themselves must have some excellency and loveliness, for love cannot be hired.

Obs. 3. Idolaters will not stand upon terms if they may have their idols. "Ephraim hath hired lovers." This shows the shamefulness of the ten tribes in seeking after their false worship. Other harlots are hired to commit uncleanness, but Ephraim, in its spiritual whoredoms, will be at charge for their idols. So in Ezek. xvi. 33, 34, "They give gifts to all whores: but thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers, and hirest them, that they may come unto thee on every side for thy whoredom. And the contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms, whereas none followeth thee to commit whoredoms: and in that thou givest a reward, and no reward is given unto thee, therefore thou art contrary." As if God should say, You are more vile and base in your uncleanness than any in the world besides; for others receive rewards, but you are so set upon your filthy lusts that you will give rewards that you may commit your abominations. They care not how they debase themselves, they will not stand upon honour and respect, but let them have their false worship, they will submit to any thing. Oh! why then should we stand hesitating thus in matters wherein the honour of our God and the public good lie at stake? Why should we not be willing to suffer shame and disgrace, any thing, rather than the public good should not go on, than the service of God should be hindered? If others will not seek to us, yet, if good may be done, if God may have glory, let us seek to them. Though others be never so vile in their carriage towards us, yet let us do what we can to win and convince them, let us be willing to lie under their feet that God may be glorified. If others will not join in a good work, except they may have the honour of it, let them have it, provided the work go on. Let the work go on, and if they will stand for the glory, let them have it; so God may be lifted up, let us be willing not to be seen. This is that which often hinders the success of God's cause. Men stand upon terms, and will not go on in a good cause, but break off if others be preferred before them. If two called to carry a long piece of timber through a narrow passage, should stand striving who should go foremost, one saying, I will go first, the other, Nay, but I will go first, they could never carry the timber; if one have one end, and the other the other end, and they cannot agree which should go first, and he that goes after thinks himself dishonoured because his fellow goes before him, they can never carry it through, but must lay it down. So it is many times with a good cause, it is like a piece of timber upon two men's shoulders, which must go through a narrow passage, and one saith, Why should not I have the glory of it? and the other saith, Why should not I have the glory of it? and whilst men stand wrangling who should have the greatest glory, in the mean time the public cause is exceedingly hindered. Let us be willing to submit, and debase ourselves any way, so be it the true worship of God prosper.

Obs. 4. It is an evil thing to be drawn to false worship, or bodily uncleanness, upon any terms. "Ephraim hath hired lovers." Hope of the greatest gain, or deliverance from the greatest affliction, should not prevail. But for a man or woman to seek after the ways of sin, to be at cost that they may have their lusts gratified, is more base and abominable. Certainly uncleanness should be cast off with indignation, though we be tempted to it with never so much gain; but for one to be set upon uncleanness, so as to seek after it, and to spend their husbands' estates that they may have free course for the indulgence of their lusts, is a most abominable thing indeed; and yet many are thus guilty, both in regard of bodily and spiritual adultery.

Ver. 10. Yea, though they have hired among the nations, now will I gather them, and they shall sorrow at the burden of the king of princes.

These words at first seem to be dark, and yet we have much of the mind of God in them, and much concerning ourselves.

"Yea, though they have hired among the nations." This God still takes ill, that they should go to the nations for help when God had made their condition so much above the nations; for in their going to them they did, as it were, say, that all the love, and mercy, and protection from the great God toward them, was no more than the nations had; they did, as it were, hold forth to the world that the nations were rather in a better condition than themselves, in that they would go to them for their help: and this went very near to the heart of God; for God had expended the very strength of his love and the riches of his mercy upon this people, and after he had done so much for them, that they, under the pressure of some slight afflictions, should go to the nations that did, for the present, prosper somewhat outwardly better than themselves, oh, this was exceeding grievous to the heart of God! And thence the observations are,

Obs. 1. It is a very great evil for the people of God to conclude, when wicked men prosper a little more than they, that therefore they are in a better condition than themselves. This is an evil that affects very much the heart of God; and yet this ordinarily prevails, in some degree or other, among the people of God. I appeal to your consciences in this very thing; though sometimes your souls have had sweet refreshing from the Lord in the enjoyment of communion with him, yet, when God's hand has been out against you, when you have seen others prospering, though you knew them to be wicked and ungodly, their ships coming home safe and richly laden, and their trading in a flourishing condition, do you not then sometimes find such thoughts rising within you, as if these men were in a better condition than yourselves? Oh! know that the least thoughts of such a kind exceedingly grieve the Spirit of God by which you are sealed, that because they have a few leaves more than you, though you have all the riches of God and Christ, though you have the inheritance of saints, yet that you should think them in a better condition than yourselves. How ordinary is it, upon this ground, for those that have professed themselves to be godly, rather to withdraw from the afflicted saints, and seek correspondence with the wicked in their prosperity! God would have his people see such an all-sufficiency in himself in their saddest condition, that they need not go out from him for help, but still wait upon him and keep his way. The Lord, by his prophet, rebukes Jehoshaphat, in 2 Chron. xiv. 2, for helping the ungodly, and loving them that hate the Lord. And is it not as great an evil to seek the love of the wicked and ungodly, and ask help from them that hate the Lord? Certainly the evil is very great, it argues the very little love that we have to God, it charges God with unfaithfulness, as if, though he has engaged himself to his people, he would leave them in their need; this encourages the wicked in their wickedness, and it charges God with that which is accounted one of the vilest things among men, the abandonment in the time of trouble of those employed in our work. We look upon such men as employ others in any service, and then leave them to shift for themselves in their straits, we look upon them as vile men, unworthy to be dealt withal. Now will we charge God with this which degrades even men? And besides, it is a most desperate folly so to do; for when thou art thinking to provide for thyself by correspondence with ungodly men, it may be thou wert at that time just at the very point of deliverance. It is God's usual way to come to help his people when they are in the greatest straits; and therefore it is the greatest folly when we are in straits to think of shifting courses, so that then we must forsake our own mercy in thinking of shifting courses. In straits, above all times, Christians should take heed of thinking of shifting courses, because then, above all times, those are the times for God to show his mercy, and just then. Wilt thou then be forsaking him? Oh! it is that which should lie near to your hearts. If any of you have been guilty of this, let but the word of God bring this upon your spirits this day; Oh! how do I know but at that very time when I took such a shifting course, that was the very time that God was about to do my soul good, and of doing good for my body? and yet then I deprived myself of good, that goodness and mercy of God! It follows yet, “Now will I gather them.” This gathering is referred by interpreters, either to the nations whom they sought unto, or to themselves. “I will gather them;” that is, that nation; or, I will gather you. If to the nation, then the meaning is,

Notwithstanding you hire the nations, yet I will gather them against you; they shall be strengthened against you with the same money that you hire them withal, I will turn it against you: and now you have provided fair for yourselves, have you not?

Obs. 2. Many times when we think to provide best for our peace, we make the greatest provision for our ruin. God often makes people work their own woe and ruin themselves, and nothing tends more fully and directly to undo them than what they do themselves; thus God overrules the counsels and thoughts of men.

What a vain thing is it to plot against God, when God can turn men’s arrows against themselves! None often are greater instruments of God’s wrath against us than we are ourselves; yea, and those with whom we seek most to correspond; and it is just with God it should be so, that if we will leave him, to seek correspondence with wicked men, it is just with God, that of all men in the world, those should be the men that will be made the executioners of God’s wrath upon us.

But now, if to Israel; I will gather them among the nations. The word here for gathered, is sometimes used in an army for gathering dead bodies slain in battle. You think to have the nations to aid, but you shall be as a company of dead bodies in an army, and so lie in heaps. But I find that Calvin takes it as having reference to the former verse. This people are wild, and run up and down, this way and that way, to shift for themselves; but I will gather them, that is, I will keep them in: so the words likewise may signify, I will keep them in, I will gather in their spirits, there shall be some dispensation of providence to restrain them, I will keep them from those ways wherein they would presently have ruined themselves.

Obs. 3. People many times run headily on in evil ways that will certainly ruin them; but when God’s time for the execution of his wrath is not yet come, the Lord restrains them and keeps them in from such ways; though their hearts be set upon them to their own undoing, yet they shall not go on in them; I will pity them who cannot pity themselves. But then follows the greatest difficulty in this verse,

“And they shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes.” This has more darkness in it, and yet, upon the searching into it, we shall see it clear, and pregnant with many excellent truths. There are these five things to be inquired into for the opening of these words:

- I. Who is here meant by “the king of princes.”
- II. What was this the burden of “the king of princes.”
- III. When was this fulfilled, that they should “sorrow for the burden of the king of princes.”
- IV. Why called, “the burden of the king of princes.”
- V. What is meant by sorrowing “a little.”

These five considerations will clear the text. Indeed we cannot see the full meaning of the Holy Ghost, without in some measure understanding them.

I. Who is meant by “the king of princes?” We are here to understand the king of Assyria, because he was a great king, whose nobles were princes; and we find this both in sacred and profane history. 2 Kings xviii. 24, “How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of the least of my master’s servants?” And in Isa. xxxvi. 13, “Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of Assyria.” And so Josephus, Book I. chap. 10, saith, That before Sodom’s destruction, the Assyrians were lords of all Asia; so that the Assyrian was a great king, and here called “the king of princes.”

Thus God suffers his enemies to grow great in the world; an Assyrian, a dog, a wicked wretch, under the curse of God, and yet a great king, even “the king of princes.” Luther has such an expression concerning the empire of Turkey; It is, saith he, but a crumb that the great Master of the family doth cast to dogs. What are your estates then? Certainly, though never so great in the world, what are any of your estates to the whole Turkish empire? And if that be but a crumb that the great Master of the family casts to a dog, you should never then bless yourselves in the enjoyment of a little of the world. But though the Assyrian may be called “the king of princes,” in regard of his power over some great men, yet our Lord Jesus Christ is peculiarly the “King of kings, and Lord of Lords.” In Rev. xix. 16, “He hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords.”

Why was it written “upon his vesture,” and why “upon his thigh?” “Upon his vesture;” that is, he will appear openly to be the King of kings: there was a time when Christ seemed to be, as it were, a servant under the dominion of antichrist, but now his name shall be “upon his vesture,” openly. And then, “upon his thigh;” that is, upon his lower parts, his church militant, it shall have the kingly power among them for its good, so that they shall be above the nations, according to the prophecy in Isa. lx. 13, “I will make the place of my feet glorious;” that is, the church in their low condition. He saith not, he will have the name upon his crown, but “upon his thigh,” that is, upon his lower parts, upon his people that were in a low condition; he will make the very place of his feet to be glorious, even there shall be written, “King of kings, and Lord of lords.”

II. What was this his burden? “The burden of the king of princes.” This burden was the taxes imposed upon the people, whereby they maintained their correspondence with this king of Assyria. Correspondence with wicked men is burdensome, for the more they are sought and yielded to, ordinarily, the more exacting, generally, they are; and whatsoever they for a while do for you, is indeed to serve their own ends: this Israel brought upon themselves; for they would go to Assyria, and they found the Assyrians burdensome to them.

When men will follow their own ways, and think to have more ease in them than in God’s, it is just they should find those ways burdensome. I am persuaded there is not one in this congregation but has experienced this; when you think your ways will bring more ease to you than God’s ways, have you not found your ways burdensome?

III. When was this fulfilled? “They shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes.” For the mourning of the prophet we must refer to the history of the kings, and in 2 Kings xv. 19, 20, you find the time when this prophecy was fulfilled. “Pul the king of Assyria came against the land: and Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand. And Menahem exacted the money of Israel, even of all the mighty men of wealth, of each man fifty shekels of silver, to give to the king of Assyria.” This was one burden. And then, in ver. 29, “In the days of Pekah king of Israel came Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, and took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria.” This was a further burden. At these two times was this scripture fulfilled.

IV. Why called “the burden of the king of princes?” In speaking of the burden that was upon the people, why does he apply to the Assyrian such an epithet? It seems to be a diminution of their burden rather than any aggravation; for he speaks of sorrowing but a little, as if it should not be so great a burden as would afterwards be upon them; noting thus, that they were burdened awhile with taxations from a great king, but they should afterwards come under the power, and be subject to the wills and lusts, of all kind of base people, of the very dregs of the nations: and it is not so great an evil to be under the power of men of rank and quality, no, not under their oppression, as to be under the oppression of people that are of mean origin and condition, the very refuse of a nation; to come to be under their power is a great deal worse.

And by the way, this should teach those that are of mean breeding, and of mean condition, if they be put into any place of power and authority, to take heed how they behave themselves, for their oppression will be the most grievous to an ingenuous spirit. And there is a great deal of danger of their growing more oppressive than such as were born to greatness, and their oppression becoming so intolerable as to bring the greatest confusion, if not well looked to. Therefore, here, when he would lessen the burden, he saith, You "shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes."

V. What is meant by sorrowing a little? "They shall sorrow a little." They complained; but, saith God, Why complain of this? this is but a small burden to that which you are like to have; there is a burden of another kind coming on you: and hence the notes are,

Obs. 4. When sinners have brought trouble upon themselves, they complain much; but when they complain, they are to consider, that what they feel is but little to what is coming after. There are burdens upon you, and you are complaining of them, as if they were the greatest that ever were upon people. O sinner! when you are complaining of your burdens, know, that these burdens that are upon you may prove to be but very trifles in comparison of what is likely to come upon you afterwards; for that is the scope of the Holy Ghost here, "They shall sorrow a little for the burden;" as if he should say, There is another manner of sorrow in store: and so it occurred, for afterwards the Assyrians carried them all away captives, and the basest of all the people came to set their feet upon them; therefore saith the Holy Ghost, "They shall sorrow a little for the burden." As the mercies of God to his saints, which now they have, are but a little, they may be said to rejoice but a little for present mercies; so the burdens upon the ungodly are but a little, but if they return not to God upon what they now feel, God has greater burdens than those under which they are so impatient.

Obs. 5. Taxes upon men's estates are but a little burden in comparison of being brought under the power of the enemy. Though there be sore taxes upon you, as here there were fifty shekels of silver laid upon every man that was able, yet those taxes are but small burdens in comparison of being given up to the power of the enemy; they would lay burdens indeed upon us, burdens upon our consciences, our estates, our lives, our liberties, whatsoever we are or have must be under their mercy: now we are troubled, but then their little finger will be more heavy than the loins that now are upon us; although we dare not say but some may find present burdens very burdensome.

Obs. 6. Taxes are but little burden in comparison of the carrying of our brethren into captivity. Though we enjoy our estates ourselves, yet if God lay his hand upon any of our brethren, though in remote parts of the kingdom, we should account this to be a burden. Not only their taxations were a burden, but the carrying away of their brethren that were beyond the river.

If there were no other sin among us, it were just with God to bring the enemy upon us, and then we should find that there were other manner of burdens.

But there is another burden that we are not sensible enough of, and that is, the captivity of our brethren in the remote parts of this land. Oh how little sensible are we of it, because we feel it not ourselves!

Obs. 7. It is God's mercy to bring lesser evils upon us, thereby to prevent greater. You shall sorrow a little, I will not undo you presently; but return to me, or else you are utterly undone. But this is my mercy, I will bring afflictions upon you by piecemeal, and if you do not return to me, then you shall be utterly lost: for so this people were, they were carried away captive, and have never returned, even to this day. O, does God come to you in your family, or person, or estate? O let us consider of this.

Obs. 8. The consideration of little burdens upon us, should move us to turn to God. It should break our hearts, and cause us to seek the face of God, that we may prevent greater evils, that otherwise will certainly come. The Lord, in his dealing towards us, seems as if he were loth to lose us, and that this nation should perish: oh that this might work kindly upon our hearts, to prevent greater evils, that we might not be made a spectacle of the wrath of God to all surrounding nations.

But further, the words translated, "they shall sorrow a little," are by some rendered, they have begun a little for the burden of the king of princes: and so, in Deut. ii. 25, a word that comes from the same root is translated. Then the sense would run thus: That which they have felt is but the beginning of what is like to come; my wrath is let out upon them in some degree already, and do you not see how it is begun to burn upon them? and by that which was lately before your eyes you may believe my threatenings. Hence,

Obs. 9. God's judgments against wicked men are the beginnings of further judgments. In Deut. xxxii. 42, "I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh; and that with the blood of the slain and of the captives, from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy." All this is but "from the beginning of revenges;" when I come so terribly upon them it is but "the beginning of revenges." We are ready to think, if there be miserable slaughters, surely God has been revenged enough upon this people. No, all this may prove but "the beginning of revenges." I may say so concerning ourselves, though the Lord many times has made the sword drunk with blood, yet it may prove to be but "the beginning of revenges." Truly we cannot say that, from the time that these judgments have been upon us, we have begun to turn to God; yea, the estate of the kingdom is far worse than it was at the beginning of this present heavy stroke. In Matt. xxiv. 6-8, "Ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars: see that ye be not troubled: for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places. All these are the beginning of sorrows."

Obs. 10. God expects from men, that though they be not sensible of his threats, yet, when he begins to execute his wrath upon them, they should begin to turn a little to him. O, it were well with us if we did prevent God's heavy wrath by our repentance. Numb. xvi. 46, "Moses said unto Aaron, Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them: for there is wrath gone out from the Lord; the plague is begun." Oh how should we all make haste! We cannot only say the plague is begun, the plague of civil war, which is the greatest of all plagues, but it has gone on to a great length.

Ver. 11. Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin, altars shall be unto him to sin.

It was the charge of God in Scripture, that there should be but one altar for sacrifice; and there was another which was made afterwards for incense, and no more. In Deut. xii. 3, we have the charge of God that there should be none other made; "Ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place." And then, ver. 13, 14, "Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings in every place that thou seest, but in the place which the Lord shall choose in one of thy tribes." And in chap. xxvii. 5, "Thou shalt build an altar unto the Lord thy God, an altar of stones: thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them." And according to this Joshua acted, Josh. viii. 30; and hence the circumstances narrated in chap. xxii. 11—31. Now, for the altar of God, I shall first show you a little the meaning of its form and structure, and then the reason why God would have but this one altar. In Exod. xx. 24, there is an injunction of God for the altar of sacrifice; "An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings," &c. Here observe that, That when God would have an altar made for sacrifice it must be but an altar of earth; but if it should be of stone, thou shalt not lift up any tool upon it. Why, one would think that to carve and paint the stones, and to do any thing to embellish them, would be better than to have the stones rough. No, saith God, whatsoever you may think of adorning my altar by earving and painting it, "if thou lift up thy tool upon it thou hast polluted it:" all man's devices in the worship of God, though never so pompous, do but pollute. And, quite contrary to our high altars, they must not go up upon steps, that their nakedness be not discovered thereon; noting, that when we come into the presence of God we should take heed of spiritual nakedness, and the pride and vanity of our spirits in prayer. God would have them make an altar so as not to go up upon steps, lest their nakedness should be discovered. But now, in Exod. xxvii. 1, 2, you find an altar of shittim wood overlaid with brass: you will say, Why was the first of earth, and the other overlaid with brass? The reason was, because that the one was to be made when they were in an unsettled condition, and the other afterwards when they were in a more stated condition than formerly, and that it might endure a long time. But mark, it must be according to God's direction, except God reveal that it should be of shittim wood and overlaid with brass, they were not so to make it.

And then, the second altar was the altar of burnt incense, and that you have in Exod. xxx. 1—3, and that was to be overlaid with pure gold. That of brass it was, because there were sin-offerings to be offered upon it; but now the altar of incense was the altar just before the veil against the mercy-seat, where there was only incense offered, which was to signify the intercession of Jesus Christ, presenting his merits, and the prayers of all his people, to the Father. The prayers of the saints are compared to incense; and there are many things observable about the altar; it is said that there should be four horns, and in Rev. ix. 13, "I heard a voice from the four horns of the golden altar which is before God." Now St. John speaks of times that should be; he heard a voice from the four horns of the altar; that is, from all the prayers of the saints in the four corners of the earth, a voice came forth and did great things in the world. Certainly, my brethren, the prayers of God's saints in all the corners of the world is that which makes the world ring. A learned man has said, If there be but one sigh from a gracious heart, it fills the ears of God so that he hears nothing else. Nay, what is in Rev. viii. 3, about this altar of incense, is observable: "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer, and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." Thus we see, that in our time we are to make use of this golden altar that is before the throne, all our prayers are to be offered up upon that, which was a type of Jesus Christ; and our prayers, except they be mingled with the incense which Christ offered himself upon the golden altar, cannot be accepted. And likewise what we read in Exod. xxx. 3, deserves to be noted, "and thou shalt make unto it a crown of gold round about;" to typify the intercession of Christ, and the prayers of the saints. You may see by this that Christ's intercession, and the prayers of the saints, coming from faithful hearts, are accounted the very glory of Jesus Christ; he regards it as his dignity and glory to make intercession for his people, and to take the poor prayers of his people and present them to his Father: he considers that his crown is set upon his head, when you exercise your faith on him, that he may present your prayers with his intercession to the Father; but when you think to be heard yourselves, and do not exercise your faith upon Christ, you do, as it were, take off the crown from off his head. The points of difference between the altar here enjoined to be made by Moses, and afterwards really so made, and the altar appointed in the times of the gospel, are very remarkable.

1. Christ is our altar in the gospel. So Heb. xiii. 10, "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle;" that is, such as shall still pertinaciously adhere to the ceremonies of the law have no right to partake of Jesus Christ.

2. The gospel-altar was larger, more comprehensive. There is a prophecy of the altar that the church shall have, in Ezek. xli. 22: the altar under the law, the text saith, was to be a cubit long, and a cubit broad; but that which was to be in the time of the gospel, must be three cubits high, and two cubits long; and this imports, that there shall be a larger extent of the service of God under the gospel than under the law. Mal. i. 11 much confirms this: "For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering: for my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the Lord of hosts."

3. It was set before the veil by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy-seat. It was to stand in the holy of holies, but just before the veil, right against the mercy-seat. And by this you are helped to understand Heb. ix. 4, which, as some take it, seems to differ from this. It is said there, that the holiest of Calvin. all had the golden censer; by which they understand the golden altar, in which the censer was. But we shall find that the golden altar did not stand in the holy of holies, for we read, in Exod. xxx. 6, "And thou shalt put it before the veil that is by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy-seat that is over the testimony." Interpreters reconcile it thus: it is not said here that the golden censer, or altar, if we so take it, was in it, but it had it. That is, it was for the use of the holy of holies, and it stood just before it, and just against the mercy-seat; so that the high priest, when about to go into the holy of holies, was to take a censer and incense from this altar, and so enter the holiest of all.

But note, in that the altar of incense stands just against the mercy-seat, and yet there is a veil between the mercy-seat and it; so, when we offer up our incense upon the merits of Christ and his intercession, though we cannot, by the eye of our bodies, see the mercy-seat, yet we must act our faith upon it. And further, it is observable, that the incense must be burnt upon this altar at the very time when the lamps were to be trimmed and lighted; so Exod. xxx. 7: and that was to note this to us, that we are to join the word with our prayers, and not to come ignorantly to God, but labour to enlighten our souls with the lamp of his word, when we come to offer up to him our incense.

4. There is a command, that no strange incense shall be offered upon it. This is to teach us, that we must take heed of bringing any thing to God, to offer him in prayer, but what comes from the Spirit of God; only God's own incense. Take heed (I say) of bringing unsanctified parts, or any thing but that which is from the Spirit of God.

5. Once a year an atonement was made upon the horns of the altar with the blood of the sin-offering; though the sin-offering was not offered upon it, yet once a year an atonement was made upon it with its blood. This is to note, that even by our incense we, for our part, defile the altar. And thus I have a little digressed, yet still to open up Scripture to you, to show to you the meaning of God's altars.

But why did God account it so heinous a crime to make any other altars besides these?

The reasons are these:

First, Because these altars typified these two things:

1. The altar of burnt-offerings typified this, That Christ was to be the only sacrifice. There should be no other sacrifice to pacify God's wrath but only Jesus Christ, who was both the sacrifice and the altar also, for his human nature was offered to God upon the merits, as it were, upon the worthiness of his Divine nature: Heb. ix. 14, "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" This altar did signify the offering of Jesus Christ. As if God should say, Know, that what endeavours you do or can use to satisfy my justice and my wrath, it is to no purpose, there is nothing but only my Son, and that offering, that shall satisfy my wrath. And now for them to make more altars, it was to deny that great point of religion, that there was only the sacrifice of Christ to satisfy God.

2. The incense altar typified this, That in Christ only all our services, which are our spiritual sacrifices, are accepted of God. There must be no altar but this for the sacrifice, and the other for incense; God would have this doctrine kept pure from that time and for ever, that none of our spiritual sacrifices can be accepted any other way but only as they have reference to Jesus Christ, that altar which the Lord has appointed.

Secondly, That they might be the bond of the church. Because the people of the Jews were a national church, therefore there was to be a national worship, all the nation was to join, not only apparently, but really, in the very same individual worship; and this was the bond of their national church. Now, for my part, I know none living that hold a national church in these days in this sense, that is, as of Divine institution, and joined in one, by God's commanding any common national worship. Where there are in nations a great many of the saints of God, that they may be called a national church we dispute not; but when people talk of a national church in the strict sense of the word, they understand not its meaning. It is not enough to have the same kind of worship, as now, we all pray and read the word in all congregations, we have all the same sacraments; but to constitute us a national church we must have a common altar, and unite together in a common worship. If the nation of the Jews had worshipped the same God, after the same manner, in divers temples and upon divers altars, this had not been a national bond to them; but by coming up to the same temple, and offering upon the same altars, and when the sacrifice and incense were offered they were offered for them all conjointly, this was the thing that united them into a church union, different from any possible church union amongst us, till we have similar institutions. Our worship implies nothing but a personal union, but for thousands of congregations to be bound by institution to join in the very same bond of worship, in the very same individual act, such a union we have not in these days. Unless we understand this aright, we understand not the reason why they had but one altar for burnt-offerings and one altar for incense.

But now it may be said, That it does not seem to be such a sin to erect altars, (for that is the sin charged here upon Ephraim, that they "made many altars,") for the Scripture speaks of many altars that were God's altars; thus Elijah complains, 1 Kings xix., that they had cast down God's altars, They "have thrown down thine altars;" now this was spoken after the time of the law, when there were but only two altars appointed by God, the altar for burnt-offerings and the incense altar, and the prophet did not mean them.

Divines answer this thus, That this is spoken of those altars that the patriarchs and others had built to sacrifice upon to God, before the time that the law was given by Moses for that one only altar of sacrifice. For it was lawful, before the command, to build divers altars, but afterwards it was not.

Yea, but still the objection will be, How could it be a sin to cast down those altars, when they were of no further religious use? for after the command of God for that one altar, then the others were to be demolished. Was it not commended in the godly kings, that they cast down high places, and cut down groves? though some of them formerly were for the true worship of God, yet, after God had appointed a peculiar place for his worship, and those other places were abused to superstition, then they were to be cast down: and so there is no question but all other altars built for religious uses were to be cast down, after God's own altars were made. To this I would answer thus,

That the evil that Elijah complains of, was the profaneness of the people, their casting off all fear and reverence of God; because they did not cast down those altars out of love to God and his worship, and through a holy determination that they would not suffer any thing that might lead to superstition, that was not the principle whereby they were actuated in casting them down, but they were led thereto by malice and rage against religion, and to satisfy their lusts. And thus, if men oppose that which is indeed superstitious, yet not out of a true love to God and his honour, nor a sincere desire to set up and to maintain his true worship, but in bitterness and rage, merely to gratify their own selfish purposes; though, I say, the thing be evil that these men oppose, yet God will not own their actions as any service to him, it is a sin in them to cast down that which should be cast down, if they do not cast it down out of a right and gracious principle: then what evil is it for men in bitterness of spirit to oppose that which is in itself good, if God account it a sin to oppose that which should be opposed, if it be through bitterness of spirit, and not through gracious principles!

Obs. 1. Man's inventions in God's worship are rejected of God. "Ephraim hath made many altars." Whatsoever is made by man in religious worship, is rejected of God; the very spirit and life of the second commandment consist in this. "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image;" that instances but one thing, but by that we are to understand every thing pertaining to Divine worship; the very life and the very spirit of the second commandment, I say, lies in this, the making to ourselves. If God will appoint ceremonies significant of heavenly things, to raise our hearts on high, we are to use them with reverence and respect; but we must not presume in this to imitate God: that is the ground of all superstitious ceremonies, because they find God makes some, they think that they may presume to make others; now it is a sin against the second commandment for us to presume to make any thing in matters of Divine worship.

Obs. 2. There is no stop in superstitious worship. "Ephraim hath made many." If men leave the things they know not where to stay; hence the multiplying of things thus among the papists, five hundred altars in some one temple. And Austin, in his 19th Epistle, complains of the multitude of ceremonies that were in the church in his time. What complaints would he have now! All things in the church were full of presumptions, they did multiply one thing after another; and indeed, let the right way once be left, and there are no limits. O, let us take heed how we multiply in God's worship. There is much controversy between the papists and us about multiplying in the worship of God.

We would have but one Mediator, they would have many; we would have but one rule of faith, but they will give power to pope and church to make articles of faith; we would have but one object of worship, they would have many; we would have but one sacrifice, they would have many oblations for the quick and dead; we would have but one satisfaction, they would have many; we would have but one merit, they would have many; and thus, by multiplying, the unity of the church is divided; but we must keep to the unity that we find in the Scripture.

Obs. 3. We are ready to imitate our forefathers in evil, but not in good. "Ephraim hath made many altars." Their forefathers were mightily incensed against the supposed addition of but one altar to God's altars, but they will not imitate their forefathers in this good thing, in standing up for that one true worship of God, Josh. xxii. 11. If you ask the reason why their progenitors were so zealous for God's own altar, and yet now their children after them make many altars, the reason may be this, which will afford a note of very great use to us; When their progenitors came first into the land of Canaan, and Joshua, according to the commandment of God by Moses, set up an altar, they, seeing the goodness of God towards them, were much affected with it; but after they had enjoyed the land a while, after they began to be settled, to be warm in their nests, and to prosper in the land, then they ventured upon this way of corrupting of God's worship by multiplying altars; and when they had once ventured and escaped unpunished, then they thought they were sure, might go on with impunity: and so by degrees they come to this excess in superstitious worship. The note is,

Obs. 4. We must take heed lest any distance of time make us not to fear the threatening denounced on the breach of the commandment. They were afraid of the breach of the commandment soon after it was given; but when some time had elapsed, and they were settled in prosperity, then they ventured to transgress; hence I say, our note is, That we must take heed that the distance of time, or our settling in a prosperous condition, do not make us to fear the commandment less than we did at first. And for this you have a most excellent scripture in Deut. iv. 25, "When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the Lord thy God, to provoke him to anger." "When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land," then thou shalt make graven images. There was not so much fear that when they came first into the land they should make graven images; they were then but just delivered out of their bondage, God had made known his glorious word unto them, their hearts were warm with love and gratitude; but after they had lived long in the land, they began to forget God and make graven images. Just so it is with us; when we are newly come out of afflictions, then our hearts are a little warm, and we would serve God according to his own way; but after we have continued long in the land, and been a while in a prosperous condition, and find all things around us pretty well, oh! then we begin to be cool, and forget the Lord and his ways. It has been always so, and it is so now, not only in particular persons and nations, but churches too. Ordinarily when people are delivered from superstitious vanities, and come to worship God in his own way, at first they enjoy the ordinances of God in their purity, oh how glad are they! and they bless God, and their hearts are warmed and enlarged, and their hearts do close one with another, and there is a sweet union between them: but after they have lived a while in the land, after they have lived a while in the ways of God, and enjoyed him a little, they begin to grow more cool and dead, and fall to wrangling and contending, and so all that spirituality and heavenly ardour that they had before vanish and come to nothing. I beseech you remember Deut. iv. 25; take heed, after you have abode a while in such a condition, that you forget not God.

Obs. 5. Every age adds something to idolatry and false worship. "Ephraim hath made many altars:" hath multiplied altars, so Jerome; and the Seventy, hath gone on in way of multiplication. They had some altars at first, which their forefathers made, and they afterwards made more, and so every succeeding generation added to them. O my brethren, let the true worship of God, then, not only continue, but multiply. Idolaters will not argue thus, Why should we be wiser than our forefathers? no, they will go beyond their forefathers in false worship; and yet, how many among us will thus plead against reformation, Why should not we content ourselves with what our forefathers did? our forefathers knew not of such new ways of worship as you tell us of. But now, my brethren, if our forefathers reformed a little, let us bless God for what they did; but let us add more, to raise up the worship of God yet higher and higher, as in Psal. lxxi. 14, "But I will hope continually, and will yet praise thee more and more;" the words may be read thus, I will add unto thy praise, O Lord. Thou hast had praise, indeed formerly thou hadst praise from others; but I will do something to add to thy praise, I will praise thee more and more. So every generation should strive to praise God more and more, to add to God's praise, to find out more of God's truths, to add to the purity of God's worship, and to cast out superstition more than their forefathers have done: our forefathers are to be much commended for having done what they did, and (I say) we are to bless God for them, that the Lord put such a spirit into them; but know, that that which was accepted from our forefathers will not be accepted from us, God expects that we should add to his praises. Men desire to add more and more to the estates of their progenitors, and so your children will add a little to the estates that you leave them; and so men account it their ambition to raise their families. My brethren, we should have a holy ambition to exalt ourselves more and more in every age, by the practice of religion : as Jehu said in 2 Kings x. 18, "Ahab served Baal a little, but Jehu shall serve him much." As he said, though feignedly, of false worship, we should say, with sincerity, of the true worship of God, Our fathers have served the Lord a little, but we will serve him more; we have more mercies than they had, more light than they had; if they served God a little, we will serve him much.

Obs. 6. God still remembers the first and chief actors in sin. "Ephraim hath made many altars to sin." He speaks to the ten tribes, and yet only names Ephraim, because the governors were of that tribe. The chief in a family, by whom the whole family is corrupted, and the chief in a town or country, God has an eye upon, and though others escape they shall not. Ephraim hath multiplied altars to sin; they intended not to sin, it was not their intention when they made altars that they might sin, they thought they pleased God, but God accounts it sin, and a provocation to him. Hence observe further,

Obs. 7. Whatsoever names we give to things, it may be, God will give them other names and titles. We may say that it is devotion, God will say it is superstition; we may say it is good intention, but God may say it is presumption; we may say it is prudence and wisdom, but God may give it another name, and say it is temporizing, time-serving; God is wont to give other names to things than we do. In the Scripture they call their images their "delectable things," Isa. xlv. 9; God calls them "detestable things," Ezek. xxxvii. 23. No question, if you would ask them why they built altars, they would say, to the honour of God; but saith God, "Ephraim hath made many altars to sin."

Obs. 8. When men's hearts are set upon false ways of worship, it is just with God to let them have their desires to the full. "Altars shall be unto him to sin." That is, thus; seeing they will have them, they shall have them; they shall have enough of them, let them go on in their way, let them multiply their sin. They keep a great deal of stir for it, and have it they must, they refuse to see the light, they are prejudiced against the way of God's worship; let them have their desires, let them have, saith God, governors to establish by their authority, and teachers to defend by subtle arguments, what they wish for: they multiply altars to sin, and they shall be to sin, even to harden them; their hearts are set upon them, and they will have them, and love them, and they shall be hardened in them. This is the heavy judgment of God, to give men their hearts' desires in what is evil. And as it shall be to them for sin, so it shall be to them for misery, the fruit of sin; for so sin is taken very frequently in Scripture for the fruit of sin; they will have them to sin, and they shall find in them the fruit of sin, misery.

Ver. 12. I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were counted as a strange thing.

There appears a greatness in the very sound of this verse, and there is as much in it as the sound doth import; and therefore, though we pass over other things more briefly, yet because there is very much of God's mind in this, we should wrong the Scripture if we should pass over this too slightly.

"I have written to him the great things of my law." This is made an aggravation of their sin, They multiply altars to sin, and yet, saith God, "I have written to him the great things of my law; they find no such things in my written law: and what that written word of God, against those many altars, was, you had the last day; but in that these are made sins because they were against the written word of God, thence,

Obs. 1. Whatsoever is urged or practised in matters of worship, must have warrant out of the written word of God. It was sin. Why? Because I have written to them (saith God) the great things of my law, and they counted it a strange thing; though that which they did had a great deal of seeming devotion in it, yet it was otherwise than they found written in my law.

This question should be put to any that tender to us any form of worship, or doctrine of religion, under any specious show whatsoever, Where is it written? "To the law and to the testimony," saith Isaiah, chap. viii. 20: "if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them:" they may seem very judicious and wise, but if they speak not according to this word, they have no light in them; not only to the law and testimonies, but to the written law and testimonies; this must be the standard at which all doctrines and modes of worship must be tried. Many may put fair colours on their proceedings, that they tend to the common peace, and a great deal of good may result from them, and the like; but is it written? Did I ever command it? saith God. Polley may say it is fit, reason may say it is comely, and experience may say it is useful, but doth the written law say it should be? Nay, it is not enough to say, that we cannot say it is forbidden, but where is it written? In matters of worship this is a certain rule. Tertullian, about the crowning of the soldier with bays, saith, If it be affirmed, It is lawful, because the Scriptures do not forbid it; it may equally be retorted, It is therefore not lawful, because the Scriptures do not command it. No matter what the thing be, saith Luther, in matters of religion, we must look who it is that bids it, who it is that commands it; never, I beseech you, in any point of religion argue thus, Why, what hurt is there in it, is it not very comely? I cannot think but it may do a great deal of good. These arguments are weak arguments in matters of worship; to them all we must answer, Is it written? As Christ replied to the devil and his temptations, "It is written;" so, if you can, bring a written word against what they would have you to do, or let them show where what they enjoin is written. In Exod. xxxix. we find it said, at least ten times, they did according to what the Lord had commanded Moses; and in the conclusion of the chapter, Moses blessed the people: the people are blessed when in the matters of worship they keep to what is commanded.

And again, As we must not make our own conceptions the rule for worship, so neither the opinions of learned men, nor custom, nor antiquity, must be the rule, but what is written: "I have written to them the great things of my law;" they must keep to that. Whatsoever use we may make now of the opinions of ancients and the like, yet, if the ancients themselves were alive, they would abhor the use that many make of their quotations. Cyprian, in one of his epistles, speaking of his predecessors, saith, We must not look what this man or that man before us did or taught, but what he that was before all, namely, Christ, who alone is "the way, the truth, and the life." And so Augustine has a passage to the same effect, in which, speaking of the ancients, he saith, Even granting them all due respect, yet for us to think that we may not reject from their writings some things, because they were learned men, is inadmissible: for such, he adds, I will be in respect of the writings of other men, and such would I have those that understand my writings be to me, I will not so esteem the writings of any before me as to think that nothing should be cast out nor mended, neither would I have any think so of my writings. And so Ambrose, Where the Scripture is silent we must not speak. Thus we see, that though men at present, for the maintaining of that which is evil, will make use of quotations and antiquities, yet that those very ancients whom they cite as authorities abhorred this; and Christ and his apostles quoted none of the learned men before them, but only Moses and the prophets.

But you will say, Though we must not take other men's writings as the rule, yet they may help us to understand the Scripture aright.

Luther, I remember, saith, that the Scriptures should rather help us to understand men's writings, than men's writings to understand the Scripture; that many will make men's writings a judge and rule for understanding the Scriptures, not the judge of truth, but the rule for understanding aright the Scriptures, whereas (saith he) the Scripture should rather be the rule for understanding them.

And so Hilary saith, He is the best interpreter of Scripture, that takes the sense rather out of the Scriptures themselves, by comparing one passage with another, than brings to it any new meaning: therefore the understanding of Scripture is more by Scripture than by the writings of any man living. And yet still we may, doubtless, make use of the gifts of God in others, but so as to keep us close to the written word for the rule; yea, and for the meaning of the rule, they may help us to see whether the Scripture will justify this truth, or this sense: for there lies the mistake; most people think, that whatsoever any man writes, if it be contrary to the word, we may not receive it, but we must understand the word in the sense in which they take it: now we must not go so far; for the Scripture is written, not only that we might know what the rule is, but that we might understand the meaning of the rule, by comparing Scripture with Scripture; now so far as the writings of men will help us to discover the meaning of Scripture by Scripture, so far we may make use of them; but we cannot say, this is the meaning, because it is the opinion of such and such learned men; they should compare one Scripture with another, show you the history of the time, and give you the reasons for their interpretation: and this is the use of writers for understanding the Scriptures. Then you will say, Why do we make use of writers so much? Why, because they show how one scripture has reference to another, and relate the history connected with the passage.

The sense of things is to be resolved in the Scripture itself, and therefore we must keep ourselves very close to what is written.

"Written." It was not so at first, but delivered from hand to hand; but afterwards, when the church began to multiply, then the word was written. And this is a mighty blessing of God, that we may have the mind of God written, so as to look into it, and search to know it, by reading it over and over again, and taking it into our hands. When we are lying upon our beds, if we light a candle in the night, we may be reading and looking into the mind of God. If we should only hear that there were such a book in the world, in China, in the uttermost parts of the habitable globe, a book that God had written, or that God had employed men to write by an inspiration of his own Spirit, and wherein he had revealed the great counsels of his will concerning man's eternal estate; if we should hear that such a book had come down even from heaven, and that in the uttermost parts of the earth, oh what a longing desire should we have to see it! Who but would give their whole estate to have a week's or a fortnight's time to see and read in such a book? if one could, he would be willing to travel to the end of the world to enjoy such a privilege. No man need say, Shall I go to the uttermost parts of the earth? for it is in your hands, it is in your houses; the book wherein the great God has written his mind, has written all things unto you which concerns your eternal salvation, is that same which you have in your hands. However we prize it now, heretofore it has been prized at a high rate; how many of the martyrs would venture their lives to keep but a few leaves of Scripture in their houses! And how vile is it then for us to neglect the reading of this written word! One Theodorus, a physician at Constantinople, sent to Gregory the Great a great sum of money for the redeeming of captives: in his reply Gregory much commends his liberality, yet takes occasion to blame him for not reading the Scriptures; and uses this expression, The Emperor of heaven, the Lord of the angels and men, has sent to you that which concerns your life, and will you neglect to read it with a fervent, with a zealous spirit? He would not but blame him even when he sent such gifts to him, it grieved him so to think that one so bountiful to the distressed should neglect the reading of the Scriptures. Many have excellent parts, and yet find but little relish for the Scriptures. No books that are written should take us off from this written word; although we have cause to bless God abundantly for what is written, for those excellent helps which we have, yet we must take heed that no written book in the world take us off from this written word of God. Luther therefore saith, I even hate mine own books, and I oftentimes even wish that they were burnt, that they might perish. Why? Mark his reason, Because I fear lest they should be any kind of hinderance to men, or withdraw them from reading the Scriptures: and he forthwith proceeds to commend the Scriptures: They are the only fountain of all wisdom; and further, I am even terrified, I tremble, at the example of the former age in this respect, because many divines spent so much time in reading Aristotle, and Averres, and other writers, and spent so little time in reading Scripture. And the truth is, it was that which brought so much ignorance into the world in the time of the school-men, which was a time of great learning, and yet the time of the greatest ignorance in the mysteries of godliness, because they minded Scripture very little, but only turned things into questions and disputes that tended not according to Scripture. Though we may make use of the labours and gifts of other men, yet look we especially to the written word, and let not other writings take us off from that. Hence we say, the Scripture, by way of excellency. We must keep ourselves to the written word, and take heed of being led aside by any traditions of men; that is a most detestable derogation from the written word. Yet we find the council of Trent, speaking of the Scriptures, saith in one of its canons, We do receive Scripture, and reverence Scripture; but moreover we receive and reverence traditions with the same affection of piety and reverence as we do the Scripture. These are the very words that all papists are born to hold, and for them to deny any council were death unto them. It argues men to be in the dark, so to regard written verities. The Jews are vain in their imaginations, and understand the Scripture so little, because they mind traditions as much as Scripture, and more; for they say, Divide a man's life into three parts, one part must be spent in reading Scripture, and two parts more in the two several parts of the Talmud, which is their traditions; and some of them say that this is one tradition among them, that Moses studied the Scripture in the day-time, and those Talmudical traditions during the night. It is indeed night work, and a sign that the world is so much in darkness, because they have so much respect to traditions, and neglect the written word of God, which we must regard more than if one came from the dead, or if an angel from heaven came and preached to us.

But you will say, We must not look to it more than if God should reveal any thing to us, suppose by a voice from heaven.

We have warrant to regard more the written word of God than the voice of God from heaven. In 2 Pet. i. 19, the voice that came down at the transfiguration in the mount is referred to, but saith the apostle, "We have also a more sure word of prophecy," more even than that was; that is, we are not so likely to be deceived by resting upon the written word, as if we look for revelations from God. "We have a more sure word of prophecy," therefore it is not so much after revelations that we are to look, (especially in such times as these,) but to the written word of God. There is a generation of men rising now, if not risen, that begin to have low thoughts of the Scriptures of God, and think to understand the mind of God otherwise; finding his written word keeps their hearts too close and lays too strong bonds upon them, because they would fain be loose, they would fain imagine to themselves other ways for the discovery of God's mind; but when they are dead, when their souls, it may be, are perished eternally in hell, the written word of God shall stand and be honourable in the eyes of his saints.

"I have written." The prophet saith not he hath written; but he brings in God, saying, "I have written." And that for these two reasons:

1. To put the greater emphasis upon it, for it is more for God himself to come and say, "I have written;" as if a father or master say to his child or servant, I command you to do such a thing, it is more than if a brother or fellow servant should say, My father or my master has bidden you to do such a thing.

2. Whosoever were the penmen of the word, it is I that write it, I take it upon myself. The word is so much his, that God claims not only the truths that are in the word, but the very inditing; and in 2 Pet. i. 21, it is said of holy men, they "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," ὑπὸ Πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι; they were not only moved, but carried on with a kind of violence, to write what they did. Both in their speaking and in their writing, "I have written."

"To him." From this form of expression,

Obs. 2. We should look upon the Scripture as concerning ourselves. Here is a letter written to every one of you individually, therefore it is in the singular, "I have written to him." Each must regard the Scripture as written to him or her particularly. God has written a letter to thee that thou shouldst not commit adultery, nor swear, nor steal, and that thou shouldst keep the sabbath, and that thou shouldst not lie, and that thou shouldst reverence him, and love him, and fear him; all such kind of rules has God from heaven written to thee, and it is a marvellous help to obedience, and to awaken men's consciences, when they apprehend them as written to them. Psal. cxix. 105, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." It is not a light that I see at a distance, a great way off; but as a light held to my feet, that I make use of for the ordering of mine own steps.

Many there are that seem to rejoice in the word of God, as a light to reveal truths unto them for matter of discourse, but they use it not as a lamp to their own feet, and a light to their own paths; and therefore follows, ver. 106, "I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments." I have looked upon thy word as a lamp to my own feet, as a thing nearly concerning myself, and then I have sworn and I will perform, I have sworn that I will keep thy righteous judgments. It is a mighty means to stir up a man's spirit, and quicken him to obedience, to look upon the word as written to himself: as thus, when you come to hear out of God's word, and God directs the minister so that you apprehend it as spoken to you, it will stir and awaken you; Oh, methought this day every word the minister spoke was directed to me! And so every word in the Scripture that concerns thee, God writes to thee; and conceive it so, and it will be a mighty means to stir thee up to obedience. As, if a man be asleep, a great noise will not awaken him so soon, as if you call him by his own name; so when the word of God comes as to ourselves in particular, it is a mighty means to stir the heart.

Obs. 3. Though the word concerns all men, yet it is written to the church in a more especial manner. "I have written to him." As you find in the Revelation all the epistles were written to the churches, and indeed all the word of God is in a more especial manner addressed to the church; there are some things concerning all mankind, but that which God aims at more especially, is the church. First, the church of the Jews; they had that great privilege, that the oracles of God were committed to them: therefore, in Rom. iii. 1, 2, when the apostle had taken them off from resting in many of their outward privileges, he brings an objection: But then may some say, "What advantage then hath the Jew?" he answers, "Much every way; chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God." In this thing they had much advantage over all the people in the world, that to them were committed the oracles of God: God gave Jacob his law, it was the inheritance of his people; it was written to them, and through them transmitted to his church. This is a great honour which God puts upon his saints; God makes his church to be the keeper of his records, the court of rolls, as it were; therefore they should look to it that they be kept faithfully, that they be not corrupted, for then they do falsify their trust. The church has the keeping of Scripture, but gives no authority to Scripture. In John v. 46, 47, Christ saith, "Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" Mark, Christ would have the authority of his words to be much strengthened by the writings that were before in Scripture, "If ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" But now, on the contrary, the papists will say, If ye believe not our words, how can ye believe their writings? they will take upon them more than Christ: Christ saith, "If ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" they say, If ye believe not our words, how can ye believe their writings? for they take the authority of Scripture to depend upon their words. It is written to the church, and committed to the church, but the authority comes not from the church.

"The great things of my law." By "law" here we are to understand the whole word of God, and not the law as distinguished from the gospel; and so the word means, being derived from יורה lex, docuit. one signifying to teach, the law is a doctrine that is taught; and so, though sometimes it may be distinguished from some other parts of Scripture, yet now we are to understand the whole mind of God in his word; when you read in Psal. cxix., how David loved God's law, it is not the ten commandments, but the mind of God revealed in his word.

"The great things of my law." The Vulgate renders it, multiplices leges, the manifold laws, the multiplicity of my laws; and the words in the Hebrew seem a little to favour it. Thence these two things might be argued:

1. That the word is full and perfect: that in it we have rules for every thing that concerns the ordination of our lives God-ward: in his word there is a multiplicity of laws and rules for all our ways.

2. That there are manifold excellences in God's law; as the manifold wisdom of God is in Christ, so the manifold excellences of God are kept up together in the word of God. The Seventy translate it by πληθος, the fulness, or multitude, and according to that, Tertullian has an expression, I adore the fulness of the Scripture. Oh the multitude of excellent things there are there! and the fulness that is in them! I find this word translated by many of excellent signification, and indeed the Hebrew will bear to be differently rendered. Some translate it, the precious thing, the magnificent thing, the excellent thing, the honourable things of my law; as in Acts ii. 11, they spake "the wonderful things of God;" τὰ μεγαλῆτα τοῦ Θεοῦ, it is more than the great things, the magnificent great things of God. Now the things of the word are glorious and honourable, and very great, they are to be looked upon as great things, the things of God's word: that is the first and most important.

And then, The things that concern God's worship are to be looked upon as great things, for it has reference to them also; but the expression aims at that which is more general; "the great things of my law," the honourable, magnificent, and glorious things. Now the things of the law were great things, because,

1. They are from the great God, and they have on them the stamp of his authority. In every truth, in every thing that is written in God's law, there is the awful authority of the great God, that binds kings and princes in chains, that lays bonds upon the conscience, such as no created power can: when we come to hear the word, we come to it either as to a sovereign, to receive laws from it, or as to a judge, to receive from it the sentence of death; it has the dreadful authority of the great God in it, and therefore every thing that is in the word is to be looked upon as a great thing. A piece of parchment, and a little wax, and a few lines, what are they? but having the authority of the great seal of England, they are to be looked upon as important. The things of God's law are great things, for great authority attends them.

2. The lustre of the great God shines in them. Take all the creatures that ever God made in heaven and earth, and there is not so much glory of God in sun, moon, stars, sea, plants, and all things in the world, as there is in some few sentences of Holy Scripture, therefore they are great things. Psal. cxxxviii. 2, "Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name." The name of God appears in his great work of creation and of providence; we are to look upon God's name as very great; yet "Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name," it is more than all God's names besides. It may be, when there are some extraordinary works of God in the world, as thundering, lightning, and the like, we are ready to fear, and say, Oh how great God appears in these great works! Were our hearts as they ought to be when we read the word, we would tremble at that more than at any manifestation of God in all his works since the world began; and if so be, thou dost not see more glory of God in his word than in his works, it is because thou hast little light in thee; let the world think of the things of God's law that are written, as they will, yet they are the great things of his law.

3. They are the great mysteries of God's will. The great counsels of God about the souls of men, about his way to honour himself, to bring mankind to himself and to eternal life, are contained in the word; counsels and mysteries so great that the angels themselves desire to look into them. As in Prov. viii. 6, it is said of wisdom, "I hear, for I will speak of excellent things," so the word of God speaks of excellent things, right excellent things, such great mysteries of God's wisdom as should engage our thoughts, yea, and do engage the thoughts of angels, and shall yield admiring employment to angels and saints to all eternity. Psal. exix. 27, "Make me to understand the way of thy precepts:

so shall I talk of thy wondrous works." Mark how these are joined together: "Make me to understand the way of thy precepts: so shall I talk of thy wondrous works." Why, David, couldst not thou see the wondrous works of God in the book of the creature, in heaven and earth? O no; "Make me to understand the way of thy precepts: so shall I talk of thy wondrous works." We often talk about vain and slight things, because we have nothing else to talk of; but did we understand the way of God's precepts, we should be furnished with discourse of the wondrous works of God.

4. They are of great concernment. The things of God's law are of great concernment, for all our present good or evil depends upon them. Prov. iii. 22, They are "life unto thy soul, and grace to thy neck." So saith Moses in Deut. xxxii. 46, "Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe to do, all the words of this law; for it is not a vain thing for you, because it is your life." There is, too, a curse annexed to the breach of every thing in God's law; "Cursed be every one that abideth not in every thing that is written in the book of the law." Is it not a great matter then? Certainly nothing in the law can be looked upon as unimportant, when the curse of God is annexed to the breach of every thing written in it. We have there the casting of our souls for eternity; and is not that a great matter? Did we come to hear the word, or did we read the word, as the word by which our eternal condition must be decided, we would look upon it as a great word.

5. They have great power and efficacy upon the hearts and consciences of men. When God sets home the things of his law, they will bring down the proudest and the stoutest, they will enlighten the blindest mind, and convert the hardest heart in the world; the law has a mighty power upon the soul, and therefore it is great.

6. They make all that receive them great: they make them great, even because they have but the keeping of them, much more then if they receive them. In Deut. iv. 8, "What nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" What nation so great as you are? Why, wherein are we greater, than other people? Wherein? In this: "What nation is so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" This was that which made the people of Israel a great nation, beyond all the nations in the world; they were not great in multitude, but in that they had the law of God, and the great things of his law, revealed to them. The Lord honours a nation highly when he reveals the things of his law to them; how great then does a soul become that embraces those things, that has all those great and good things revealed in the law made over to it as its own! Surely that soul is in a high and honourable condition.

7. They are great in God's esteem; they are great, because the great God thinks them so. That is to be accounted great, which the most judicious and wise men in the world judge to be so. Indeed that which a child thinks great may not be so; a child may think a bauble a great thing: so we may think things great indeed; we think the things of the world are great, estates, riches, and honours, these we deem great things; but what are these in God's eyes? God despises all these things. But that which the great God will think to be a great thing, certainly that is indeed great. Now mark what a high esteem God has for his word in that place, where Christ saith, "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled," Matt. v. 18. As if Christ should say, The Lord will rather withdraw his power from upholding heaven and earth, than from making good any one jot or tittle of his law. You may think it a little matter to break God's law, but God thinks it a great matter, and God would have us to make a great matter of every thing that is written in God's law. I am the more willing to enlarge on this, because I know it is the ground of all the wickedness in men's hearts and lives, that they look upon the law as a little matter: well, though they dare sin against God's law for the attainment of very trifles, yet God saith, I will rather lose heaven and earth, than one jot or one tittle of my law shall fail; and he will make it appear one day, that the things of his law are great things. "He will magnify the law, and make it honourable," Isa. xlii. 21. Some amongst us, considering neither what they say nor what they do, running away with the very word law, think to vilify it, saying, What have we to do with the law? Let them do what they will, yet God "will magnify his law;" and as it is great in the thoughts of God, so it is, and shall be for ever, great in the thoughts of the saints. The Lord will have his people, to the end of the world, entertain high thoughts of his law. The saints look upon the law of God as so great, that they had rather suffer all devisable miseries and torments, than willingly break it in any one particular; surely he accounts it great, who is willing rather to lose estates, liberty, yea, and life itself, in the midst of tortures and torments, rather than offend the law of God in any one thing, though he might escape all if he would; Nay, saith a gracious heart, let all go rather than I will venture to break one jot or tittle of the law of God. Men of the world think such to be fools, Why, they say, will you be content to suffer so much, lose all your friends? what! venture your fair estates, run the risk of being immured in a prison, or even losing your life? The world lightly esteems God's commandments, and deems men who are observant of them more precise than wise; but if God would but show to you how great a thing his law is, and all the threatenings which are revealed therein, you would account your estates, and lives, and all your comforts, as little and poor in comparison. Hence, in Rev. vi. 9, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held." Wherefore were they slain? Surely it was for some great matter that they would venture their lives. It was for "the word of God, and for the testimony which they held." And thus the saints of God have ever accounted the law of God a great thing. "I have written to him the great things of my law."

From what has been advanced, we may further

Obs. 4. The word contains matter to exercise the greatest minds. Many men cannot endure to spend their thoughts and time about trivial matters; whereas others think it happiness enough, if they can, by the meanest employments, procure subsistence. Oh, let all those of high aspirations exercise themselves much in the law of God; here are objects fit for great minds, yea, objects that will elevate the greatest: and indeed none in the world are truly great but the saints, for they exercise themselves in the great counsels of God. We account those men the greatest that are employed in state affairs: now the saints are lifted up above all things in the world, and regard them all as little and mean, and are exercised in the great affairs of the kingdom of Jesus Christ. Hence the Lord would have the kings and the judges to have the book of the law written, Deut. xvii. 18, 19; and it is reported of Alphonsus, king of Arragon, that in the midst of all his great manifold occupations, he read over the Scriptures fourteen times with commentaries. How many have we, men of great estates, and claiming to be of great minds, that scarce regard the law of God! they look upon his law as beneath them. Books of history and war they will peruse with diligence, but for the Scripture, it is a thing that has little in it.

Obs. 5. It is a special means to obedience to have high thoughts of God's law. That is the reason why the prophet here speaks thus, "I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were counted as a strange thing." As if he should say, If they had had the things of my law in their thoughts, they would never so have acted. Psal. cxix. 129, "Thy testimonies are wonderful; therefore doth my soul keep them;" I have high thoughts of thy testimonies, I look upon them as glorious things, I see in them much of thyself, and "therefore doth my soul keep them." He saith not, therefore do I keep them; but, therefore doth my soul keep them; my very soul is in this, in keeping thy testimonies, for I look upon them as wonderful things. It is a good sign that the Spirit of the great God is in a man, when it raises him above other things, to look upon the things of his word as the only great things in the world. "All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof as the flower of the field: the grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of our God shall stand for ever," Isa. xl. 6, 8. There is a vanity in all things of the world, but in that which the word reveals, in that there is an eternity: we should therefore admire at nothing so as at the word, and we should greatly delight in God's commandments; an ordinary degree of admiration or delight is not sufficient, but great admiration and great delight there should be in the law of God. And all arguments drawn from God's law should powerfully prevail with you. Temptations to such and such evils may assail you, and you may say they are strong temptations, but that which is in God's law should be stronger than they all: there is more in God's law than there can be in any temptation whatsoever. Know, it is dangerous for us to regard any thing in God's law as inconsiderable, so as to think it no great matter, though in that particular we depart a little from the rule of the word: Prov. xiii. 13, "Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed;" that is, looks upon any thing in God's word as a light thing. One, when convinced that things undertaken were evil, was wont to say, that he must make bold with God Almighty sometimes. Do not you make bold with God's word, and secretly jeer at those who are so scrupulous that they cannot venture a little? Remember Prov. xiii. 13, "Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed;" take the least thing that you think so despicable in God's law, and venture on the breach of it, God will make it a great matter; for when you have broken the law in the least thing, all the angels in heaven, and men in the world, cannot satisfy God for that wrong. If they should come and say, Lord, here is a poor creature who has broken thy law but in this one thing, which he thought to be a little matter, we are content to be ten thousand years in torments to satisfy its requirements: Nay, saith God, that will not satisfy the broken law. Therefore take heed of despising God's law, or despising any thing that is revealed by him, for certainly it will prove a great matter; and when the law has been broken, let us not deem the transgression slight, and think it is to be atoned for at the last by a "Lord have mercy upon me."

Obs. 6. The worship of God is a great matter. Every thing in God's worship is to be looked at as a great matter: they may think it a matter of indifferency whether they do it or no, at least in some things; my brethren, let us learn to know that every thing in the worship of God is important; God regards it much; God saith not that he is jealous for any thing, but for his worship. Uzzah thought it a little matter to go and catch the ark, and especially with a good intention: True, the law of God is, that it should be carried upon men's shoulders, but may it not as well be carried in a cart? he thought it but a little matter, yet was it in its consequences great. So, that which we think little in God's worship, may prove of moment. So Uzziah, in 2 Chron. xxvi., doubtless, thought it no great matter to go into the temple and offer sacrifices, Is it not as fit for a king to offer it as a priest? It was in the temple, and agreeable to the true form, and Uzziah, because he was a great man, thought he might venture, (for there you find that he had an army of three hundred thousand and seven thousand and five hundred soldiers,) yet, notwithstanding, God smote him. And Nadab and Abihu, too, thought it no great matter to go and offer strange fire: It is not expressly forbidden in God's word, they said: but it was a great matter before God, for God came with fire from heaven to destroy them. Hence it is that God in his word would set out the glory of his worship, and make them to think every thing connected with it great, that so they might not have their hearts taken with any false worship. Ezek. vii. 20, "As for the beauty of his ornament, he set it in majesty;" (and hereby God aggravates their sin of idolatry, My worship and service, I made it as beautiful and glorious as possible;) "but they made the images of their abominations and of their detestable things therein." So in Jer. xvii. 12, "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." Mark what follows, ver. 13, "O Lord, the hope of Israel, all that forsake thee shall be ashamed, and they that depart from me shall be written in the earth, because they have forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters." As if God should say, Oh the insensate hearts of men, when I present unto them such a glorious worship of mine, yet they turn to their own vile inventions, and regard it not! I beseech you, brethren, labour to look upon God's worship as a glorious thing. But now the reprehension follows:

"But they were counted as a strange thing." Herein consists the wickedness of people, that though God shows forth his glory in his word, yet they look upon it as "a strange thing," as a thing that they shall get little good by if they obey, or little hurt by if they disobey. We might now show wherein this people did account God's worship a strange thing, and what particulars of his law they accounted strange things; but this especially deserves to be noticed, they accounted it a strange thing, that God should so stand upon it, that he must needs be worshipped in Jerusalem, at the temple, and at no other altar, whatsoever came of it. Now, because they thought that if the people went to Jerusalem to worship, it would be very prejudicial to the state, this was "a strange thing," and that which they could see no reason for. So people are ready to think, if any thing be propounded for the worship of God out of the word, Yea, but is it consistent with peace? it may cause contention to insist now upon such things. First, men will frame troubles in their own thoughts, and put them upon God's worship; whereas indeed they do not bring such trouble, but if they be examined they may consist well enough with the peace of states. I make no question but this is one especial thing aimed at by the Holy Ghost here, that they accounted God's law, that very law of his which required them to worship at Jerusalem, "as a strange thing;" they could not see why they might not venture to worship him elsewhere, especially when in their eyes it seemed to favour the peace of the civil state.

Now they accounted this, and the other particulars of God's law, "as a strange thing;" in four respects.

1. As a thing that did not much concern them. They took not to heart the breaches of God's law, neither did they much regard the keeping of it, it was no great matter to them; they made account that which they did in that respect was ad libitum, that much did not depend upon it, either good or evil: as a stranger accounts it not to concern him what the master commands; or as we account it no great matter what strangers do, what clothes they wear, or what course they take, we let them pass by without concern.

2. In their apprehensions; they could not discern their reason. As we term a thing strange that we do not understand, and for which we can see no reason; so they in the text, that God should say thus and thus, when we cannot see that any account can be given for it, they are "strange things:" strange things that they did not apprehend the reason of. And especially, among other things of God's law, (as was said before,) the form of God's worship was a very strange thing to them; that God should so insist that he must be worshipped no where in the way of public worship but at Jerusalem, at the temple, no sacrifices must be offered but there; yea, that though people dwelt a great way off, though, as they thought, it would bring a great deal of disturbance into the kingdom of Israel, yet that God should so insist upon it, and that the prophets should urge with such fervency, their going to Jerusalem at all risks, they accounted this a strange thing. And indeed it is very strange to people to think, that we must look to the exact way of God's worship, whatsoever trouble or disturbance results from it, we must not in the least go against the mode that he has established: this is a strange thing to carnal hearts. And Luther, on the place, seems to interpret it, as if this text had especial reference to this note that I am now speaking of: They did condemn, saith he, and condemn the prophet's sermons, as a doctrine dangerous to the commonwealth; especially the doctrine about going up to Jerusalem to worship, they thought it was hurtful to the commonwealth, and therefore condemned it. What strange thoughts have carnal hearts of many parts of God's law! they think them foolishness, even those very things wherein the wisdom of God is revealed to the children of men, those things wherein are the deep counsels of God concerning man's eternal estate.

3. There was no suitability between their hearts and the doctrine; they did not make the law of God familiar to them as that which suited their minds. As a man turns almost instinctively from company altogether unsuitable to him in language, customs, and pursuits; so when the law of God suits not the dispositions of our hearts, our ends, our ways, our very hearts turn from it as from a strange thing: whereas indeed our hearts should be familiar with the word of God; his word and the things contained therein should not be as strange things to our souls, but, as the Holy Ghost saith, it should be as our kinswoman, and as our delight continually. Prov. vi. 21, 22, "Bind them continually upon thine heart, and tie them about thy neck. When thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; and when thou awakest, it shall talk with thee." There should be a familiarity between our hearts and the commandments of God; when going to bed, when we rise up, when we walk in the way, we should be conferring about the things of God's law, to make them familiar to us, that we may not be estranged from them. God sees that men's hearts would quickly be estranged from his law, therefore he commanded that by all such means and ways they should endeavour to make it familiar to them.

4. They used the word as a stranger; that is, for their own ends only. As usually when strangers come into a country, and all travellers know it, the natives either treat them slightly, or if they do seem to show any respect, it is merely for their own advantage: so they accounted the law a strange thing, that is, they made use of the law merely to serve their own ends; so far as obedience to the law suited them, so far they yielded to it, and no further. Now it is very observable, that those who were so zealous in their false worship, that, as the text saith, they did multiply, and had special regard to, their altars; yet the law, they accounted that "as a strange thing."

Obs. 7. Superstitious people, although very zealous in their own observances, are yet very negligent in God's mode of worship; they little regard that. Indeed their own altars were accounted great things, on their own ordinances they did not care what they expended; but as for God's institutions, they are as "a strange thing" unto them. We have seen very evidently, and do see it in great part to this day, how those that are very zealous in their own superstitions are the most negligent in God's ordained worship: to instance; you know, in late times, what a deal of stir men made with the ceremonies and modes of worship which they themselves had appointed; how zealous and devout were they in them! when they came in public congregations to bow and cringe, and perform other ceremonies, which they said the decency of God's worship required, how resolute were they for them, even so that the mouths of the most godly ministers must be stopped if they refused to conform! Yet these very men would scorn and jeer at strictness in God's ways, and slight any man that would be conscientious in them, and accounted all rebels who would not, in obedience to authority, adopt their ceremonies. For men to be conscientious about little things (as they termed them) in God's law, seemed strange; whereas they would urge men to obey to the uttermost every particular of their own; and so, in another respect, they would persecute to the uttermost men that worked but to get bread for their families on their holy-days, and yet could publish Books of Sports for the profanation of the Lord's day. And thus the great things of God's law were "as strange things," but their own things were great matters. Surely, if it were such a great matter to observe, for instance, the festival of Christ's nativity, we would have some hint of it from the beginning of Matthew to the end of the Revelation, but God no where mentions it. And mark, those people that stand most upon such festivals, stand least upon God's sabbaths. Many think it a strange thing for men not to pay regard to such festivals; Why may not we keep the birth of our Saviour? Now, that you may not think it so, do but consider this, that when God has set apart any thing for a holy use, it is no strange thing; but it would be strange in man to venture to imitate God in the things of his worship, to do that in God's worship which God himself has done before. Thus God has set apart a holy time, viz. the sabbath; it is set apart to solemnize the whole work of redemption, the nativity of Christ, his life, death, resurrection, ascension, and the coming of the Holy Ghost; God, I say, has set the sabbath apart that we might have a holy-day to keep the remembrance of them all. Now, when God has appointed one day, for man to dare to venture to set another apart, this is presumption. So, because Christ has set outward elements and sacraments to be a remembrance for his body and blood, for man to say, Christ has named bread and wine, why may not I also appoint something? this you would all say were a great presumption. Certainly the presumption is the same in the former.

Obs. 8. It is a dangerous thing for men to have their hearts estranged from God's law, and from the other spiritual truths that are in God's word; from the knowledge of that law in which they have been educated, and of which heretofore they have made profession. Thus it was with this people, they had been educated in God's law, and professed that, whatsoever God should reveal, they would obey; but now, notwithstanding, their hearts were estranged. Oh! let men take heed of this for ever.

You that have had good education, have been brought up in the knowledge of God's law, and have had its gracious principles infused into you in your youth, take heed now of being estranged from those truths which heretofore have been familiar to you, and of which you have made profession; take heed, I beseech you, of the several degrees of the estrangement of the heart from the law of God. I will but name them, to show how the hearts of men do become estranged.

1. They are less frequent in intercourse with God. A man that has a familiar friend does not estrange himself suddenly, but by degrees; it may be they visit one another less than they were wont to do, and yet there is no contention between them, but by degrees they grow to be strange, and then at length become very enemies. And thus it is with men's hearts; when men grow strange from the word, that they were acquainted withal before, they begin to call things in question, whether they be so or no, and especially those things which most concern the mortifying of sin, and the strictness of holiness.

2. Their delight in the truths of God abates. They were wont to take abundance of delight in meditating on the word; oh how sweet was it in the night season! and to confer about God's word with others was their great joy; but now this is abated, and many things, of which before they were very confident, they now begin to doubt.

3. They begin to have some hard thoughts of God's word. So some that heretofore prized the word, and regarded its truths as the joy of their hearts, yet now begin to entertain hard thoughts of the word.

4. They begin to wish that many things in the word were otherwise than they are; they cannot see enough to persuade them of their falsity, but, growing estranged from the word, they wish they were not true.

5. They begin to listen to things which are against the word. There was a time when they never would regard any thing advanced against the strictest requirements of holiness, but now are they ready to listen to objections. As a man, when intimate with his friend, cannot endure to hear any thing said against him, but being estranged from him, he can drink in any scandal greedily.

6. They become reluctant to search thoroughly into truths; they put off serious thoughts, and will not examine candidly into things as they were wont to do, but will rather search into any thing that may make against the truth than that which will work for it. I beseech you, observe such workings of your hearts.

7. There will be an engagement in some practice not allowed by the word. Then a man grows further estranged from his friend, when he not only refrains from coming into his company, but will engage himself with others that are against him.

8. Former weighty arguments are now weak. There was a time when certain things were thought to have very great weight in them, but now they are nothing, they are "accounted as a strange thing." Just as when a man is estranged from his friend; he thought before he had a great deal of excellency in him, but now he esteems him not; this argues the estrangement of his heart from him.

9. They at length violently reject the truths of the word, they grow to be open enemies to the truth. Some that have been familiar with God's word and truth, and made profession of them, and seemed to love them, have by these several degrees grown to be strangers from them, and at length enemies to them. Apostates have ever proved to be the most desperate enemies to the truths of God. Take heed, therefore, of the estranging of your hearts from the truths of God, lest you afterwards prove enemies to God: it is an evil thing to account his law "a strange thing;" how much more to account it an enemy to us, and our hearts to be enemies to it! Isa. v. 24, "Therefore as the fire devoureth the stubble, and the flame consumeth the chaff, so their root shall be as rottenness, and their blossom shall go up as dust." Why? "Because they have cast away the law of the Lord of hosts, and despised the word of the Holy One of Israel." O, let us ever take heed of this; and therefore let our prayer be that of the prophet David, in Psal. cxix. 18, 19, "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." And then follows, "I am a stranger in the earth; hide not thy commandments from me." Lord, I account myself a stranger here in the world; O, let not thy word be a stranger to me. I beseech you, observe this; those who account themselves "strangers in the earth," will never account the law of God "a strange thing" to them; but such as account themselves to be the inhabitants of the world, they will have God's law to be a stranger to them. Observe it, and you will find this to be true. When your hearts begin to close with the things of the world, you do not meditate in God's word so much as you did before, nor delight to read it; but if you can keep your heart from the things of the world, using them as if you used them not, then this will be your prayer, Lord, "hide not thy commandments from me." "Thy word is sweet unto me as honey and the honey-comb."

Obs. 9. That which men's corrupt hearts will not close with as a rule of holiness, they put upon Christ, as if Christ had delivered them from it. Many will estrange themselves from the law of God by too much familiarity with the world; but for people to conclude, because they now know more of Christ, that therefore they should be greater strangers to the law than they were before, this is indeed a strange way of estranging our hearts from God's law. The Holy Ghost, foreseeing such a generation would arise in the times of the gospel, who would boldly assert, that whatsoever the people of God were bound to under the Old Testament, yet under the New they had nothing to do with the law of Moses, very remarkably, at the very close of the Old Testament, annexes to a prophecy of Christ the words, "Remember ye the law of Moses my servant." "Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings" Mal. iv. 2. To you that fear my name shall Christ arise. What then does it add? then you shall have nothing to do with the law when Christ arises? No; mark the 4th verse, "Remember ye the law of Moses;" almost the last words thus carrying the requirements of the Old Testament into the New; as if the Holy Ghost should say, Now I have done revealing all my mind about the Old Testament, and you must never expect any more prophets, nor any further revelations, till the time of the New; when, instead of the prophets, you shall have the "Sun of righteousness arise." Well, then, we shall never have any thing to do with the law of Moses more? Nay, but, saith the Holy Ghost, then "Remember ye the law of Moses my servant."

Ver. 13. They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not; now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins: they shall return to Egypt.

"They sacrifice." The Jews might object, Why, how do we account the law of God "a strange thing?" do not we continue to offer our sacrifices to God? Why do you say we account the law a strange thing? From the connexion, therefore,

Obs. 1. Men may continue in the outward profession and performance of duties of religion, and yet the great things of God's law may be a strange thing to them. They do offer sacrifices still, and yet they accounted God's law "as a strange thing" to them. Do not think it sufficient that you continue in the outward profession of religion; nay, shall I say more? I question not, but a man may continue in outward duties and yet apostatize from God, so far as to commit the sin against the Holy Ghost; and that is evident from the example of the scribes and Pharisees, whom Christ charges with committing the sin against the Holy Ghost, although they continued to observe a great deal of outward strictness in religion: therefore you may apostatize far from God, though you do not forsake the public ordinances of God.

"Flesh." God calls all their sacrifices "flesh;" that is, in contempt; as if he should say, You sacrifice, indeed, I have a little flesh from you, but do you think that this is the thing which I look for in my offering? I expect faith and obedience, I expect the work of faith relying on him who is typified by all your sacrifices; but as you want that inward spiritual worship in your souls, I account your sacrifices but flesh.

Obs. 2. Most people offer nothing to God in all their sacrifices but "flesh." Their offerings are flesh; that is, even in your prayers, in your hearing, in your receiving, you offer sacrifice, but all is but "flesh;" God has the outward man, and it may be you have fleshly ends in what you do, and fleshly, carnal hearts. Many a man has excellent gifts in prayer, and seems to offer up an excellent sacrifice to God; but it is nothing but flesh, there is little of the Spirit of God, of the sanctifying Spirit, it may be, nothing. A man may preach excellently, yet in fleshly wisdom, nothing but fleshly excellency. O my brethren, what are our sacrifices if they be nothing but "flesh?" You know what the Scripture saith, "All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field: the grass withereth, the flower fadeth: but the word of our God shall stand for ever," Isa. xl. 6, 8. All a man's parts, all things are but flesh that come not from the sanctifying work of the Spirit of God by the word, and will pass away; but the word of God, that is, the impression of the word of God upon the soul by the sanctifying work of God's Spirit, abides for ever. You may have got a great deal of fleshly excellency, so that others may admire your gifts and parts; but this flesh is as grass, it will come to nothing, and all your esteem will pass away "as the flower of the field." Let us take heed, my brethren, that our sacrifices be not flesh, for though they may glitter a while in the world, within a few years all will be as grass and will come to nothing.

"For the sacrifices of mine offerings." God commanded them to sacrifice flesh. Yet here seems to be an accusation; not, however, that they sacrificed, nor that they sacrificed nothing but the outward part, flesh, but rather thus: In the burnt-offering all the whole sacrifice was tendered up to God; but in the peace-offering some part of it belonged to the offerer, so that when they came to offer that, they came with their friends, because they were to partake of it. Now, saith God, "They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings;" that is, they change mine ordinance; whereas I looked for burnt-offerings, the whole offerings, from them, they will rather offer peace-offerings, wherein they shall have part of the flesh for themselves, that they may take content therein. Thus I find interpreters carry it, and I verily think it to be the meaning of the Holy Ghost. So that from hence the note is,

Obs. 3. To aim at self in serving God eats out all true devotion. When there is a duty to be done, part of which God requires, and we show respect to God in it, and in the other part we enjoy ourselves, such duties men can be content well enough to perform; but the truth is, that part which concerns themselves generally eats out all the true devotion to God; although the worship be pretended, yet self-respects the heart is most upon: as for instance, the keeping of festivals they liked well enough, and we do not read so much about their non-observance, because in them there was something agreeable to the flesh; but now for the day of their fasts, God saith, "Whosoever afflicts not his soul, that soul shall be cut off." They had not so much mind to that in the tenth day of the seventh month, therefore God threatens, that whosoever did not afflict his soul that day, it should be cut off. And so you shall find it. That is the reason indeed why men are so much set upon their festivals; they pretend God's worship, and honour to their blessed Saviour, and the like; but the truth is, it is their appetite, their sports, and the licence to the flesh, that they aim at. I warrant you, let the time (as now it falls out) be the time of a fast, it will not be so much regarded; and for any man to keep a festival, when God by his providence calls to fast, certainly that man regards his own carnal lusts rather than God. And that by which all these festivals are upheld is, because that, together with a show of religion, the flesh gets so much gratification; but the performance of duties wherein God is served, and nature denied, is a great testimony that the Spirit of God is in our hearts: when we can offer up our burnt-offerings wholly to God, and ourselves denied, they are testimonies that the Spirit of God is in us. As in 1 Kings xiii., you read of the lion which slew the prophet that went contrary to God's commandment. Now the lion was specially sent by God to do this; and that there might be a testimony to that effect, therefore the text observes, that the lion stood by the carcass and did not meddle with it after it was once slain. It was the nature of the lion to have fed upon the carcass, but here was an argument, that what the lion did was from God. So, when any man shall perform a duty merely for God, and in that duty shall deny himself, shall be content to part with honours or preferment, that is a sign God is in it. And so in this public service: Oh, who would not venture himself for the public cause? But there is a public pay too as well as the public cause! But now, if a man, though he has not that which he expects, yet is content to venture himself as much as he did before, God is in this man, certainly, when he can thus do a work and deny himself in that work. And truly we should be willing so to do; why? because God requires not of us any self-denial that can do us any hurt. God would never have us deny ourselves in things that immediately concern our communion with himself and our eternal good. God expects self-denial, but it is only in those things that concern this present life. Now when God is so propitious to us that he will let us sometimes enjoy ourselves in the required duties, surely when he requires self-denial, and that in things of inferior moment, we should not hesitate to deny ourselves in them.

"But the Lord accepteth them not." As if he said, I would not have them, I was not pleased with them. Here,

Obs. 4. Whosoever our services be, if self be regarded, all is rejected. Not only if sin be regarded, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer;" but if self be regarded, our services may please ourselves, but cannot please God. And for this you have a remarkable scripture in Amos v. 22, "Neither will I regard the peace-offerings of your fat beasts." Amos was contemporary with Hosea, and seems specially to refer to the very same thing as Hosea here, so that his words may help us to understand the passage before us. "Neither will I regard the peace-offerings of your fat beasts:" observe, they are their "peace-offerings;" he saith not, I will not accept the burnt-offerings of your fat beasts; but "the peace-offerings," because of their peace-offerings they ate part themselves; and saith God, Let your offerings be never such fat beasts, yet I will not accept them: so, let your duties be never so zealous and abundant, yet, if performed with a regard to self, God accepts them not.

"Now will he remember their iniquity." They offered their sacrifices that their sins might be done away, and had they exercised faith upon Christ the true sacrifice, their sins would have been blotted out; but they offering with a regard to themselves, it is said of them, "Now," for all this, "will he remember their iniquity."

Obs. 5. Men may perform great services, exercise themselves much in holy duties, and yet their sins remain unpurged on God's file. It is indeed a sad thing for a man to kneel down and pray with woeful guiltiness upon his spirit, and rise up with the same sense of guilt that he knelt down with; and perhaps he has gone on and prayed and received the sacrament for these many years together, and every sin that was upon him when he first began is upon him now; whereas those that in holy duties exercise their faith upon Christ their Mediator, and with the act of faith tender up him to the Father, whatsoever sins were upon them before are now done away.

Obs. 6. However God may for a while forbear to come upon wicked men for their sins, yet he has his time to remember them all; to remember, that is, by his judgments to make it appear to them that he does remember them, when they think that he has forgotten them. 1 Sam. xv. 2, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt." I remember what he did; why, this was four hundred years ago that he spoke of. We may commit a sin when in our youth, and feel nothing of it till we come to be old, and then God may remember it against us: as many when young, their bones full of marrow and their veins of blood, feel not their present excesses; but in old age, then it aches in their flesh and bones, and then they remember their licentiousness and carelessness in their youth. And so many young people commit sin, and conscience never troubles them for it, and they think all is forgotten; but many years after the sin is committed, God remembers it, and makes them remember it too. Joseph's brethren had committed that sin against their brother two and twenty years before they were compelled by God's dispensations to say, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother," Gen. xlii. 21. Many things might be said to this point which I cannot now insist upon, only this take with you; Let all you that are young, yea, and others too, take heed what you do in sinning against God, for that which you do now may be remembered against you many years after; perhaps twenty, thirty, forty years hence, God may come upon you for your present actions. Methinks this should be to young men a constraining motive to take heed of wicked lives, Youth's sins may prove to be age's terrors.

Oh! is it not a great deal better that God should remember "the kindness of thy youth" than the sins of thy youth? Jer. ii. 2. You that are young, begin, I beseech you, to be godly betimes, that God may remember "the kindness of your youth." How blessed is the condition of the saints in comparison of the wicked! "God will remember their sins no more;" he will "bury in the depths of the sea" the transgressions of his people. Numerous expressions of similar import occur in the word of God.

But further, "Now will he remember their iniquity;" that is, in the time of their holy duties. Now this is a sad thing, that God should not only remember a man's sin, but even then when he is about to offer sacrifices to God; as in Heb. x. 3, it is said, "In those sacrifices there is a remembrance made of sins every year;" that is, it was a note of their guiltiness every time they came to offer sacrifice, and their sacrifices did not do away their sins fully, now will he remember them. But when they offered in a careless and ungodly manner, surely such sacrifices would bring their sins into remembrance indeed.

Obs. 7. God remembers the sins of the wicked especially in the performance of holy duties; and that upon these two grounds:

1. Because then we come into God's presence. We then come before his eyes in a more especial manner. We are in God's eyes always, but holy duties the Scripture speaks of as a more especial drawing nigh to God. If a malefactor that has committed an offence a long time since, and thinking it forgotten, should presume to come into the presence of the king or judges, this presumption, were he discovered, would be deemed an aggravation of his guilt: so when the wicked are hold to draw nigh to God, although their consciences tell them that they have not sought to do away their sins by faith and repentance, this puts God into remembrance (to speak of God after the manner of men).

2. Their holy duties are aggravations of their sin, therefore God will remember them then rather than at any other time. As thus: the Jews in the text come to sacrifice for their sins, the language of which rite certainly was, Lord, I acknowledge I do deserve death myself for the sins which I have committed, and I can only have peace with thee through the sacrifice of thy Son that I believe is to come: now for them to come and virtually to say so, and yet continue still in their sin, this aggravated their guilt; it was a sin of infirmity before, it is a sin of presumption now. So, when men presume to come before God in prayer who have heretofore lived wickedly, and thus testify the respect which they profess they owe to him, while yet their consciences tell them that they do wickedly depart from God in their lives; when, I say, in prayer they confess and name their sins before God, and tell him what sinners they are, and yet still their hearts do close with these their sins, what an aggravation is this! yea, they come to judge themselves for their sins, and yet still to continue in them. O my brethren, if you did but think how such prayer aggravates our sins, it would make your hearts quake and tremble. But I speak only to those that, being hypocrites, live still in their sins; their holy duties being but aggravations, no marvel though God then remember their sins in a more special manner. We have cause to wonder that God does not come upon some of us in his wrath, while we are in the midst of our holy duties: as Pilate came upon the Galileans and mingled their blood with their sacrifices; so, while we compare the lives of men with their prayers, it is indeed a marvel that God does not mingle their blood with their sacrifice. O take heed, any of you that are conscious to yourselves of your hearts closing with any known sin, take heed the next time you go into God's presence in prayer, and confess your sins, and judge yourselves, that God does not then remember your sins. "Now will he remember their iniquity," even in the time of their holy duties: you think that is the time in which you most please God, but it may prove to be the time of God's remembering your iniquities against you.

"And visit their sins." God visits either in mercies or judgments; and in the godly visiting, it is to be understood concerning those things that seemed before to be neglected, as, in Gen. xxi., God visited Sarah after apparent neglect; and so, in Exod. iv., he visited the children of Israel; that is, when he seemed wholly to have neglected them; and so, I will "visit their sins;" though they may think I have neglected them, yet I will "visit their sins." Whence,

Obs. 8. God visits men's sins when they think he neglects them most. God has his time to make diligent inquiry for all their sins. In Exod. xxxii. 34,

"In the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them;" then all their sins shall come up together. And that is the reason that God is content to bear with wicked men, and wink at their sins for the present; why? because God has a day to visit them: This sin which they commit now, they shall not hear of it till a great while hence, but I have a day to visit, and then this and the other sins shall appear. Days of visitation heretofore were wont to be called days of vexation, but the day of God's visitation will be a day of vexation indeed to ungodly men. Micah vii. 4, "The best of them is as a brier; the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge: the day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh; now shall be their perplexity." In Isa. x. 3, "And what will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will you leave your glory?" So I may say to many guilty consciences, "What will ye do in the day of visitation?" Poor sinner! thou canst tell now, thou canst go home and be merry, and do what thou list; but what wilt thou do "in the day of visitation?"

They will return, or, as we translate it, "they shall return to Egypt." And so it denotes,

1. The course they would take when God was about to visit them. "They will return to Egypt." Whither will ye flee "in the day of visitation?" We will flee into Egypt, say they; if the Assyrian power grow too great, we will go into Egypt for help. And this may seem to refer to 2 Kings xvii. 4, where "the king of Assyria found conspiracy in Hoshea; for he had sent messengers to So king of Egypt."

Obs. 9. Carnal hearts, when God is visiting them for their sins, are plotting how to shift for themselves. Vain deluded soul! thy thoughts should be, How may I make my peace with God? how may I seek the face of God? thou art thinking of various shifts, whereas thou shouldst only be thinking of reconciliation with God. And thus it is with kingdoms; when God is visiting kingdoms, you find many that sit at the stern, exercise all their thoughts about carnal helps, whereas their great thoughts should be, how they might fall down before God, and make peace between God and the kingdom: thus it was here, I will visit them, and they think to return to Egypt.

2. Their judgment. "They shall return to Egypt." It is threatened that they should return to Egypt at the latter end of Deut. xxviii.; there it is as a close to all the former judgments, "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again."

Obs. 10. It is one of the most dreadful judgments upon a nation, after God has delivered them from a bondage, to return them into the same again. And as it was grievous to bring them back into the bondage of Egypt, so more to return us into a spiritual Egypt. If we should again come fully under the power of those that have persecuted us and oppressed us, our bondage would indeed be seven-fold more than it is: and yet what cause have our hearts to tremble, when we think how we abused the beginning of the deliverance we have had! But of all judgments, let us pray to be delivered from that judgment, that we may never be returned again to our prisons.

Obs. 11. It is just with God, that those who inherit their progenitors' sins, should inherit their progenitors' judgments. You continue in their sins, you shall have their judgments also.

Quest. But were they ever carried into Egypt? was this threat ever fulfilled?

Ans. No, they were not carried captive into Egypt, but they fled into Egypt for refuge, and there lived and died miserably, Jer. xlv. Hence,

Obs. 12. All places are places of misery when God forsakes a people, as all places are comfortable when God is with a people. Many seek to help themselves, and perhaps they in part obtain what they would have; but the very answering of their desires oftentimes proves to be the execution of the wrath of God upon them. You have a mind to go to Egypt, you "shall return to Egypt," saith God.

Ver. 14. For Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples; and Judah hath multiplied fenced cities; but I will send a fire upon his cities, and it shall devour the palaces thereof.

"For Israel hath forgotten his Maker." They have forgotten their Maker, but I will remember them, saith God.

Obs. 1. God punishes for sins when men are most secure; whereas if you would remember your sins, God might forget them; or if you would remember God, your sins should not be remembered. It is an abominable thing for us to forget God, from whom we received our memory, and by whom we are remembered; we should never have been thought of if God had not given us what we have, and therefore for us not to think of God is a vile sin. Now, God is forgotten when he is not honoured, when he is not regarded as our confidence, help, refuge, our only good, when he is not obeyed; if we do but remember sin, we cannot but honour him. How many forget what manifestations once they had of God! they are passed by from them, and other things occupy their thoughts. Oh what manifestations of God have many of your souls enjoyed, and what communion with your heavenly Father! how has God's Spirit shone upon you! and you thought you should never forget those things; but now other things are in your hearts: such have cause to fear that they are under much wrath, that they should so forget their Maker. God challenges remembrance under this title: "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth," Eccl. xii. 1. There is no creature but the rational, that can reflect upon the cause of their being, the first cause, and therefore God would not lose the honour from this creature. "The ox indeed knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib;" the beasts can take notice of those that bring them good things; but to reflect upon the cause of their first being, I say, that is proper to the rational creature, and therefore it is an honour that God expects from you, and will not relinquish.

The words "his Maker," imply not here God's giving them their being, but God's advancing and blessing them, so as to bring them to that happy condition which now they were in: "Israel hath forgotten his Maker," they have forgotten the God who has thus advanced them. So I find the word rendered, 1 Sam. xii. 6, "The Lord that advanced Moses and Aaron;" in the original, יהוה אשר עשה את-משה ואת-אהרן, יהוה the Lord that made Moses and Aaron; that is, when God called them to the public work, God, as it were, then made them. Indeed for a man to be called to public service is a great honour from God, God then makes a man: we often use that phrase ourselves, if a man be raised to any preferment, such a man is made for ever. He whom God casts his favour upon, and delights to use in public service, is indeed a made man.

Obs. 2. God's favour makes a man. You have an excellent scripture for this in Isa. xliiii. 7, "I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him." Here are these three words together. God doth not satisfy himself with saying, I have given him his being, or all that he has, but he makes use of these three different words to signify how all our good comes from himself: I do not know a similar expression in Scripture. I have brought him out of nothing; then, secondly, I have formed him, I have put beauty and glory upon him; yea, and thirdly, I have made him, I have raised him to the height of all. God has created us all; but has he formed us? We are to look at God's forming as well as at his creation, how God forms and fashions us unto his own will.

Obs. 3. The greater height of excellency God raises any man to, the more vile is his sin in forgetting God. Many men will remember God when they are low, but when God has advanced them, then they forget him, and that is worse. But there follows,

"And buildeth temples." How is God forgotten, and they building temples to the honour of God? You accuse us of forgetting God our Maker; what people in the world remember God as we do, when we are at such charges about his worship?

The word היכלות translated "temples," signifies also palaces. The church is indeed God's palace. But note from hence,

Obs. 4. When God is worshipped in any way but his own, then God is forgotten. Papists set up images, and say it is to remind them of God; but the truth is, they forget God in them.

Obs. 5. When men's hearts depart furthest from God, then are they many times most forward in superstitious worship. We know that in the primitive times the hearts of men did close most with the power of godliness, and were more sincere in their worship; but afterwards, when they came to have peace, and temples, in and after Constantine's time, then they forgot God most, and grew superstitious. When the Christians worshipped God in dens and caves of the earth, they remembered God more than when they had glorious temples built for them. Men that have departed from God must have something to satisfy their consciences. Of late, how desperately was our kingdom departing from God, and setting itself against all the power of godliness; yea, and for the building of temples too, that is, for a more pompous and glorious external worship! but they forsook the temples of God, and persecuted them; the saints of God, the true temples of the Holy Ghost, were neglected.

But you will say, Why is it a sin to build temples? I answer, It was in them,

I. A sin of hypocrisy.

II. A sin of superstition.

I. A sin of hypocrisy: they would persecute those that would go to worship at the true temple, and yet bestow so much cost in building temples of their own. And many of the ancients have many large invectives against all such as shall bestow a great deal on outward buildings, and yet let the poor saints want.

II. A sin of superstition: they would not go to Jerusalem, to the temple that God had appointed, yet they would set up temples of their own. There are many that hate the true temple, and the true church, that is, the communion of saints; yet magnify the outward buildings, as if they were the only church. So the Jews, when God would have them build his own temple, were slack enough: in Hag. ii. 2, 4, 9, what a deal of trouble had God by his prophet to get them to build his temple! but their own temples they would build.

But wherein was the superstition manifested in their building temples?

Thus: it is a sign of superstition for any men to put holiness on any buildings of their own. There were three things that made the temple at Jerusalem a holy temple; and none of them can be attributed to any other place in the world.

First, It was set apart by God, so that it was a sin to use it for any other than a holy purpose.

Secondly, It sanctified the very duties that were performed.

Thirdly, It was a type of Jesus Christ. There were these three things peculiar to the temple at Jerusalem. And therefore you must learn for ever from hence, that no argument can be drawn from the temple at Jerusalem for the holiness of temples now. Hence mark,

1. It is a sign of superstition to set apart a place, so that it should be a sin to use it for any common purpose.

2. It is still worse to set apart a place so as to think that the very place should sanctify the duty, because the temple of Jerusalem did so. Now, for a man to think that his prayers are sanctified because they are within such a building, is superstitious: hence a company of poor ignorant people must go behind a pillar and pray, as if they were accepted the more because of the place. True, indeed, when we come and join with the church, our prayers are accepted, because it is in a way of ordinance. Chrysostom exclaims

against this superstition, saying, Jeremiah when in the mud could pray, Job on the dunghill, and Jonah in the belly of the whale; and therefore, why should we confine God's hearing of prayer to such and such places? Besides dedication, the heathens had enchantments: Ab auguriis inaugurabantur, suis auguriis sanctiora reddebantur; hoc nisi fieret, templa esse non poterant (teste Varrone) sed ades sacre dicebantur. Men have been very profuse in this, both heathens and Christians, and yet I find that some of the heathens thought God too great to be worshipped within any building. Zeno, the philosopher, thought that temples must not be built; and the Persians, who worshipped the sun, thought that the whole world was its temple, and would have none other. The Magi, too, persuaded Xerxes to burn all the temples of Greece, because they shut up God within walls. Some of the heathens had such thoughts of God, though ordinarily they were very abundant in building of temples to their idols. Josephus recounts Herod's desire to seem to honour God by building a glorious temple, even that same temple which was standing in Christ's time. He would make it as large and glorious as Solomon's was, and so he laid out a great sum of money upon it, in building it with blocks of white marble, twenty-five cubits long, eight cubits high, and about some twelve cubits broad: thus superstitious he was, and yet he was ungodly. And so many, to gratify inclinations of their own, care not what they expend; but in those things which God requires they are slack enough.

"And Judah hath multiplied fenced cities." Judah, seeing God's judgments upon Israel, does not use the judgments of God upon their brethren, so as to consider their own sins, and fall down before the Lord, and be humbled in his sight; but when they saw that God's hand was against the ten tribes, all their care was to fortify themselves; Let us build strong cities, that we may be delivered from the miseries that are come upon our brethren. This is the course carnal hearts pursue; when God expects that they will be put upon humiliation and repentance, and look to it and consider whether they have not the same sins among them that were among their brethren, they regard nothing but carnal means. It is lawful to build strong cities, to fence ourselves against enemies; yea, but we had need lay the foundation of them in humiliation and reformation; and when they are built, they may not be rested in, for, saith God, "I will send a fire upon his cities, and it shall devour the palaces thereof." We must not bless ourselves in any strong places as if they could deliver us from the wrath of God. I have read of a city, that, fearing their enemies, sent to a neighbouring prince to come and help them, and charged their ambassadors to tell him what strength they had. But, saith the prince, have you got a cover to defend you from heaven? if not, I will not meddle with you: you must have something to ward God's wrath from you, you are so wicked; and except you have something to deliver you from that, I will not assist you. So, though we have strong walls, yet we must look for a cover from heaven, which is our peace with God through Jesus Christ.

Obs. 6. Men are more desirous to secure themselves from outward calamities than from God's wrath. "Judah hath multiplied fenced cities." Of outward safety men think they have never enough, to secure themselves from poverty and from their enemies, but security from God's wrath they little regard. In spiritual things we are content with a little, but when it comes to temporal security, we think we can never be too safe; and indeed, this will show you what your hearts are most set upon, that which you endeavour to secure yourselves most in, that is your chiefest good. A gracious heart will never say, May I not go to heaven though I do no more? but, Can there any thing more be done? does God require any thing more of his creature? God that knows all things, knows my heart is ready to do all things that he has revealed to me; and if there were any thing more to do, oh that I knew it, that I might fulfil even all righteousness!

"But I will send a fire upon his cities." They "multiplied cities," saith the text, "but I will send a fire." Hence,

Obs. 7. When we bless ourselves most in our own thoughts we should consider, But what are God's thoughts? We think we will do thus and thus, and save ourselves by this or the other means. Poor wretch! thou sayest thou wilt do thus and thus; yea, but think, what if God's thoughts, at the same time, be otherwise? Thou art plotting to save thyself, but God is plotting to destroy thee; what if there prove to be a disjunction between God's thoughts and thy thoughts? Wicked men have plots and devices for themselves, but God comes with his disjunctions, I will do thus and thus. Our enemies have had their plots, but God has been pleased to come in with his disjunctions, his thoughts have not been as their thoughts, blessed be his name.

Some interpret these words, "But I will send a fire." It may be that they think their forts are so strong that they cannot be beaten down, "but I will send a fire" to burn them down.

But I rather think this fire is meant metaphorically, I will send their enemies, which shall be as a fire; and so enemies are often called "a fire" in Scripture.

Obs. 8. By whatsoever means fire comes, God's hand is to be looked to in it. "But I will send a fire." If there has been a fire in your streets or houses, you will inquire by what means it came: but look up to God; whatsoever the means were, it is God that sends the fire.

Obs. 9. Brave things are subject to God's devouring fire. "And it shall devour the palaces thereof." As when the disciples looked upon the fair buildings of the temple and wept, and Christ said, "There shall not be left here one stone upon another;" so when we look upon our brave palaces, let us consider how quickly the fire of God's wrath may come, and not leave a stone upon a stone. And let us strive continually to look up to that place where Christ is gone to prepare mansions for us, and to that building that is eternal in the heavens, made without hands.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1. Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people; for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, thou hast loved a reward upon every concubine.

HERE begins another of the prophet's sermons. Gualter thinks this the sixth that Hosea preached to these ten tribes, wherein he still pursues the course he had commenced, convincing of sin, and threatening of wrath against Israel. This sermon was preached in a time when Israel seemed most prosperous and joyous.

"Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy." These words, according to interpreters, refer to one of these two periods:

I. When Israel, the ten tribes, obtained some special victory over their enemies. Or,

II. When Menahem made a league with the Assyrians.

I. When Israel, the ten tribes, had obtained some special victory over their enemies. This may refer, either to the time mentioned, 2 Kings xiii. 25, when Jehoash beat Benhadad three times, and recovered the cities of Israel;

Or, the time spoken of in 2 Kings xiv. 13, 14, "And Jehoash king of Israel took Amaziah king of Judah, and came to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem. And he took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and hostages, and returned to Samaria." This certainly was a time of great jollity and mirth among the ten tribes, as was also in the time of Jeroboam, 2 Kings xiv. 28, and in the time of Pekah, 2 Chron. xxviii., where the text saith, ver. 6, 8, They "slew in Judah an hundred and twenty thousand in one day, which were all valiant men. And the children of Israel carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand, women, sons, and daughters, and took also away much spoil from them, and brought the spoil to Samaria." Now in this time their hearts were much elated, for, in ver. 9, 10, the prophet Oded came to them and said, "Behold, because the Lord God of your fathers was wroth with Judah, he hath delivered them into your hand, and ye have slain them in a rage that reacheth up unto heaven. And now ye purpose to keep under the children of Judah and Jerusalem for bondmen and bondwomen unto you: but are there not with you, even with you, sins against the Lord your God?" It seems almost the same expression as we have here in the text; as if he should say, Now you purpose to keep the children of Judah and Jerusalem for bondmen and bondwomen, and you insult and rejoice, and you think you have gotten the day and have prevailed; "but are there not with you, even with you, sins against the Lord your God?" just as here, "Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people; for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God:" as if he should have said, Though God has given you a victory, and you think you have matter for much joy, yet,

"Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people." Why? Because your conquest is over your brethren, therefore rejoice not as "other people," as the nations around you would rejoice in slaying them.

Obs. 1. That is a sad war in which the conqueror has cause to be sad at the very conquest. If other people had gotten the victory, they might triumph; why not? but though you have prevailed, yet these are wars in which you should not triumph in, for by this means the nation of the Jews is becoming weaker, and in more danger to be made a prey to the common enemies; do not, therefore, you rejoice as other people might rejoice in such a conquest. And indeed such are our wars and victories at this day; we must not rejoice in our conquests as other people, not so as the French or Spaniards would if they prevailed against us, or as we might over foreigners; for our conquests weaken our own nation, they involve the destruction of our brethren, and therefore we are not to rejoice for joy as other people.

II. When Menahem made a league with the Assyrians. We read, 2 Kings xv. 19, that Menahem, king of the ten tribes of Israel, made a league with the Assyrian, that great king, "that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand."

Now when leagues of pacification and association are confirmed, nations are wont to triumph and rejoice, and by outward expressions to manifest their great satisfaction at them: Oh! now there is a peace made, now we shall grow stronger than ever we were, and be delivered from many troubles that heretofore oppressed us. So Israel blessed themselves in the Assyrian, in that they had got such a rich and mighty prince on their side; now that they had made their peace with him, they thought themselves secure, and contemned all threats, and derided all that the prophets said against them; now did the malignants among them lift up their heads and insult over them that would say, God's judgments would follow them if they did not join with God's people in his true worship; they sung away care, and none thought of any danger on account of their sin; they could not endure to hear of any apprehensions that might disturb their jollity and conceited happiness, whereof they promised to themselves the continuance. But now saith the Lord, by the prophet, "Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people;" be not too confident with whom you have made such a sure league, for they may prove to be your undoing, may prove to be the instrument of greater wrath from God than you have ever yet experienced: and indeed so it was, the Assyrians with whom they made this peace, and in whom they rejoiced much, proved to be the greatest instrument of wrath to the ten tribes. You have made your peace with him, and now you rejoice; but you have not made your peace with God, saith the prophet; and what good can your pacifications, can peace struck with them, do, so long as still ye go a whoring from your God, and break your peace and covenant with him daily. "Rejoice not, O Israel."

Obs. 2. Leagues wherein we much rejoice, may prove occasions of sorrow. They are called peace and union, but suddenly they may change their names, and be called a massacre; they may bring ruin and destruction on a nation, especially if the foundation of the peace be not laid in reformation. As long as a nation is departing from God, they have no reason to rejoice in any peace.

When people have been worn out with wars, they are greedy of peace of any kind, they care not with whom they make it; Oh nothing but peace, let us have that! and if there be but a peace concluded once, upon never such unsafe terms, Oh, the bells must ring, and bonfires must be made. This seemed to be the condition of the people at this time, but saith God, You are deceived, this peace will prove your undoing: "Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people: for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God."

But the observations which we may draw from the two periods referred to, that in which they gained advantages over their enemies, and that in which they made their peace, viewed conjointly, are such as these:

Obs. 3. Carnal hearts bless themselves in outward prosperity, in health, strength, friends, as if all were well with them, although they be under much guiltiness, though there be fearful breaches between God and their souls. How things are between God and them they care not, so be it outward things prosper; if there be no punishment for sin upon them, the guilt and pollution impunita nequitia.

Aug. in John. Tract.

of sin never trouble them. Augustine, in his Tract. upon John, saith, The joy of the world is nothing else but their wickedness unpunished; if God do not punish them presently, then they have a great deal of joy. And in Amos vi. 4—6, you have the description of the people of Israel more at large (for Amos prophesied in the same time that Hosea did): "That lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall; that chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music, like David; that drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments: but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph." Well; have not you more reason, you afflicted and distressed saints, to rejoice in God without the world, than they have to rejoice in the world without God? Shall not all the wrath of God that hangs over the heads of wicked men, and all the guilt which is upon them, damp their joy when they have but meat, and drink, and clothes, and a little outward prosperity; and shall the loss of a few creature comforts, such as many reprobates have to the full, damp your joy, when you have an interest in all there is in God, in Christ, in the world, in heaven, in eternity? When in all this you may rejoice, how unreasonable is your dejection!

Obs. 4. When men rejoice, they should consider whether God approves of their joy. These rejoiced, but the prophet comes in the name of God and saith, "Rejoice not." When therefore we find ourselves inclined to rejoice, we should consider whether God approves of it. The rejoicing of many is so little in accordance with the mind of God, that they dare not so much as consult about the matter with God, or their own consciences: the more some can prevail with their own consciences to be silent, the more joy they have; yea, some there are that have so much guilt on their spirits, that they can have no joy, but when they can contrive, by some means or other, to lull their consciences to sleep; when their consciences are asleep they are fain to snatch a little joy: now, cursed be the joy that cannot stand with the free working of a true enlightened conscience.

Obs. 5. Men may prosper, and yet have little cause to rejoice. All outward prosperity may consist with the heavy wrath of God hanging over the sinner's head; he may be upon the very brink of destruction, and yet prosper outwardly. Outward prosperity may come in wrath; the poison of God's curse may be in the wine as well as in the water: the ungodly poor have their water poisoned, and wicked men, that are rich and prosperous, have their wine poisoned; and what difference is there between drinking poisoned water and poisoned wine? The swelling of carnal hearts in their prosperity, is a sign that it is poisoned to them. Outward prosperity, as it may come in wrath, and consist with wrath, so it may make way to wrath, by it the vessels of wrath may be fitted to destruction: God often has a further aim in suffering wicked men to prosper than they are aware of. As Haman, when invited by Esther to a banquet, inferred that he was honoured above all the nobles in the land, and went away rejoicing, and told his friends of the great honour that was put upon him; but Esther had a design in it far other than Haman thought of, she designed not to honour, but to destroy him: so many, whose estates God raises, draw inferences from his dealings with them far other than ever he intended; they think God has blessed them, whereas, in truth, God is working their ruin and destruction. As a painted face is no argument of a good complexion, so a prosperous estate is no argument of a good condition.

Obs. 6. Carnal hearts in their joy are immoderate, and their spirits are elated, and they think not of setting bounds to their joy; so the words import, "Rejoice not for joy;" if you will rejoice, let there not be mere joy, but some kind of mixture in it. There should be a mixture of reverence and fear in our rejoicing; we should, in this world, "rejoice with trembling."

Whatsoever blessings we have from God, yet should we, in our present state, "rejoice with trembling," remembering,

1. Our unworthiness of any good we receive, a deep sense of which should mingle with our joy.

2. The afflictions of our brethren.

3. The uncertain and vanishing nature of all those things in which we rejoice.

Put these three things always into the cup of your joy; else it will be too sweet, and clog the stomach.

"Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people." That is,

1. Be not taken with the world's jollity. The apparent happiness of others that are in a different way from us, is many times a great temptation to draw the heart to them.

2. Imitate them not in their modes of rejoicing. Dancing, and many other ways of rejoicing, they had in their idolatrous feasts: we must not imitate idolaters in their triumphs. This was the sin of many in the primitive times; because they had newly come out of heathenism, they would turn the heathenish feasts into Christian feasts, and heathenish customs, whereby they were wont before to honour their idol gods, into Christian rites: and they thought this was very good, that whereas before they thus honoured idol gods, they now thought, if they did but turn these to honour Jesus Christ, they would be accepted. No, this was a great sin, and brought a great deal of evil into the Christian world, and we do to this day feel its effects: indeed, herein is the original of the observation of this time, both of your Christmas and New-year's day; they are but transferred from heathenish observances to the honour of Christ and of the saints. I remember this time * two years, through mere providence that Scripture came in our way, "I will take away their solemn feasts;" and there I showed how these came, instead of the heathenish rites. Now, saith the Holy Ghost here, "Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people," do not you imitate them; they have their idolatrous feasts, but do not you as they. We must not take liberty to imitate heathens and idolaters in their worship, though we think thereby to tender our respects to God.

3. "Rejoice not as a people," for the word other is not in the original. Do not you rejoice as if you were to continue a people still, for you are to be carried captive, and not to continue as a people; you have brought yourselves into such a condition that you are not to look upon yourselves as a people: do not rejoice, no, not as a people. It is a miserable spectacle to see those who are ready to be destroyed, jolly and merry, as if no such thing impended. It is said of the dolphin, that it sports most at the approach of a storm. So, when the storm of God's wrath is arising upon a people, then they are most jolly and merry.

4. Rejoice not profanely. Others rejoice, and scorn at the threats of God: so Ephraim had mixed himself amongst the nations, and treated with scorn what was said by the prophet. Do not rejoice profanely, do not rejoice presumptuously, promising to yourselves continuance in your prosperity.

5. You have not such cause to rejoice as others. "Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people." Why? Israel! though you be Israel, yet there is not so much cause for you to rejoice, as for other nations. Israel, the ten tribes, prided themselves in their privileges above other people, and despised all in comparison of themselves: but now God tells them, that their sins had brought them into a worse condition than other people were in, and they must not rejoice so much as they. From thence this profitable note may be raised:

Obs. 7. Many who look with scorn upon others as mean and low, may yet be in a worse state than they. For instance, you may be a man of parts and in esteem, and engaged in high employments for church and commonwealth; another is in a mean, low condition, of weak parts and of little use; and yet such guilt may rest upon you, that you may not have such cause to rejoice as this poor man has whom you so contemn. It may be you have excellent gifts in prayer, and are an eminent professor; others may be vile in your eyes, they are no professors at all; if all were known, you have not such cause to rejoice as they whom you contemn.

Obs. 8. Although we enjoy the same blessings that others do, yet we may not have always the same cause to rejoice. I say, it may be others have more cause to rejoice in a little than we in abundance. Do not say in your hearts, Others are merry and cheerful, why should not I be so too? I have as good an estate as such a one, and as fair a dwelling, and as comely children, and why should not I be merry? But it may be there is not such a breach between God and him as between God and thee, it may be there is not so much guilt upon his spirit as upon thine, therefore thou must not rejoice as he does; though thou hast the same outward blessings, yet it follows not that thy joy should be similar. You have cause rather to reflect, Such and such men are cheerful indeed, yea, they may, for they have not provoked God as I have done, I am conscious of sins which I believe they are free from. A man afflicted with a sore disease, when he sees others merry thinks with himself, Yea, indeed you may be merry, but if you felt what I do you would have little cause to rejoice.

Obs. 9. It is a great aggravation of men's misery, to see others rejoice when they cannot. It is not for them to rejoice as others do; that which is the cause of rejoicing to others you have had and abused, you have abused like mercies of God, and now you must not rejoice as other people. Luke xiii. 28, is very notable for this, "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out." This is the aggravation of your misery, to see others in a happy and rejoicing condition, and "you yourselves thrust out." As, if a man lay confined in a prison near the street, on a day of triumph and festivity, and should hear in his dark dungeon the mirthful voices of the rejoicing multitude as they pass to and fro, this would be a great aggravation of his misery; Yes, would he think, they who have their liberty may rejoice, but I must not rejoice as they do. And this will be the aggravation of the misery of the damned hereafter, when they shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and themselves cast out: it may be the father shall see his child in the kingdom of God, and himself in hell, being cast out: they shall rejoice eternally when I must be in everlasting torments. The reason follows,

"For thou hast gone a whoring from thy God." The ground of joy or sorrow is, the terms that are between God and us. Sin has an evil in it to damp all our joy. If we would have joy in any thing, let us take heed of defiling it by sin. Of all sins, the sin of forsaking God, or corrupting his worship, is such an evil as is sufficient to take away all the joy of a nation. If we have forsaken the true worship of God, we have little cause for joy, though peace and outward prosperity may attend us; whereas a people retaining it, whatever be their condition, have indeed cause to rejoice. Yea, and as a whole nation, so individuals in it, if their consciences tell them that they have not complied with the times, and gone a whoring from God in ways of false worship as others have done, they have cause to rejoice, whatsoever befalls their nation; whereas the others, that have complied, though the nation should prosper never so much, yet have little cause to rejoice in that joy. Let us therefore be solicitous about nothing so much as about the true worship of God.

Yea, but this people might say, Suppose we have some corruptions in the worship of God, yet do we retain more than other nations. Nay, saith God, "thou hast gone a whoring," and so you are more guilty than other nations.

Obs. 10. That which we deem a trifling deviation in God's worship, God may call a gross corruption. True, might they say, we may fail in some circumstances, we go not up to Jerusalem to worship; but still we worship the true God, and we observe the law of Moses. No, saith the Lord, "thou hast gone a whoring from thy God."

But still, Why may not we rejoice as other people? surely we are not worse idolaters than they, therefore, though we may not rejoice more than others, yet why not as others? They make idols to be their gods; there is nothing so vile among us as among the surrounding nations. From God's charging them more than others,

Obs. 11. A nation may be free from the gross evils that there are in another nation, and even have many good things that the other has not, and yet be in a worse condition. You will say, How can this be?

Thus: some of their sins may have greater aggravations, which may make their condition (all things considered) worse. We, in this land, have heretofore much rejoiced in this, that we have had the doctrine of religion purer among us than almost any people; and certainly, except for some few that of late days have sought to corrupt it, it must be confessed that the doctrine hath been kept very pure in the main points; and in some things we have even gone far beyond other reformed churches, as in our observance of the sabbath, and worship paid to God in our families. Never had God more honour from any people in the world than he has had from us in these and many other respects; but yet, notwithstanding, it seems by God's present dealings with us, that he is more provoked with us than with other people: and the truth is, take these one or two things, the bitterness of our hatred against the power of godliness, and our persecution of it, and I think never was any people so guilty as we have been. In other reformed churches men may be as forward and zealous as they will, and yet meet not with persecution as here; others may have kept the sabbath more loosely, yet they never persecuted the strict observers of it, nor, as here generally, attempted to stop the mouth of the faithful ministry. So it may well be said to us at this day, "Rejoice not, for joy, as other people."

Yea, but still, If we be idolaters, (would the ten tribes say,) they are so too.

There was one particular aggravation in the case of Israel that was not among other people, and that was this. No other people would forsake their gods as Israel had forsaken theirs, Jer. ii. 10, 11; there was never such a thing as for a nation to change their gods; even Kedar, one of the basest of nations, would not do so: Go to Kedar, and see, and search diligently whether any nation hath ever forsaken their gods; but you have forsaken me. From thence we may

Obs. 12. To be constant to ill principles is not so great an evil as to be false in good principles. God, I say, accounts it not to be so great an evil for men to be constant to their principles, though they be evil, as to forsake the good. As now, if a man has been brought up all his days in superstition, and thinks verily that is the right, certainly this man is not so guilty before God as another who has been educated in the true worship of God, and has made profession of it, and yet afterward doth apostatize and backslide. God had rather that men should keep to their principles, though evil, than entertain good principles and forsake them. There are none so vile in God's eyes as apostates: there is not so much sordidness and baseness of spirit in those men that adhere constantly to their principles, though evil, as in those who betray their principles, although good.

Obs. 13. The sins of God's people are the greatest sins of all. The sins of the saints are the greatest sins of all, and they are to mourn more than any. In Amos iii. 2, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities;" your sins are greater. And that in Rom. ii. 9, "Tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile." And we have these two excellent texts in Jeremiah; chap. xviii. 13, "Ask ye now among the heathen, who hath heard such things: the virgin of Israel hath done a very horrible thing;" that is the aggravation, that it is the virgin of Israel that has done such a horrible thing. But especially chap. xxxii. 30, "For the children of Israel and the children of Judah have only done evil before me from their youth." Now Jerome raises a question upon this: What! the children of Israel and Judah only done evil from their youth? Have none done evil but they? And to this he answers, He that has the knowledge of God and goes from it, he alone sins in the eyes of God: as for unbelievers, they sin too, but it is as if God saw it not, and as if God minded it not; as he saith in Acts xvii., He winks at the days of their ignorance. We read of the Philistines, that they ventured to carry the ark upon carts, 1 Sam. vi. 7. God did not show himself provoked against their doing so: but when the Levites presumed to carry it upon carts, 2 Sam. vi. 3, the Lord makes a breach upon them, and strikes Uzzah with death. He bore with it in the Philistines a little before, and it may be they presumed, and thought, The Philistines carried the ark upon a cart, why may not we? That which God will bear from others he will not bear from his own; their sins are against covenant, and that mightily aggravates the sins of God's people.

Remember this, you that do often covenant with God in prayer. How often do you renew your covenant with God! What promises do you then make, and yet afterwards prove false and vile! Such as you must not rejoice as other people. You view with disgust a drunkard reeling in the streets, and with abhorrence hear a swearer blaspheming the name of God; yea, but their sins may not be so great as the vanity of thy spirit, the looseness of thy heart, and those secret sins of which thou art guilty. And why? Because thou hast so covenanted and bound thyself to God. The drunkard was never made sensible of his sin, nor felt the wrath of God upon his conscience; but it has visited thy conscience, and thou hast engaged thyself to God, if he would show mercy, thou wouldst walk holily and strictly before him. Now, dost thou think that thy sins are as the sins of other people? They never had such soul-quickening ordinances, but go up and down to taverns and alehouses, and their hearts never know what a powerful sermon means: had they enjoyed such blessings as thou hast, then likely it would be with them far better than now. And the name of God is not so much polluted by them as by thee. Thou professor of religion, the eyes of all men are upon thee, and in thy sin thou dost not only disobey God, but thou dost pollute his holy name; thou art a stumbling-block unto others, and the cause of the hardening of many hundreds in their sins, and therefore thy sin certainly is worse than others'. It would be a great point to show how the sins of the professors of religion are worse than others. It is not enough for them to say, We are all sinners. No, we must not excuse ourselves thus, that others are guilty as well as we, when we consider what aggravations there are in our sins more than in the sins of others. It is a sign of a very carnal heart to think to excuse itself thus: True, I sin, but others sin as well as I do. Yea, but a true penitent heart will not only consider itself a sinner, but what aggravations are there upon his sin more than upon the sins of others; and so will charge itself: True, such and such sin, but had they experienced what I have, it would not be so with them; my sin, that has broken through so many terrors of conscience, and that God has sought by such means to keep me from, is a sign of the violence of my spirit indeed. It is, therefore, an abominable thing to make our profession in holy duties a medium to make our sins less. Dost thou think that this is a means to make thee escape that wrath? Certainly not, but a great aggravation of thy sins.

We have a generation of men among us, that, because they are believers, therefore say, they need no sorrow for their sin, they must have only joy. Now, certainly, thy being a believer may aggravate thy sin, may make it so much the more vile, and may pierce thy heart so much the more; for if thou art a believer thou knowest what the pardon of thy sins cost; therefore, certainly, God's mercies towards thee are the aggravations of thy sins. The truth is, suppose our sins were not so great as the sins of some other people are, yet it is not always an argument that we may rejoice as other people.

Why so? you will say.

Thus: suppose our sins be but equal, or less than the sins of other people, yet it is more than we know, whether God will pass by our sins as he does the sins of others. What if God, out of his prerogative, damn thee for a little sin, and save others who have committed great sins? We have such examples in Scripture; the thing that God cast away Saul for, in itself was not so much as that which David afterwards was guilty of; Saul might have said, This is an offence, but is this like murder and adultery? yet God pardons David, and casts away Saul. Do not you, then, think to rejoice as other people; why, may not God do with his mercy as he pleases, it is his own? God may pardon one, and damn thee eternally.

"Thou hast loved a reward upon every cornfloor." Israel saw the nations round about her have a great deal of plenty upon their cornfloors, which they attributed to the serving of their idol gods, therefore Israel thought to comply with them out of love to their abundance; and since then she prospered more, she thought; and this she loved, by this she was exceedingly hardened in her ways of idolatry, and blessed herself in them. This is the scope. God made many promises to provide for Israel in his service, but they thought to get more in following the ways of the Gentiles than in following God's ways: like some, who, though they have liberal provision from their husbands, yet, hoping to get more from others, to gratify their vanity and love of pleasure, leave their husbands, and "forget the covenant of their God," Prov. ii. 17. Just thus it was with Israel; though she might have God's care over her, and provision for her in the ways of his worship, yet, beholding the Gentiles living more bravely, she would follow after them. At first (as you heard) she hired lovers herself, but now she loves "a reward upon every cornfloor," now she expects greater advantage; this indeed was what urged her on. She might have many pretences, she might plead that she did not see why she might not do such and such things, they were not directly contrary to God's word; but whatsoever pretences she made in the altering of God's worship, yet the great matter that prevailed with her heart was this, she "loved a reward upon every cornfloor." And thus it is with very many that are superstitious; speak to them of their ways, they will have very many fair pretences, they think that they have this and that warrant out of the Scripture for it; but all the while they have a secret regard to their living, trading, estates, and friends, and this biases their hearts and minds. But divers things before to the same purport have been spoken of, and we shall here only

Obs. 14. Idolaters love outward prosperity, because it is a reward of their service to their idols. So the sweetness of our comforts should consist in this, that they come from God as a reward of our faithfulness. When idolaters look upon their plenty and attribute it to their idol gods, shall it be so much the sweeter to them? Let all our comforts be so much the sweeter to us, when we look upon them as coming from God as a reward of our faithfulness. In Psal. cxix. 56, David saith, "This I had, because I kept thy precepts." You will say, Can we look upon any thing as a reward of our righteousness? Free grace and the gospel reward may stand together; God may reward according to our works, though not for our works, and God is pleased to call it so for the encouragement of his people. Outward prosperity, if it follow our keeping close with God, is very sweet, as the cipher when it follows the figure doth add to the number, though it be nothing in itself.

Ver. 2. The floor and the winepress shall not feed them, and the new wine shall fail in her.

As a father, when he sees his admonitions not regarded by a stubborn child, withdraws his allowance from him; so God deals here, You have had many admonitions, now I will withdraw your allowance.

"The floor and the winepress." He doth not say the field, but "the floor," I will let them bring their corn to the floor; and he does not say the vine, but "the winepress."

Obs. 1. God often lets wicked men come near the enjoyment of a mercy, and then cuts it off: as many times the saints come near afflictions, and when they are at the very brink, then deliverance arrives.

Obs. 2. God is wont to strike wicked men in those things on which their hearts are most set. They would have their floor and winepress to afford them plenty, in that thing God strikes them. Now observe whether, in God's ways that are against you, he does not strike you especially in that on which your hearts are most set; if he does, know there is the finger of God, and God would have you take special notice of it.

"And the new wine shall fail in her." וְיִרְשׁוּ יַיִן בָּהּ The new wine shall lie to them. So in Hab. iii. 17, "The labour of the olive shall fail," וְיִשָּׁא לֵב; that is, it shall not perform what it seems to promise to you.

Obs. 3. All creature promises we shall find but a lie; but the promises of the word shall never fail. Whatsoever you promise to yourselves, I say, let it be grounded upon the word; but if you promise to yourselves great matters from any creature, you will find a lie in the conclusion. We often lie to God in not answering our good beginnings, and it is just with God that the creature should even lie to us, and not accomplish what they seem to promise to us.

Obs. 4. Men will be disappointed at last in that which they think to get in a way of sin. The way of the wicked shall deceive them, they shall not find what they expected therein. The saints shall find more than ever they expected from God, but the wicked shall find less than that which they expected from the creature. But there is not much difficulty in this verse, therefore we pass it over briefly.

Ver. 3. They shall not dwell in the Lord's land; but Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and they shall eat unclean things in Assyria.

"They shall not dwell in the Lord's land." Before, God was to them as a father taking maintenance away from them, leaving them to suffer want; but here his anger increases, and he puts them out of his house: as a father first withdraws allowance from his perverse son, and when that will not do, then he thrusts him out of his house; so doth God here: "The floor and the winepress shall not feed them;" and not only so, but, saith God, "They shall not dwell in the Lord's land." I will cast them out of my house, cast them out of my land; I will not suffer Ephraim to dwell any longer there.

God would make them to know that it was his land, that they were but tenants at will, and enjoyed the land upon conditions of obedience, as appears in Lev. xviii. 26; and in Lev. xxv. 23, we read of an ordinance of God, that no land in Canaan should be sold for ever, but only to the year of jubilee; the richest, that bought never so much land, could not buy it for ever, he could not have such a tenure as runs amongst us, "to have and to hold for ever." But you will ask why. The reason is given in the same verse: "The land shall not be sold for ever:" why? "for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me;" I have brought you to the land, and ye are but sojourners with me in my land. God may dispose of all as he pleases. It is a good meditation for us to dwell upon, that we are God's stewards; the Lord is the great landlord of all the world. When you go abroad into the fields, you that are godly may see more land than is your own, but you cannot see more than is your Father's.

"The Lord's land." This may be said of all the land in the world, he that is thy Father is the great landlord of the world. Men respect their landlords and are afraid to displease them, but how little respect is given to this great landlord! "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" but, though all the world be "the Lord's land," yet this land of Canaan was "the Lord's land" more peculiarly in many respects:

1. It was a land that God "had espied" as a special place for his people, Ezek. xx. 6. God was overlooking all the world; Where should I have a good land (or country) to set my people? and the text saith, God had espied this for them.

2. It was the land of promise. In Heb. xi. 9, "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country." No land in Scripture is called the land of promise but only this.

3. It was a land given by oath, Gen. xxiv. 7.

4. It was a land which the Lord brought his people into, by "a mighty hand and with an outstretched arm."

5. It was a land divided by lot; not only all the land, but every piece in it, and the possession that any man had, was ordered by God himself, by lot.

6. It was a land wherein God dwelt himself, a land that God called his own rest; "This is my rest for ever," Psal. cxxxii. 14; and God swore unto them that hardened their hearts in the wilderness, that they should not enter into his rest; that is, that they should not enter into the land of Canaan. It was the land wherein were the ordinances and the worship of God, and his honour dwelt there, and so it had a peculiar blessing upon it above every land on the face of the whole earth.

7. It was a land over which God's eye was in a more special manner: there is a most excellent scripture for that in Deut. xi. 12, "A land which the Lord thy God careth for; the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even to the end of the year."

8. This land was typical of the rest of the church in heaven, for so the apostle, in Heb. iii. 11, seems to apply Psal. xcv. 11, "Unto whom I swear in my wrath that they shall not enter into my rest." And so in 1 Chron. xvi. 15—18, it is said, "Be ye mindful always of his covenant; the word which he commanded to a thousand generations; even of the covenant which he made with Abraham, and of his oath unto Isaac; and hath confirmed the same to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant, saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance." Mark, that he would give unto them the land of Canaan; this must be remembered to a thousand generations, and it must be a law to Israel afterwards. Certainly this notes that God aimed at more by the land of Canaan than merely to possess them of so much ground.

9. Various titles are given to this land: a "holy land," Zech. ii. 12; "an exceeding good land," Num. xiv. 7; "a pleasant land, a goodly heritage," Jer. iii. 19; "as the garden of Eden," Joel ii. 3; "the glorious land," Dan. xi. 16, 41; "the glory of all lands," Ezek. xx. 15; and here in my text, "the Lord's land." Now from all these titles we are not only to take notice of this, that it would be a great judgment of God to drive them out of such a good land; but,

Obs. 1. It is a great judgment of God to drive men out of a land for sin. Truly, sometimes, when you travel abroad where there are fair prospects, you cannot but meditate thus: Oh how vile would be our sins, if they should provoke God to cast us out of such a good land as this is! And most of the titles, though not all, given to the land of Canaan, may be applied to our land; and certainly, if God should proceed in his wrath to cast us out, it would be a heavy judgment to consider of, "They laid the pleasant land desolate." Howsoever wicked men may cry out of God's servants, that they are the cause of the trouble of the land, yet certainly it is the wicked and ungodly, they that are false in the worship of God, who lay "the pleasant land desolate." Also, we might here observe, that to be cast out of those mercies that God by an extraordinary providence has brought to us, is a sore and a grievous evil.

Obs. 2. The excellency of the state of the church of God. The rest of Canaan was a type of the rest that God has in his church, and all those that are members of the true church of God partake of it. To enjoy God in his ordinances, is to enjoy that which is typified by all this.

O believer, thou hast a good land, there is an abundance of excellent privileges belonging to the church of God; and as it is a judgment to be cast out of such a land as this was, so it implies what a great judgment it is to be cast out from the church of God, or for God, to deny to give to us the blessing of his church. You know what a great affliction it was to Moses, to think that he should not come into that good land; and how earnestly did he pray to God to be admitted into Canaan! Certainly it is that which we should pray for, that we might live to come into that Canaan into which God is bringing his people: now let us not murmur as they did in the wilderness, "and were destroyed of the destroyer," 1 Cor. x. 10; but let us go on, and be as Caleb and Joshua, of another spirit, and not fear our adversaries, but go on in God's way, and the Lord will bring us into the good land. True, we have deserved to be cut off in the wilderness; but certainly God has a Canaan yet to come for his people, the Lord has great things to do for his church; and there are many expressions upon which some think that God even will make use of this Canaan yet, to be the place of the manifestation of his chief majesty and glory in this world: but, however that be, yet the Lord has a sure Canaan for his people.

"But Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and they shall eat unclean things in Assyria." The returning to Egypt we have had before. But besides that, they shall be brought to such poverty and misery as to eat unclean, polluted bread, whereas before they had abundance. Peter would eat nothing that was unclean till God warned him; but the Assyrians would bring them unclean meat and bid them eat. They would say, We cannot, this is against our religion, and against our consciences. Your consciences! what do we care for them? eat it or starve: so they were forced to eat.

Obs. 3. It is a great misery to be brought under those who have no regard to the consciences of men.

But that which is especially aimed at here is, God would take away all notes of distinction between them and the heathen. This prohibition of meats was a means to keep them from mixing with the heathen, but now saith God, All is gone, let them go and eat unclean things; as for the covenant with me, it is wholly abolished, I will own them no more than the very impure heathen: they would make leagues with the Assyrians; well, they shall partake with them, and be filthy and unclean as they. As they defiled God's worship by mixing heathenish pollutions with it, now God gives them up to all heathenish uncleanness; as they were like the heathens in inward impurity, so let them be, saith God, in outward abominations.

Obs. 4. It is just with God, that those who will make leagues with wicked men, should eventually be enthrall'd in their abominations. They were indeed at a distance from them before, but when once the peace is made, they come now to be all one with them.

Obs. 5. When men are inwardly unclean, God cares not for their outward cleanness. Thus many professors of religion defiling their consciences, and becoming like the wicked in inward sins, God at length gives them up to themselves, that there should be no difference between them and the wicked in their outward abominations. Have you not known some examples of this?

Obs. 6. It is a fearful sin for the saints to join with the ungodly in impure worship. There might be as much excuse for eating things unclean as one could imagine; Why, Lord, they might say, shall we starve? True, they might doubtless eat that which was unclean rather than starve, but yet their misery was great misery, that they could have nothing to eat but that which was unclean: but now this is not only an affliction, but sin, and indeed the moral of it is to show the great evil that there is in joining with any mode of false worship; to unite in false worship is a great evil, and an argument that God is about to disclaim us. Cyprian from this place dehorts Christians from communicating with wicked ministers, Ne sibi plebs in hoc blandiatur, &c. But I do not speak of not joining in worship if there be unclean ones there, ministers or people; and I am persuaded, if it be thoroughly weighed, no one will be found to be of that opinion; for it is impossible but in time some that are ungodly will creep unawares into every church: but this is not that which causes many to forbear communion, but some things being actually done that their consciences tell them to be sin. But if these matters of offence be removed, and the worship kept pure, and liberty given to every one to deliver their own souls by faithfully rebuking and admonishing, and a power exist in exercise in the church to cast out the unclean, no doubt, though some be admitted, men may communicate.

Ver. 4. They shall not offer wine offerings to the Lord, neither shall they be pleasing unto him: their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners:

all that eat thereof shall be polluted: for their bread for their soul shall not come into the house of the Lord.

The prophet, in the name of God, proceeds to denounce further threatenings on Israel, and this in the 4th verse is a very dreadful one.

"They shall not offer wine-offerings to the Lord." In their offerings there was wont to be wine and oil, to note cheerfulness in God's service: thus in Numb. xv. 5, 6, "The fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink-offering shalt thou prepare," and "thou shalt prepare for a meat-offering two tenth deals of flour mingled with the third part of an hin of oil." But now all joy shall be taken away, there shall be nothing but sadness and sinking of spirit under their misery, no wine-offering. Hence,

Obs. 1. It is just with God to take joy from those who abuse it to their lusts.

Obs. 2. This makes an affliction grievous indeed, when the joy in God's service is gone. "They shall not offer wine-offerings;" all their joy and comfort in the service of God shall be gone; they shall not only have sorrow in their outward afflictions, but every time they engage in any service of God, their hearts shall be dejected. There was a time when some of you were wont to offer "wine-offerings to the Lord," that is, to have much joy and comfort in the service of God; but is it not all gone? where are your "wine-offerings to the Lord?" You can now go through duties, but your hearts are heavy and dull in the performance of them; there is no sweetness, no enlargement of spirit, all the worship of God is now a burden unto you. Surely, no affliction is so great as God's duties becoming burdensome. So long as the saints have a wine-offering for the Lord in holy duties, so long as their spirits in the discharge of them can be free and joyful, their afflictions are not very burdensome, they are well enough; this is more delightful to them than all the wine in the world, for as they can say of God's love, "Thy love is better than wine," so can they say of their love to God, "Our love to him is more comfortable to us than any wine of earth. Now, though they be in afflictions, and their estates are gone, so that they have no wine to drink themselves, yet if they have their "wine-offerings" to offer to the Lord, this makes glad the hearts of the saints, more than the hearts of all the men in the world can be gladdened, when their corn, and their wine, and their oil increase.

"Neither shall they be pleasing unto him." Whatsoever their offerings be, they shall not be grateful unto him; God will take no delight in them, they will be but sour things to his palate; whereas the offerings of the saints in his own way, do cheer the very heart of God. "Neither shall they be pleasing unto him;" nothing that is tendered to God from them shall be pleasing to him: No, saith God, now I will have other ways than your offerings in which to glorify myself upon you. I will rather glorify myself by your miseries, they shall be sweet and delightful to me.

"Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted."

לֶחֶם אֵיִים The Hebrew may be taken substantively or adjectively, as thus, the bread of mourning, or the bread of mourners; now, by "the bread of mourners," is here meant unclean bread, for so it is interpreted afterwards, It shall be unclean.

But why is the bread of mourners unclean? This text has reference to Numb. xix. 11—14, where you read, that the dead body of a man defiled whatsoever touched it; yea, whatsoever came near it, even all those that came to the place where the dead body was, to mourn with the friends for the dead, became unclean. And it is observable, that the dead body of a beast did not make men so unclean (by legal uncleanness) as did the dead body of a man. The dead body of a beast made one unclean only till the evening, Lev. xi. 27, whereas the dead body of a man made one unclean seven days. And this was to note that there were more remarkable expressions of the anger of God on the sin of man in the dead body of a man, than in the dead body of a beast; one made unclean but "till evening," the other "seven days." But the reason why there was this uncleanness from the dead body, was to note,

1. The uncleanness that there is in sin, in dead works, that those that did meddle with them were polluted; yea, the uncleanness incurred in coming near to sinners, all that was in the tent was polluted.

2. How little pleasing to God funeral rites are, they were made unclean by them; for this "bread of mourners" is the bread that they eat at their funerals. The Gentiles mourned for their dead inordinately; and God would have a difference between his people's mourning for the dead and their mourning, because that he would sustain his people's faith, and the hope of resurrection from the dead; whereas had they had liberty to mourn so excessively as the heathens did, the very faith and hope of resurrection from the dead might in time have been almost extinguished; therefore God would have them take heed of that, and consequently ordained in the ceremonial law, that all the mourners for the dead should be unclean for a certain length of time. As for any that indulge their natural affections without restraint in their mourning for the dead, I would apply to them the words of Jer. xxxi. 15, 16, "Thus saith the Lord; A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation, and bitter weeping; Rabel weeping for her children refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not." But now, "Thus saith the Lord; Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears: for thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord; and they shall come again from the land of the enemy." Let us not then weep as others, let us not mourn as others that have no hope; remember that the mourners for the dead under the law were to be unclean for seven days.

3. That God would have cheerfulness in his service, and therefore "the bread of mourners" is accounted polluted. So in Lev. x. 19, when Aaron had an occasion for mourning as great almost as any man ever had, (his children, that were so eminent in office, having been destroyed by such a visible hand of God,) and Moses was angry that the priests had "not eaten the sin-offering," Aaron said to him, "If I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, should it have been accepted in the sight of the Lord?" It would have been but as "the bread of mourners." I that have been struck this day, and am in such a dreadful condition, would God have regarded the sin-offering? God required joy in his services, Deut. xii. 7, 18; and hence that profession in Deut. xxvi. 13 was required, "Then thou shalt say before the Lord thy God, I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine house, and also have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow, according to all thy commandments which thou hast commanded me: I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them." And then, ver. 14, there follows, "I have not eaten thereof in my mourning." They were to profess this to God, that they had not eaten thereof in their mourning; this was to show, that sacrifice offered with a sinking heart, in sorrow, is not pleasing to God; "God loveth a cheerful giver." We must not pine away in our iniquities, sullen dejection of mind, even in sorrow for sin, sours our spirits and services, and makes them unacceptable to God. There is a groaning and a sighing one to another, or rather, against one another, that is condemned in Scripture in James v. 9: the words in your Bibles are, "Grudge not one against another," but in the original, Μη σενά-ζετε κατ' ἀλλήλων; Sigh not, or groan not, one against another. Many in company are of a dull, pensive spirit, sighing and groaning, and making their society burdensome: saith the Holy Ghost, Do not sigh and groan one to another. There is a sullen dejection of soul that is as unpleasant to God as it is to men, it pollutes the heart, and pollutes duty.

But (you will say) is all mourning forbidden, that here the Holy Ghost should say, "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners?" Christ saith, "Blessed are they that mourn;" and the sacrifice of God is "a contrite heart."

True, an evangelical sorrow is accepted, but that has sweetness in it; it is not bitter, it is not a mourning that causes dejection or sullenness, or straitness of spirit, but it enlarges the heart and makes it active for God. Hence, in Ezra ix., although we read before that Ezra was astonished at the sin of the people, yet saith he, at ver. 5, "And at the evening sacrifice I arose up from my heaviness;" when the time came that I should sacrifice unto God, my heaviness did not hinder me in the performance of my holy duties. But how many are there that sink down in their heaviness, and when God calls upon them to any duty, they cannot arise, they are so dejected! Shall God accept such service as theirs? You may please yourselves in it, and think it is humiliation, but there may be much pride in dejection; there is no spirit so proud as the devil, and yet no spirit so dejected. Lead, we know, melts soonest, but it consumes in the melting; and many times the spirit may be ready to sorrow and melt upon every occasion, but the melting is such as consumes its strength and unfits it for the service that God calls for; now those services which you in such a mourning way tender up to God, are not accepted of him. Remember this text, "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners."

Gualter observes on this, God would not accept of the offering of mourners, they were unclean, yet many seek to get their greatest gain from funeral mournings: and he proceeds to inveigh against such; the priests and officers that use to tend upon funerals for gain, he calls vultures and crows, as such flock to dead bodies; and those who support themselves by funerals, sepulchral dogs.

Theophylact also, on these words, "the bread of mourners," observes, That it means the things offered to God gotten by oppression, as thus; Suppose any get an estate by oppression, it may be they are at home and merry, while the poor children or widow is mourning for those morsels that thou art rejoicing in. But the first note most accords with the mind of the Holy Ghost, the mourning that has respect to the funerals, and so especially to the dejection of spirit in holy duties.

"For their bread for their soul shall not come into the house of the Lord." We may understand by the words "their bread for their soul," First, Their oblations generally, not only bread; but their oblations: as Mal. i. 7, "Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar;" bread is there taken generally for all kinds of offerings upon God's altar. So, "their bread for their soul," that is, those offerings which they offered for the very life of their souls.

Obs. 3. It is a sad thing when God rejects a creature who would seek to him for his very life. These people had rejected the voice of the Lord at the temple, and kept others from going thither; they thought sacrifices elsewhere would serve the turn as well; but now they shall be unable to bring any acceptable sacrifices to the house of the Lord, though they should desire to do it for their very souls. Thus many, who in the time of their prosperity neglect and slight the worship of God, and think it of little moment, afterwards, when they see their very lives, their souls, lie at his mercy, then would they fain seek to God, they see they are undone if God be not merciful to them; yet then God rejects them, their offerings then, "their bread for their soul, shall not come into the house of the Lord," that is, will not be accepted of God. When a man is crying for an alms, to be rejected is something; but when a man is crying for his soul, then to be rejected, and by God himself, this is more grievous.

Secondly, The bread that they have to maintain their lives, for so we find the Scripture calls the soul, the life of a man, in Matt. vi. 25: "Is not the life more than meat?" Ὀὐχὶ ἡ ψυχὴ πλεῖον ἔστι τῆς τροφῆς; "Is not the soul more than meat?" It is here the bread for the soul, that is, the very bread necessary to maintain their lives; although they should be willing to offer that to the Lord, it shall not come unto him. Now this is as if the prophet should say to them, You cannot now be brought to offer your superfluity to God, but your condition shall be such, that if you would offer the very bread you have to preserve your lives, God will not accept it. As if a man were so poor that he were ready to starve, and yet for all that would say, Well, though I starve, yet I will offer this I have to live on to God, rather than use it myself; now you would think this a proof of a great deal of devotion; but the case shall now be, that though you should seek God with such earnestness, yet the heart of God shall be so hardened against you that your offerings will not be accepted.

Obs. 4. Those who in time of prosperity are loth to deny their ease, or to lay out any thing of their superfluity for God, may yet be willing to pluck out their very eyes, and tear their very flesh, in indignation for their sin, and God not vouchsafe to regard them. Therefore, by this, learn to seek God while he may be found, and not to stand upon your own terms with God in the day of your prosperity, and to say, I cannot spare this and that for him. If we deny God now what is his due, though we would give to him hereafter that on which our lives depend, yet it shall not be accepted.

Thirdly, That they shall have no more bread than will serve for their present exigencies. They shall have nothing to bring to the house of the Lord; they shall be so put to it when they are in captivity, and shall be kept so strictly, as to have nothing but bread and water, nothing but supplies for present need, they shall be far enough from having any thing to offer to the Lord, to be accepted of him; if they should think of bringing any thing to the house of the Lord, alas! what have they? nothing but a little bread to sustain life.

Obs. 5. To have no estate to offer to the service of God, in the ways of his public worship, is a great affliction.

Ver. 5. What will ye do in the solemn day, and in the day of the feast of the Lord?

There was a time, saith God by the prophet, that you would not suffer any to go up to the feasts; but now you shall be far enough from Jerusalem, or any other place of worship, and the very remembrance of those solemn days, which were days of rejoicing, Numb. x. 10, shall be grievous to you: "What will ye do in the solemn day, and in the day of the feast of the Lord?" Thus some interpret it, they make those feasts to be the feasts in which they should have gone up to Jerusalem; but I take not this to be scope of the Holy Ghost here, but rather thus: by "the solemn day, and feast of the Lord," is meant, the solemn day of God's wrath and vengeance upon them. Now, to confirm this, I shall show, that in Scripture the day of God's wrath is called, first, "The solemn day;" and, secondly, "The day of the feast of the Lord."

First, "The solemn day," is the day of God's wrath. "Thou hast called as in a solemn day my terrors round about, so that in the day of the Lord's anger none escaped nor remained," Lam. ii. 22. "The solemn day" is there "the day of the Lord's anger."

Secondly, The day of God's feast. That time when God doth execute his wrath upon wicked men is the day of a feast to God. Besides other texts, in Rev. xix. 17, 18, it is said, "And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great." It is a solemn day, a day of the execution of God's wrath, wherein God executes wrath publicly, and brings much wrath together. And yet it is termed "the supper," the feast, "of the great God." "Thou hast called as in a solemn day my terrors round about." You know that in the day of a petty sessions there may be some justice administered, but more privately; but in a day of solemn assize, when there is a full gaol delivery, then judgment is done publicly. So God executes justice sometimes on particular men, but yet has he his solemn day to execute his judgments publicly before all, and then the Lord feasts.

The day of execution of God's wrath upon wicked men is a day of feast, for these reasons:

1. Because their feast days were days of slaying sacrifices; so they should now be slain, and God would account their bodies even as sacrifices slain for this great feast of his. In Isa. xxxiv. 6, "The Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea." And in Zeph. i. 7, 8, "Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God: for the day of the Lord is at hand: for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice, he hath bid his guests. And it shall come to pass in the day of the Lord's sacrifice, that I will punish the princes, and the king's children, and all such as are clothed with strange apparel." "He hath bid his guests." Here is the feast of God, and the slaughter of great men, the dishes as it were of sacrifice that God would have at this his feast; the executioners of God's wrath are now his priests, to kill his sacrifices. Soldiers and executioners are turned the priests of God, to kill his sacrifices for this his feast. Hence, in Jer. vi. 4, "Prepare ye war against her," is in the original, קָרַשׁ עֵינֶיהָ מִלְחָמָה sanctify the war against her; and in another scripture, the executioners of God's wrath are called God's "sanctified ones."

2. A day of feasting is a day of rejoicing; this day of the execution of God's wrath upon sinners, especially great sinners that escape men's hands, is a day of rejoicing to God, as in a day of feast. The word אָרַח here translated "feast," signifies also dancing, it is a day wherein the Lord's heart doth, as it were, leap within him because of joy; God rejoices in the execution of his righteous judgments upon them: therefore God's wrath in Scripture is called "wine;" and the wicked are said to wring out and drink the dregs of his cup, Psal. lxxv. 8. When sinners continue impenitent, the Lord is as much delighted in the execution of his justice, as men can be in drinking of wine. So Deut. xxviii. 63, "And it shall come to pass, that as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought." And Ezek. v. 13, "Thus shall mine anger be accomplished, and I will cause my fury to rest upon them, and I will be comforted." This is a strangely fearful expression. Let us, then, my brethren, take heed how we rejoice in sin; God may rejoice in the execution of his judgment upon us due to our sin. Men have their days of joy and mirth in sin; and God has his days of rejoicing in the execution of his wrath. Oh how sad is the condition of a creature when the infinitely merciful God shall rejoice in his ruin! Surely then, if God so rejoice in the execution of his wrath upon wicked men, the saints also may rejoice. "The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked," Psal. lviii. 10; an allusion to the custom of those countries, where they were wont after their travels to wash their feet with cold water, to refresh them: so the blood of the wicked should be refreshment to the righteous. Now this is not an insulting joy over them, but a rejoicing in the honour that God has, and in the good that results to the church by the execution of his vengeance upon such men. So there follows in ver. 11 of the same Psalm, "So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous; verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth." The saints may look upon wicked men when they see them executed, and pity them as men; but still they may rejoice in this, that they see a spectacle before them verifying such scriptures, "Verily there is a reward for the righteous; verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth." And in Psal. lii. 6, "The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him." Mark, though he may rejoice, yet he must have fear mixed with it, "he shall see," and "fear," and "shall laugh." And note, that scripture is spoken of Doeg, a most desperate enemy to God's people, and one who watched every opportunity to do them mischief, and especially to do mischief to David. He it was who came and stirred up Saul against David, and this 52nd Psalm contains a prophecy of his destruction, yet, saith the Spirit of God, "The righteous also shall see, and fear, and laugh;" though they rejoice, yet must they have fear mixed with their joy. If a man can keep his heart spiritual, sanctifying God's name in the beholding of such an object, as that of men eminent in wickedness being brought to execution, he may lawfully, according to the mind of God, feast his eyes on the sight. Such a day is called "the feast of the Lord;" and the Lord is not wont to feast himself, but he calls his saints to feast with him. In Prov. xi. 10, "When it goeth well with the righteous, the city rejoiceth: and when the wicked perish, there is shouting." And that it should be so, accords with God's mind. And therefore, although Christians especially should be far from proudly insulting, even over such men, yet, when God lays an object before them wherein they see the answer of many prayers, and the fruit of the cries of many thousands that were oppressed, yea, of many thousand conscience-oppressed ones; if, I say, at the stroke of God, they, with hearts lifted up to him, give a shout that ascends to the heavens, this pleases God, and the holy angels; it is music fit for "the day of the feast of the Lord."

"Ye," Yea, but saith the Holy Ghost here by the prophet, "What will ye do?" When God makes this his feast in the execution of such as were eminently wicked, the saints may rejoice and bless his name; he bids them then, as it were, to look and see, Is it not good to wait upon me? The saints may do so and bless God; but, "What will ye do in the solemn day, and in the day of the feast of the Lord?" Ye wicked, "what will ye do" in that day? what will become of all your jollity? what will become of all your stoutness and wilfulness, of all your pride, of all your scorning, of all your vain hopes, when this "solemn day" draws nigh, when "the feast of the Lord" comes. In Isa. x. 3, we have a scripture parallel to this, "What will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will ye leave your glory?" You can tell what to do now, you have your lusts and pride to serve, and stand it out stoutly now; but what will you do in the day of visitation, when God's "solemn day," and "the day of the feast of the Lord," shall come. Oh! what can they do but, as the great and mighty men in Rev. vi. 16, 17, call "to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" Those who are now the most bold and presumptuous in their sins, when this "day of the Lord" comes, shall be in the most miserably perplexity, not knowing what to do; unwilling to bear that which is upon them, and unable to avoid it, they will not know what course to take. "What will ye do in the solemn day, and in the day of the feast of the Lord?" For then,

1. All your comforts will be gone, all those things with which your hearts closed, and made as gods.

2. Now God himself will fight against you: "Howl ye; for the day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty," Isa. xiii. 6. It may be you look only upon the agents employed, and flatter yourselves with hopes of escape: your hopes are vain, it is "a destruction from the Almighty," and therefore what can you do?

3. Conscience in that day will terrify you.

4. You shall not know whither to go for help. To the creature? it cannot help you; your vain hopes in the creature have their very heart-strings broken; you thought that you might obtain aid there, but now you see they cannot help.

5. Then the very thoughts of God must needs be terrible to you; and then what will you do?

6. These miseries are but the beginning of sorrows, this "day of the Lord" is but a preparation for another still more solemn. Oh! what will ye do in the day of the Lord? My brethren, though you can discern no blenching in their countenances, yet did you but see the black bosom, and the woeful guilty spirit by sin within, you would know that the soul could not tell what in the world to do in the day of the Lord. It is strange what a man may do even before death, in the presence of men, although his own conscience testifies against him; and though men are ready to be taken with dying men's expressions, yet there is often much deceit in them.

But you will say, What a man professes when he is ready to die, certainly must needs be a truth.

Bishop Latimer has a remarkable story concerning this in one of his sermons. As he was riding he came where an execution was about to take place; when the people saw him they made way, and he went up to speak with the man; but neither he, nor any that were about him, could get him to give glory to God by confessing the crime for which he was to be executed: he persisted that he was not guilty. At length they turned the ladder, and when they thought life extinct, they cut the rope and took him down; but after a little, they saw some motion, and by rubbing and chafing him restored animation, so that he was able to speak, and then he confessed all; that he was guilty of those very things, which, when about to die, he had strenuously denied. Thus it is possible for men in the stoutness of their hearts, even at the last, rather to venture their souls than confess their guilt; and well may they who have ventured their souls so much before upon other things, think that they may make bold with God even at such a time.

But, however, in this "day of the Lord," this day of public calamity, there will be much dejection of spirit in the wicked, they will not know what to do; but the servants of God, who have walked conscientiously before him, will know what to do in such a day. For,

1. They can bless God that ever they knew him, that ever they knew his ways, that ever he put it into their hearts to fear his name.

2. They can exercise their faith upon that word in which the Lord has caused them to trust, they can make it to be the support of their souls and the joy of their hearts, even in such a day.

3. They can sanctify God's name in his righteous judgments, they can see mercy and the love of a Father in the sorest and heaviest afflictions that befall them.

4. They can ease their souls by pouring their forth into the bosom of a gracious and reconciled Father.

5. They can see beyond all these present evils immortality and glory; they can see on the other side, a little beyond these troubles and afflictions, an everlasting joy and day of peace in store for them. A Job can tell what to do, he can profess that though God slay him, yet will he trust in him, Job xiii. 15; xix. 25. A David can tell what to do; "I remembered thy judgments of old, O Lord; and have comforted myself," Psal. cxix. 52. An Habakkuk can tell what to do; "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation," Hab. iii. 17, 18. Thus you see the saints know what to do in such a day; and this is the excellency of grace, that it can never be put so to it in any strait, but it can tell what to do: as David said to Achish, in 1 Sam. xxviii. 2, "Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do;" so the saints, in times of public calamity, should set their graces so on work that all may see what their faith, and humility, and patience, can effect; their actions should say, Surely you shall see now what the servant of the Lord can do. If one should say to any who have made profession of godliness, You spake much of the excellency of grace, but what can you do with it? The answer that such a one may well give is this, When you are utterly at a loss what to do, or which way to turn yourselves, yet, through God's mercy, my way is clear. Grace is able to carry a man through fire and water; this faith of mine, and the grace that I have gotten by the word at which you can scorn, do, through God's mercy, enable my soul to rejoice, yea, to triumph, in tribulations. Can you do that? You can rejoice now when you are in a tavern; but in the day of tribulation, when a dismal day shall come to the world, what will you do? I thank God, I have that which can rejoice my heart even in such a day; and the unwrought operation of the word, and prayer, and the ordinances, can enable me to do that which you cannot do; and surely it is something when a man, in times of tribulation, can so carry himself above all, that men or devils are unable to confound him.

Ver. 6. For, lo, they are gone because of destruction: Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them: the pleasant places for their silver, nettles shall possess them: thorns shall be in their tabernacles.

But do you say to us, What will we do in such a day? Why, we know well enough what to do, we have a way to help us; if all your threatenings should befall us, yet we can have help. It is not likely that all this misery and desolation which you prophesy of will come suddenly; then surely we know what to do, we will go to Egypt, which is not far off; and if we cannot live here in our own country, we will go to Memphis, which is a brave city, and there we may live well enough. Many of us are merchants, and Memphis is as great a place for merchandise as where we live, and we will go thither.

Obs. 1. Carnal hearts have always some devices to provide for themselves. Indeed it is this that takes off the hearts of men from humbling themselves before the Lord, and making their peace with him; they think they may in some manner escape God's strokes, therefore they do not fall down with trembling hearts before the Lord, and cry unto him, "Lord, what wilt thou have us to do?" Were it not for this vain conceit, what humiliation would there be before the Lord, what submission to him, what seeking of him! "Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way; yet saidst thou not, There is no hope: thou hast found the life of thine hand; therefore thou wast not grieved," Isa. lvii. 10. Thou thoughtest thou couldst tell what to do, therefore thou wert not grieved. When God intends mercy to men, he takes them off from their vain hopes, and from all their carnal reasonings. When the hearts of men are brought to this, to cry, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" and as Jehoshaphat, "We know not what to do; but our eyes are up unto thee;" I say, when men's hearts, taken off from all their shifts, come to this, As for any thing in ourselves, we know not what to do, but only our eyes are up unto thee; then is mercy at hand, and never till then. And therefore all the time that you are reasoning in your own imaginations, you are far from mercy.

"For, lo, they are gone because of destruction: Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them." The prophet here speaks as if the thing were done already. Although they were in Samaria, and in the cities of Israel, yet, saith the prophet, "Lo, they are gone." The wrath of God was too hot for them in their own country, and away they are gone, and betaken themselves to Egypt for refuge. Hence,

Obs. 2. Carnal hearts will rather make any thing their refuge in difficulties, than God. My brethren, just these, for all the world, have been, I fear, and it may be yet are, the thoughts of many among us. Ministers of God, say they, denounce judgments, affirming that God has a controversy against us, and we already see some tokens of God's wrath upon us. Well, let the worst come that can, we hope to shift some way or other; we may escape to Holland, or Germany, or France, or New England, and there make shift to live. And these back doors that their eyes are upon, have made them less solicitous about, and less helpful in, the great things that God calls aloud on all to unite in with all their strength, that they may deliver their own land from the heavy wrath that hangs over it. Well, notwithstanding men's thoughts are bent on various expedients, all will prove vain. You think, saith God, to flee some where; you will be disappointed, for "Egypt shall gather you," and "Memphis shall bury you;" my wrath and sore displeasure shall so pursue you. It is a vain thing for men to seek to flee from the presence of God. But certainly, in some cases a man may flee from danger; as when they see that their work is done in one place, and God in his providence opens them a door to another: but if, out of distrust and slavish fear, when God calls for further work in a place, and there is no other door opened by providence, they attempt to break a way for themselves, to make provision for the flesh, they may expect wrath to pursue them wheresoever they go, their safest places may prove to be their graves; "Egypt shall gather them up," as they gather dead bodies; "Memphis shall bury them." Memphis was a principal city in Egypt, now well known to your merchants and mariners by the name of Grand Cairo. It was then called Memphis, as some think, from the name of one of the king of Egypt's daughters. It was very famous for the pyramids and sepulchres of the kings, and stood very commodious for traffic, being situated on the river Nile. It contained a multitude of streets; I am loth to name the number, for indeed it appears incredible; only this is remarkable, that generally all the streets had at each end of them two gates, so that they might be locked up as separate towers, and the inhabitants immured from all communication with the rest of the city. The Holy Ghost may allude to that in saying "Memphis shall bury you." Now, say they, We will go to Memphis, a brave place for traffic, and a very commodious city, a safe city, that has all the streets shut up like so many towers; we will go and find safety there. Yea, but "Memphis shall bury you," saith God.

Obs. 3. It is a great affliction to be forced to leave one's own country, and die in a strange land. The Lord has sent many of his servants into other countries to live among strangers; some there are that have gone of their own accord, yet, through God's mercy, they have not so gone but God has given them liberty to return again; and though their going has been (as you know) much aspersed of late, yet, when more weighty work permits, I make no question but you will be so fully satisfied as to acknowledge a special hand of God even in their going. But the Jews especially accounted it a great misery to die out of their own land. Buxtorf, in his book called The Jewish Synagogue, relates a tradition of the Jews to this effect: they believe that the resurrection of the Jews at the great day shall be at Jerusalem, that wheresoever any of the Jews have died, yet they shall arise at Jerusalem; therefore many of them who lived a great way off, when they began to grow old, would leave their stations, and go as near to Jerusalem as they could: for their tradition adds, that the bodies of those who are interred at a distance shall come through passages of the earth all along to Jerusalem, and that they may prevent the trouble of coming so far under the ground, therefore in old age they go to dwell near Jerusalem. This is the vanity of spirit to which they are left. But though that be a vanity, yet certainly it is an affliction to any to live and die out of their own country: but if it be a great evil to flee from one's own country for fear of destruction, and to have the place they flee to made as their grave, what a far greater evil is it for men, merely out of love of gain, to leave places where before they did, or might, enjoy communion with the saints; to leave the ordinances of God to go to dwell among papists, or heathens, where they cannot have the freedom of God's worship! Now it is just with God, that such as these are should find those places to be labyrinths of miserable perplexity to them, seeing they, out of love to gain, thus venture themselves. Therefore let men take heed how they go, for any private ends, from places where God's worship may be had, to places where they cannot enjoy it.

"The pleasant places for their silver, nettles shall possess them: thorns shall be in their tabernacles." The words מקום נחמד לכתם mean translated "the pleasant places for their silver," מקום נחמד also the desire of their silver. This may refer,

1. To their furniture of silver, that nettles shall grow where are now their "pleasant places for their silver" and household stuff, that they took so much delight in; as in Lam. i. 7, "Jerusalem remembered in the days of her affliction and of her miseries all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old." Mark but these two things from this text, "Jerusalem in the days of her affliction and of her miseries." My brethren, there may be days of affliction, and yet no days of misery; the saints may meet with days of affliction, but yet they may not be days of misery. But when the wicked meet with days of affliction, they meet likewise with days of misery. But the thing for which especially I quote this text is this, Jerusalem then, "in the days of her affliction and of her miseries, remembered all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old." So here it is threatened that nettles shall grow in "the pleasant places for their silver;" then shall they too remember the delights they had there, when all shall be so utterly destroyed.

2. The places where they hid their silver. As you know in times of war men will hide their silver, hoping they may return for it again. But, saith God, you shall go far off from it. I make no question but another generation may find treasures of silver in those countries in the midst of "nettles" and "thorns."

3. To their delightful houses adorned with silver, that were so glorious in their eyes. All now is gone, saith God, and nettles and thorns shall grow up and shall inherit them; so the word ירשת translated "shall possess them" means. You hope to leave these brave houses to your children to inherit; but now, saith God, I have other heirs for your houses, thorns and nettles shall inherit them. It is a lamentable spectacle to see places, where fair buildings have been, overgrown with nettles and thorns; as probably will happen if these wars in divers places of this kingdom continue. Of Troy it has been said, Corn grows where

Troy stood: it was made a ploughed field. But to have nettles grow is worse; for where the plough goes there are inhabitants, but nettles and thorns speak of desolation. Travellers tell us, that in many places of Germany there are nothing now but bushes and nettles where splendid buildings once stood. The Lord deliver us from such a heavy stroke! It is threatened also in Isa. xxxii. 13, "Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers; yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city." Would it not be a sad spectacle to see, in such a city as this, the buildings overthrown, and nettles and thorns growing rank in our fairest streets? Yet sin is thus ruinous. And then in Isa. xxxiv. 13, "Thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof: and it shall be an habitation of dragons, and a court for owls;" the owls shall keep court there. In our courts we know what abundance of sin there was; now the owls shall keep court there instead of those who lived so delicately in them. Sin, my brethren, is a leprosy that infects the very doors of our houses. There is a notable passage in 2 Kings xxv. 9, where it is said of Nebuchadnezzar, that "he burnt the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house burnt he with fire." There is a great deal of sin usually committed in great men's houses; and at this day how have the great men of the land, almost in all places, showed a spirit of malignity against the work of reformation! Oh how just with God is it that their houses should suffer! as is here threatened in my text. Many of them have been spoiled already, and if God give them not hearts speedily to see the evil of their ways, it is very probable that within a few years this text of mine shall be fulfilled upon them all.

It may be Israel thought, though the war did keep them from their houses for a while, nay, though they should be broken down, yet their lands would remain, they could not be alienated. Nay, saith God, flatter not yourselves with thinking to return again to them, for you never shall, for nettles and thorns shall possess them.

Ver. 7. The days of visitation are come, the days of recompence are come; Israel shall know it: the prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad, for the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred.

"The days of visitation are come, the days of recompence."

Obs. 1. God has his set time for the execution of his judgments. "The days of visitation." What good is it to a malefactor that he is let alone a while in the prison, when he knows that such a day of the month must be the day of his execution?

Obs. 2. Our judgments are none other but recompences. "The days of recompence." You may have vain pleas and reasons to justify yourselves; but when God comes to visit you, he will deal with you in a way of recompence proportionable to your deeds. If you would fall down and acknowledge your sins and your need of mercy, then it may be you may find mercy; but if you will stand to justify yourselves, then expect that God, when he comes, will come in a way of recompence.

And now, my brethren, what a desperate venture is this, that men will venture to deal with God in a way of recompence, whereas you may be dealt with in a way of mercy!

You will say, Who are those whom God will deal with in a way of recompence?

Certainly those who will attempt to justify themselves, and say, God knows I do what I can, and this is not so much my fault as others'. Let them expect that God, when he comes to deal with you, will have your pleas fully examined; and if it prove that your pleas will hold, you shall have accordingly; and if your pleas shall be found false, then you shall be dealt withal in a way of justice. Will you venture? dare any of you venture to stand it out on your pleas? If you say you do what you can, you will be tried by it, and you shall be recompensed accordingly; and if it be found indeed that you do what you can, you shall be saved; but if it be found you have not done what you could, you shall perish eternally. Will you venture? Certainly, whatsoever you stand pleading to justify yourselves by, you may expect that God will deal with you accordingly.

"Are come." Twice "are come;" as it is said, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." Israel was about to be recompensed for her transgressions, and would therefore hardly be moved with any apprehension of danger, accordingly you have the "come" twice repeated.

Obs. 3. The apprehension of present evil terrifies the soul. You have a remarkable text for this in Ezek. vii. 6, "An end is come, the end is come;" and then the next words, "it watcheth for thee; behold, it is come." In one little verse three times, "An end is come, the end is come; behold, it is come." And in the verse before, it "is come," and in the verse after, it "is come;" five times God tells them that it "is come." Then saith my text,

"Israel shall know it." Here our observations are,

Obs. 4. Wicked men will not know till they feel; when they are struck, then they will know. The best knowledge of God's displeasure comes from the causes, but if men will not know from thence, they shall know from the effects. In their prosperity they had many false prophets who soothed them with flatteries, so that they were kept from knowledge; but now when they had felt God's stroke, then they should know: but he does not tell you what they should know. They should know these things:

1. What a great God they had to deal with.
2. How vile a thing sin is.
3. The vanity of all their shiftings.
4. The dreadfulness of Divine wrath.
5. The faithfulness of God's prophets.
6. The wisdom of those who dared not do as they did.
7. The folly and vanity of all the false prophets that did before seduce them; they should know that "the prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad." The knowledge we gain of these things in the season of affliction, is knowledge of a different kind to that which we have in the hour of our prosperity. A German divine in an affliction said, In this disease I know what sin is, and how great is God. And yet he was a divine, why did he not know before? No, truly, he never before so knew what sin and God were.

Obs. 5. The knowledge men gain of God in the time of affliction, is a working knowledge. "Israel shall know it." I appeal to yourselves; how many of you, in the time of your sickness and afflictions, have known things after another manner than ever you knew them before?

"The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad."

Obs. 6. In the time of affliction men cry out, that those who seduced them are fools. One who died not long since, near the Exchange, lamented bitterly his having kept company with lewd ministers, who encouraged him in his ways, and hardened him against religion and the saints of God.

We know how men have closed with wicked ministers, and how they have hardened themselves in scorning at religion and puritans, and yet have had cause on their death-beds to cry out against those who deceived them, telling them that they need not be so strict and so pure: take heed now how you be deceived by accounted-spiritual men. In that text of Isaiah they found by experience, that the prophet was but "a fool," and that those who had such glorious spiritual titles were but "mad;" and if you take not heed, some of you hereafter may have abundant reason on your death-beds to cry out against certain ministers amongst us, who persuade you after the same example.

Obs. 7. It is no excuse for men to be led aside by their ministers. The reason that they were given up to such prophets follows:

"For the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred." Thou hadst a wicked and vile heart, which hated God's people and the ways of godliness, and therefore it was just with God to give thee up to those whom now thou seemest to be fools and mad. O, it is just with God, when men's spirits are against his true prophets, to leave them to ministers that undo their souls everlastingly! But if you understand this of the true prophets, the sense will run thus: You shall know in the time of your visitation, whether they were madmen and fools or no: it was from the multitude of your iniquities, and great hatred against the ways and people of God, that you accounted them so; you made many exceptions against them, but the truth is, you saw nothing; but the malignity of your hearts lay at the bottom, you accounted them fools and madmen because of the multitude of your iniquities. Men who are not so able to judge of matters sometimes controverted, yet may have this rule to help them to judge of ministers and their cause:

What is the side men incline most to, as they grow most in godliness? and what side do men incline most to, as they grow more loose and formal in their ways?

If there be parties, and you are not able to judge which is in the truth, some good-men being on one side, and some on the other, take, I say, this rule as a help: What is the side men most incline to, as they grow in godliness? and what side is that which men most cleave to, as they grow most loose and most formal? When men whose multitude of iniquities increases, and according to their increase so they incline to a party, I cannot but suspect its goodness; more especially if, besides, I see that the more conscientious men are, and the more the fear of God prevails in them, and the more strict they grow in their ways, they do the more incline to the other side; I cannot but think that there may be much of God there. And yet it is true, it must be granted, that the greatest heretics that ever were have pretended great holiness. But still, if this opinion were not of God, those that did indeed grow up in true holiness, the more holy they were, the less would they savour that way, though it had never such a pretence of holiness. And if it be but a pretence of holiness, and not true, then certainly the more loose and formal professors grow, the more will they close with that way (if it be but a pretence). So it is here, their hearts were taken off from the true prophets of God, through the multitude of their iniquities; the more loose they became, the more were their hearts taken off from the true prophets of God.

Ver. 8. The watchman of Ephraim was with my God: but the prophet is a snare of a fowler in all his ways, and hatred in the house of his God.

In the former verse God charged, as the cause of much evil in Israel, the false prophets, but yet through the people's sin; for it was through the multitude of their wickedness that they were so guided by those false prophets, whom they followed in the time of their prosperity: but he would have a time wherein they should know their "prophets" were but "fools," and "the spiritual man" but "mad." In this 8th verse the same is continued, "The watchman of Ephraim was with my God: but the prophet is a snare of a fowler in all his ways, and hatred in the house of his God."

"The watchman." Those who profess themselves watchmen, take upon themselves glorious titles. Prophets and ministers of God are called "watchmen:" and these made great profession that they would be as careful to foresee, and labour as much to prevent, danger to the people as any others could; they professed to be very useful to the people, and to be full of zeal for God, but they were "a snare;" and this title of theirs, and this their profession, proved to be a snare to the people.

Obs. 1. Many vile things are hidden under fair and glorious titles, as many excellent things are disgraced by base and ignominious ones. You know what a deal of evil was lately covered over amongst us, by names and titles, as the clergy and the church; and likewise what abundance of good was defamed by epithets such as conventicles, puritans, and the like; and now the titles of things may be changed, but yet remain as dangerous as before. Let people ever take heed and examine what lies under them, and let them not be led away, one way or other, either by fair and specious, or by ignominious, titles; ordinarily, people that do not examine things thoroughly are taken with names and titles. But somewhat of these heretofore.

"Of Ephraim." The people of Israel, the ten tribes, had no mind to the true watchmen, because they threatened hard things against them; they were willing to close with those who preached things more pleasing, so that they might set one against another, and obtain quiet; although the truth was, that these watchmen of their choice were a most grievous snare to them.

Thus many who have carnal hearts, and are not able to bear the evincing and threatening power of the word in the mouths of true, faithful watchmen, seek to help themselves by the opinions and judgments of other ministers, concluding they are safe when they have the countenance of some that are learned, especially if also they have a repute for godliness, for so certainly the watchmen here spoken of had; and then they can set the opinions and judgments of one against those of the other; they think they are safe now and may be quiet; yet this proves a dangerous snare.

Obs. 2. When there is clear conviction of a truth, it is a dangerous thing, out of an unwillingness to yield to it, to seek the opinions of others. I confess, when a man out of love to the truth, that he may be confirmed therein, or that he might know fully what the truth is, for him to seek help from others is a good thing; but if out of distaste to a truth, if because the heart is weary of it, and would fain not have it to be true, because it may bring some trouble, if upon that ground he goes to seek the opinions of others, hoping to find them contrary, that so he may have something to quiet his mind; this is a great snare to the souls of those who have been guilty of it.

“Of Ephraim.” Ephraim had watchmen as well as Judah. Hence,

Obs. 3. No cause so ill but will have some that have the repute of being wise, learned, and judicious men to maintain it.

“Was with my God.” They professed more than ordinary judgment in the knowledge of God’s mind, and acquaintance with his ways, and yet they were snares to the people. Whence,

Obs. 4. Every man in his erroneous opinion pretends to be with God, and for God; without this indeed he could never be a snare to those who profess themselves to be the people of God.

Obs. 5. It is a great grief to those who have the true knowledge of God, and interest in him, to see others who maintain that which is evil, yet pretend that they know God, and are zealous for his glory. “With my God.” The prophet seems to speak in grief and trouble; These watchmen of Ephraim, those among the ten tribes, they will pretend to be for God, to be for “my God.”

Vatablus further observes on this, Ephraim made to himself a watchman, and would hear him together with his God; like madmen, would attend to man as to God, and so would worship idols and God too, they would seem to respect the true as well as the false prophet, which is mere madness.

Obs. 6. They would not wholly depart from God, and yet they would maintain false worship, they would mingle both together. “The watchman of Ephraim was with my God.”

“But the prophet is a snare of a fowler in all his ways.” That is, he catches poor simple, deluded souls, as a fowler catches the bird, laying baits pleasing to it, and hiding the snare that presently comes upon it: so, saith he, the watchmen of Ephraim do. They come to the people with very fair and specious pretences, which they labour to instil into them, and do not discover what inferences they intend afterwards to make, or what their designs are; for the present they come to them, and desire them to yield to things that seem to be as fair as any thing in the world, and with much pretence that it is only for their own advantage, and that they intend them nothing but good: now, when they have brought them to yield to such things, they know that some inferences may be drawn from them, that will make them to yield to other things, which, had they been presented to them at first, they would never have agreed to; but the inferences lay hidden as the snare does, and they, not foreseeing the consequences, are brought to yield to such things, that afterward they cannot tell how in the world to avoid further compliance. Thus “the prophet is a snare of a fowler,” who lays things which seem at first very plausible, intending however afterwards to bring the people to yield to other things, that would be abhorred if presented to them at the first.

My brethren, as long as you live take heed of such snares of watchmen. God would not have you submit to any thing, nor do any thing, but out of faith.

Obs. 7. You must have ground from Scripture, and especially in the matters of God’s worship, before you yield or submit to any thing; for otherwise, though things may seem to be very fair at first, yet they may prove to be but snares before you are aware.

“And hatred in the house of his God.” Some understand this of the false prophets, thus:

1. The watchman was an object of God’s hatred, in God’s house. Wicked officers in the church, bringing in their superstitions, and importuning and urging the delusions of their own hearts, seeking to comply with the times to preserve themselves in credit and esteem, and in the enjoyment of their livings, these are an object of God’s hatred; there are none whom God hates more than such kind of watchmen in his house. And at this day we see how God has cast shame and rebuke into the faces of such. They are hated by way of exclamation: ô rem odiosam et abominandam domo Dei! Oh hideous and abominable thing, that such watchmen should be pertaining to the sanctuary!

2. Watchmen are hated, by way of efficiency; that is, they cause hatred, they cause my people to hate the true prophets, and the servants of God that would worship God in his own way. And, indeed, no men in the world are such causes of the hatred of the faithful ministers and saints of God, as wicked watchmen. Who were the men that stirred up hatred and persecution against the saints and people of God in former times, but evil and wicked ministers?

I find some who understand this, and not without some probability, of the true prophets, and then the sense would be:

1. You accounted the prophets of the Lord, who declared the mind of the Lord faithfully to you, to be no other than fools and madmen; but you shall know that they were no fools, that they were no madmen. So I find in 2 Kings ix. 11, “Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee?” saith the captain of Jehu; and in 2 Chron. xxvi. 16, “They mocked the messengers of God.” So Ezekiel’s friends and acquaintance are thought to have bound him, as thinking him mad, chap. iii. 25. And so we read in the Gospel of Christ’s kinsfolk, that they laid hands upon him; and Paul, in 2 Cor. v. 13, saith, “Whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God.” The true prophets were scorned and contemned as spiritual madmen; but, saith the Lord, They shall know in the time of their visitation whether they were so or no: you shall find by your woful experience, that these were no such madmen as you thought them to be. In affliction men have more honourable esteem of the true prophets of God than at other times; those that were jeered at before, as so wise, so precise and holy, and of such tender consciences, are often, when the hand of God is upon men, sent for by their very mockers, in preference to any other men, to pray for them. So we read of the people of Antioch, though many of them voted for the banishment of Chrysostom, yet, being terrified by an earthquake, they immediately sent for him again.

2. Still, take it as concerning the true prophets, and it means, even Ephraim wanted not watchmen to show them their danger in departing from God; though the ten tribes did decline from God, yet such was God’s goodness to them, that they had watchmen that were faithful even among them.

“Was with my God.” That is, they had watchmen who acted as having to deal with God and not with men, as sent from God, as pleading for God; and hence they could not be taken off from their object, either by threats or flattery; they might have had preference as well as others, and needed not have been the butt of the hatred and malice of men no more than others, if they would have done as others did. No, but they were “with my God,” the fear of the great God was upon their spirits, and they dared not do as others did; they resolved to approve themselves faithful to God; come of it what would, they went on in their way, they left their means and estates, their liberties, and their lives, all to God; it was for God to provide for them, it was for them to look to it, that they continued faithful to God. And thus the sense runs, If these were true prophets that were among the ten tribes, then it is as an aggravation of Ephraim's sins, that though they had many false prophets, yet they had watchmen who did continue faithful with God.

Obs. 8. The people of God rejoice when they see faithful ministers keep close to God. "Was with my God." When they see them, not set upon their own designs, not temporizing, but making it their bent and aim to magnify God, and to bring men to the knowledge of him, oh! they rejoice in this. So the prophet speaks with a joy, (if it be spoken of the true watchmen,) Oh! blessed be God that, notwithstanding all the defection of the times and consequent corruptions, yet there were watchmen among Ephraim that were faithful with God, men who had no other designs but to set up God, and were willing to deny themselves in any thing, so be it they might bring souls to their Master.

And certainly it greatly rejoices the saints to see ministers of God pure and upright in this respect, to have no designs of their own, but to set up the honour of God among the people. But even these prophets, faithful as they were, yet were accounted no other than "a snare of a fowler," and even "hatred in the house of their God;" they are accused of being politic, subtle men, who have cunning plots and devices to set up their own way, they are as bad as Jesuits: such aspersions as these the devil casts upon them, and gets many good people to drink in these calumnies, and those who otherwise were accounted godly, and of great use in the house of their God, are now become even "hatred in the house of their God;" the devil has so prevailed to bespatter and asperse them with stories and reports, that even though most faithful with their God, yet are they now looked upon as the troublers of the times, as snares to people; yea, as "hatred in the house of their God," and that even by many who otherwise have good affections: by no way does the devil drive on his own designs more efficaciously than by thus making the most painful, faithful, zealous ministers of God become even "hatred in the house of their God," even among good people that are professors of godliness. Thus Jer. xviii. 22, "They have digged a pit to take me, and hid snares for my feet." And Isa. xxix. 21, They "lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate."

"Hatred in the house of his God."

Understanding this still of the true prophets, the sense proceeds thus: Yet he continues in the house of his God, he makes this his encouragement, that he is in the house of his God, in God's work, though he be hated for it. God's ministers should not be offended though they find the like dealings among the professors of religion now, but should still continue with all faithfulness in the work and employment which God sets them about, and then all aspersions will wipe off in time, they will vanish and come to nothing.

Calvin interprets this somewhat differently from what has been said, in a middle way between both, and if not according to the full scope, yet it comes very near; he takes the former part of the verse to relate to the true, the latter part to the false prophets, as if Hosea would speak thus: There was a time that Ephraim had watchmen with my God, and with his people, they had Elisha, and Elijah, but now the prophet is "a snare of a fowler," and "hatred," "in the house of" "my God." This is a woeful change in places where people have had watchmen that were godly, wise, zealous, faithful with God, but now these are gone, many of them banished, and many of them with God in heaven, and they have now others among them, as a just judgment of God, who are a snare to them, and hatred in the house of God; these who have succeeded those blessed servants of God, are like the storms and tempests, which often succeed fair and sunshiny weather. If we understand it thus, for the true prophets in the former part of the verse, and the false prophets in the latter, then there is a special emphasis in the change of the phrase "my God" and "his God," "the watchman with my God," and "hatred in the house of his God;" the God of the true watchmen and the God of the false prophets are not the same; those who pretend to worship God, and yet worship him in a false way, worship in reality another, and not the same God; no marvel then though there is hatred between true and false prophets; they must needs have hatred one against another who have divers gods. "My God," and "his God," and yet both pretended to be for the same God.

Yea, but, saith the prophet here, whatsoever their pretences are, they teach not people the worship of God in a right way, God is not their God. Who they are that have most interest in God, let God himself judge; not by giving the one more of the favour of the times than the other, for the false prophets had more of this now; but, 1. By the clearer manifestation of the Spirit of God in men. 2. By the witness of men's consciences when they are going to appear before God. And, 3. By what Christ shall own at his appearing. Oh that I could tell how to sweeten these times! God, by providence, has cast me upon this scripture, and I know not how to give you the mind of God regarding it but by being thus plain.

I shall only add one observation made by Arias Montanus on the words, "hatred in the house of his God." He saith the phrase is taken from such men as live in great families, and who have a great deal of power with their lords, (being continually at their tables and bed-side,) and abuse it to cause hatred, and at length to undo others and themselves. So were these prophets in the house of God; they seemed to have much intimacy with God in his house; but the truth is, they abuse this their intimacy to the injury of others, and their own eventual ruin.

Ver. 9. They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah: therefore he will remember their iniquity, he will visit their sins.

"They have deeply corrupted themselves." העֲרִיבֵי שִׁמְרֵי Their wickedness has deeply rooted itself, so the word signifies; there is little hope to prevail with them, labour as you may, their superstitious and idolatrous ways have gotten such deep root in their hearts. Sin, and especially that sin of superstition, so deeply roots itself in the hearts of men, if it be let alone but a little time, that there is no getting of it out.

And indeed there is little hope of our ever seeing the reformation now in hand attain its full beauty and perfection, until even God himself, either by some extraordinary manifestation overthrow the prevalent superstitions, or at least by his own hand remove those from amongst us that have such superstitions and idolatrous principles rooted in them. We wonder that men cannot be weaned from such ways. Oh, they are deeply rooted, and it is not an easy matter to eradicate them. It is a blessed thing to take sin betimes; and you that are young, who have not other wickedness, and especially superstition, rooted in you, it is likely God will make use of you to bring this reformation to perfection; it may be, when others are dead and gone, you shall see what God intended in all these stirs that have been among us. By experience we have found superstition is deep rooted indeed, and that the love of it still abides in the heart; that though men be content not to practise the superstitions they did before, because now the times do not favour them, yet they cannot be brought to leave them off as sinful, but as inconvenient.

You have but few men, I had almost said but few ministers, especially of those who were at all forward in superstitions, and did not before account them a burden, who, though they do leave them off at this time, can be brought to acknowledge them to be sinful, and so to charge themselves with sinning against God in them. They are content to relinquish them as things inconvenient, and perhaps burdensome to other men; but the leaving them off thus shows, if the times should favour them again, there is a principle retained in their hearts, so that they would be in readiness to submit to them again, and to practise them as formerly; this bitter root of superstition abides in their hearts: that is the meaning of this phrase, they are deeply rooted, that is, their superstition and false worship are deeply rooted in their hearts. Well, let their superstition be rooted as deep as it will, yet, as Christ saith in Matt. xv. 13, "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted out," God will either root thee out, or the superstition of thy heart out of thee. And seeing the false worshippers have superstition so rooted in their hearts, oh how should the true worshippers of God have the truth rooted in their hearts, never to be eradicated! So St. Paul in Col. ii. 7, "Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving."

"As in the days of Gibeah."

This must cost us a little further time to open fully. Rooted in their evil ways, "as in the days of Gibeah." What has this reference to? The Scripture speaks of the city Gibeah as notable for two things: First, As being the city of Saul, and consequently some apply this thus: that as heretofore they cast off my government when they chose Saul to be king over them, so now they reject me again.

Secondly, As the scene of the circumstances narrated in the 19th and 20th chapters of Judges. You find there the story of a Levite, whose concubine went from him and played the harlot. He went to fetch her again, and as he was returning home would not be persuaded by his servant to go to Jebus, because its inhabitants were "not of the children of Israel," but he would "pass over to Gibeah" of Benjamin, there expecting certain protection; yet he found it quite otherwise, the people of that city were abominably wicked, and they came in the night, and "beset the house round about, and beat at the door," and desired the person who had received him into his house to bring him forth, that they might "know him;" but they obtaining him not, get his concubine, and "abuse her all the night until the morning," when she is found dead at the door of the house. Upon which horrid thing, being committed in a city belonging to the people of God, this Levite takes a knife and cuts his concubine (being dead) "into twelve pieces, and sent her into all the coast of Israel," and bade them think upon it, and consider what should be done. "And it was so, that all that saw it said, There was no such deed done, nor seen, from the day that the children of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt." Wherefore all the people, "from Dan even to Beersheba," assembled to consult what should be done, and they resolve to go against the city of Gibeah. In the 11th verse of the 20th chapter the text saith, "All the men of Israel were gathered against the city, knit together as one man;" and in the 13th verse they require the delinquents to be delivered up to them. "But the children of Benjamin would not hearken to the voice of their brethren the children of Israel;" but gathered themselves together, even "twenty and six thousand men that drew sword," to side with "the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men." Who would have thought that among the people of God there could have been raised an army to defend such "children of Belial?" But the people of Israel were resolved such notorious wickedness should not go unpunished; and they "arose, and asked counsel of God, and said, Which of us shall go up first to the battle against the children of Benjamin?" And the Lord directs Judah to go up first; but the Benjamites the first day got the victory, and slew two and twenty thousand men. Upon that the children of Israel went up to God again, and wept before the Lord, and God gave them leave to go again, and they went, and the Benjamites came out again and slew eighteen thousand more. These wicked malignants got the victory two days, and slew forty thousand of the children of Israel, that went not only by God's leave, but by his desire; for two days together they fell before those wicked and vile wretches, but they knew that their cause could not but be good, and they were resolved they would go to God again, and humble their souls before him, and fast, and pray; and then they overthrew those wicked Benjamites, and men of Gibeah. And whereas twenty-six thousand came out against Israel, twenty and five thousand and an hundred men were slain by the sword, and the city of Gibeah burnt with fire: so God executed wrath upon them at length. This is the story to which the prophet refers, and many things might be observed from it in reference to the purposes for which the prophet quotes it: in his time they stood out to defend wicked ones, as the children of Benjamin had done. And it concerns us fully now, our wars are undertaken on almost the very same grounds; for what is the main cause of them but to fetch delinquents to the execution of justice? And who would have thought that delinquents, under whose burdens we groaned in former times, and whom we accounted the great scourge of the nation, should find an army to defend them? Perhaps sometimes we may be overcome by them, and they may for a while prevail; but let us fast before God, and humble ourselves more thoroughly, and certainly God will also in our times own his own cause.

Obs. 1. When men to whom we seek for protection deal falsely with us, their wickedness is great in the eyes of God. This Levite passed over from Jebus to Gibeah, thinking to have had protection there, and yet these deal vilely towards him. Does any man put himself under any of you for protection, and do you abuse the confidence reposed in you? This surely is an abominable thing in the eyes of God.

Obs. 2. We may meet with worse usage from those who profess religion, than from those who profess it not. It may be, if they had gone to Jebus they would not have met with such ill usage as they did at Gibeah. Sometimes they who make profession of religion are guilty of more ill usage to the servants of God than others that are profane and ungodly, yea, or of another religion. Oh! let men take heed how they behave themselves toward their brethren, that they may not have cause to say, Lord, were we among the Indians, or among some moderate papists, or under some of the prelates again, we should not find such hard usage as we do from some of our brethren who profess thy name and seek reformation: it were, indeed, a sad thing (I say) if ever there should be cause for the servants of God to make such moans to Heaven, and send up such cries to God.

Obs. 3. God may regard those as unholy and unclean who make a fair show of religion. Whereas Israel thought themselves holy and devout for God in the multitude of the sacrifices and devout services which they performed, yet God looks upon them as filthy and wicked, even as the Sodomites of Gibeah. "They have deeply corrupted themselves," saith God, "as in the days of Gibeah;" notwithstanding your fair shows and your sacrifices, yet you are looked upon as thus vile and abominable before God. God will not be put off with words of reformation and outward service, for men may have such base ends in it, and may mix so much of themselves to corrupt the right way of God and to keep out his right service, under pretext of serving him more truly, that this may make them and their performances most odious to God. Such is the clear and plain note from thence. We do not read of such abominable filthiness of body as was in the days of Gibeah, but because of the corruptions of his worship, the Lord considered that they had deeply corrupted themselves, as "in the days of Gibeah."

Obs. 4. For men to stand up impudently and boldly in the defence of wickedness committed is abominable in the eyes of God. Thus they did "in the days of Gibeah." And thus you are ready to do; not only to commit horrible wickedness and sins, but to stand in 's defence. There is this desperate stoutness of spirit and hardness of heart in many men, that when they are once entered into the ways of sin, rather than they would yield and submit, they will venture the undoing of themselves: the men of Gibeah did so, and they were undone accordingly.

Obs. 5. To join with others in defence of evil is worse than to stand out ourselves in evil. Yet how many have we of the gentry and nobility of the kingdom, that do not only seek to defend themselves, but join with the greatest malignants amongst us, with those that are the greatest causes of evil, and were like to have been the utter undoing of us all! To defend them from justice they will venture the ruin of their own families; whereas, had the malignants been given up, they might have saved their estates, families, and all. Oh that ever God should leave men in such horrible wickedness as this! This is just as it was "in the days of Gibeah."

Obs. 6. Those who defend wickedness may for a while prosper; even the men of Gibeah and the Benjamites prospered.

Obs. 7. The defenders of wickedness must at last perish. Twenty-five thousand and a hundred of these twenty-six thousand perished, with all the men out of Gibeah, and the city was burnt. So let men stand out as stubbornly and stoutly as they will, and say, What care we? we will lose our lives and estates rather than submit and yield: well, you may lose all at length; you may perhaps prevail for a time; but let not men's hearts be hardened by that, nor let any of the other side be discouraged, for certainly those that stand desperately out in defending wickedness shall perish at last: so did the Gibeonites.

Obs. 8. The sins of the forefathers are an aggravation of the children's sins. Yea, but what is this to us? might the prophet's auditors say. Certainly, it is much to you, for these sins of your forefathers "in the days of Gibeah" aggravate your present sins. And yet, such is the delusion of many poor people, that they excuse the present sins by the sins of former times. As thus; suppose ministers or others should complain of the sinfulness of the times, and declaim against it, you will hear some say, Why do they keep such a stir about the wickedness of the times? were they not as bad heretofore as they are now? Oh wretched delusion! The great aggravation of thy guilt is, that thou livest in the sins of thy forefathers: thou art, it seems, the child of wicked parents, and how just had it been with God to have cut thee off presently for their sins! and dost thou say, that thy wickedness is no other than the wickedness of thy forefathers? Certainly, if the times be as evil as they were heretofore, they are thereby worse, for the evil of our forefathers is an aggravation of our present evils, if we continue in them. As the treachery of a parent would be no excuse for the treachery of a child, no excuse for him to say, My father was a traitor: so for me to excuse the sins of the present times by the sins of former times, and say, they were as bad formerly as now, is reasoning of just a similar kind; but this is not the reasoning of the Spirit of God, he aggravates the sins of Israel in Hosea's time with the sins that were in the days of Gibeah. God may let men alone in their wickedness for a long time, until they grow to the full height of their iniquities, and then he visits them. When the sins of the Amorites were full, then he visited them.

"Therefore he will remember their iniquity, he will visit their sins." This phrase, of God's remembering iniquity and visiting sin, we had before, therefore we pass it over, and proceed to the 10th verse.

Ver. 10. I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness; I saw your fathers as the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time: but they went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame; and their abominations were according as they loved.

The scope of the Holy Ghost in this, is to upbraid the ten tribes for their wretched, ungrateful dealing with God; their sin is aggravated by God's love towards them and their forefathers.

"I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness; I saw your fathers as the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time." That is, as when a traveller in the parched wilderness, dry, weary, and faint, comes to a place in which unexpectedly he finds clusters of grapes, from whence he has abundance of cooling refreshment; oh how grateful must this be to such a man! Such delight, saith God, had I in your forefathers. He names grapes and figs here, because they are the most delightful of all kinds of fruit to weary travellers. Now if it be so, that God has such delight in his people in their wilderness state, how should God be their delight when they are in the wilderness! Oh! let God in his ordinances be to us in our troubles and afflictions, as grapes to the weary traveller, and "as the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time." Surely, if God will account us so delightful to himself, there is great reason that we should in return delight in him. Some of God's servants have been forced to flee into the wilderness, and though they have not had such outward refreshments as we have had who have sat here under our own vines and fig trees, yet God has made them to find grapes in the wilderness; they have sat under God's protection and ordinance, as a man in the wilderness would sit under a vine of grapes, and refresh himself with them.

Obs. 1. We should lay to heart God's love to our fathers, and seek to continue it to ourselves. "I saw your fathers as the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time." It is a sad thing to look upon degenerate children, who have had fathers in whom God took delight. Your fathers were as clusters of grapes, that did refresh the very soul of God: as it is said of wine, that it doth cheer both God and man; so the grace and holiness of your forefathers, oh how refreshing were they to the heart of God! But what are you, what delight can God take in your sour and bitter fruits, in your corrupt and degenerate spirits? Oh! it is a comfortable thing when a child is able to say, as Exod. xv. 2, "My God," and "my father's God." God was my father's God, and delighted in my father, and, blessed be his name, he is my God, and I hope he has some delight in me. You who are the children of fathers in whom God delighted like as in "grapes in the wilderness," it is a mighty engagement for you to look to yourselves, that your hearts and lives be not corrupt, but that, following the steps of your fathers, God may delight likewise in you. But further,

"As the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time."

There is a great deal of elegance in these expressions. The fig tree bears twice in the year, and here it is, "the first-ripe at the first time." Their fathers were as delightful as grapes in the wilderness, and as the figs, "the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time."

Now we know that we prize the first-ripe fruits, many will give almost any price for them. We say, when they at first appear, that they are ladies' meat, or longing meat: now the Lord is pleased to condescend to express his love to his people, and to speak of it, as the love of a loving woman to fruits when they first come into season; as a woman has a longing desire after such things, so, saith God, my soul has longed after you to do you good, I have taken as much pleasure in you as ever woman could take when her longing desires were being most delicately gratified. This is the meaning of the Holy Ghost here, and many expressions of similar import occur in Scripture; as in Jer. xii. 7, God's saints are called "the dearly beloved of God's soul;" and in the 10th verse, "my pleasant portion;" in Exod. xix. 5, the "peculiar treasure" of God; and here, "grapes in the wilderness," and "the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time." This is God's exceeding goodness to us, though we be sapless in ourselves, and have nothing in us to afford delight, yet, out of his own free grace, God is willing to express himself thus to his people. Oh what delight should we have in God, who takes such delight in his servants! These expressions may well lead us to meditate also on the delight which God has in the young, who begin to give themselves up betimes to him; the Lord loves "the first-fruits," and "the first-ripe" of things; so Micah vii. 1, "Woe is me! for I am as when they have gathered the summer fruits, as the grape-gleanings of the vintage: there is no cluster to eat: my soul desired the first-ripe fruit." So, by way of allusion at least, we may apply it to God. God is a longer; for what? for the first-ripe fruits, the first of your years: graciousness, when it first buds out in youth, oh how pleasing is it to God! In Exod. xxiii. 19, God would have "the first of the first-fruits," he would not only have the first-fruits, but "the first of the first." God insists much on the first still. And in Lev. ii. 14, you read, that the Lord is so eager to have the first-fruits, that he will not stay till they be ripe, he will have the "green ears of corn dried by the fire." As many women will not stay until the thing be ripe in the course of nature, but if they can have it ripened by any art, they will have it so; so, saith God, my longing after the first of things is so, that I will not stay till they be fully ripe, but the corn, though it be green ears, if they may be dried by the fire, I will have them. So in Cant. ii. 12, 13, "The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig tree putteth forth her green figs." And in chap. vi. 11, "I went down into the garden of nuts to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded." Oh, the Lord looks up and down in congregations, that are as the gardens of God, to see such. And so in chap. vii. 12, "Let us get up early to the vineyards; let us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth: there will I give thee my loves." O let us go and see whether the tender grape appear, or the pomegranate bud. "There will I give thee my loves." Where God sees grace beginning and budding in young ones, there God manifests himself; "there will I give thee my loves." O, begin to be godly betimes; you satisfy the heart of your longing God, as the first-fruits satisfy the longing woman.

"But," saith God, "they went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame." What! a but come after all this? God is manifesting his delight in them as in "grapes in the wilderness," and "the first-ripe in the fig tree at her first time;" and yet, behold, a but follows.

Obs. 2. The greatness of God's love is not enough to engage carnal hearts. This is an evil and a sore thing to see. There was a time that God accepted of this people and delighted much in them, but now they are departed. Oh how wont are people to degenerate! a few years since, how forward and zealous were many for God, and for reformation; but within a while they grew cold, and dead, and formal, and began to leave off all their good beginnings, and decline from God and from his truth.

"They went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame." God complains of this people as a husband of an adulteress: Though I delighted in her and loved her, though she had all the content she could desire, yet she forsakes me, and gives up herself to impurity and uncleanness. I beseech you observe, nothing affects an ingenuous heart more than the waste of love; such had rather ill bestow money than love. So, certainly, it goes to the heart of God that his love should be ill bestowed upon people. Notwithstanding, saith God here, all my love to their forefathers, whereby they might have drawn an argument that they would have blessings on themselves, if they continued in the ways of their forefathers, yet they forsook me; "they went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame."

Obs. 3. The more shameful any thing is, the more abominable is it to forsake God on its account. It were an abominable thing to forsake God for the gaining of heaven and earth, if they could so be gained; but to forsake God for a Baal-peor, God takes this ill indeed.

Obs. 4. There is no evil so base or shameful to which a carnal heart is not ready to cleave, to the forsaking of the blessed and glorious God. Many, indeed, are so set on base things, that they are content to part with all the good that there is in God and Jesus Christ, if they may but obtain them, yea, content for their sake to undo themselves to all eternity.

Obs. 5. So to leave God, as to give up ourselves to baseness and wickedness, is most abominable. To be overtaken with sin is vile, but to give up ourselves to wickedness is truly abominable: and yet of this many are guilty. At first, perhaps, sin is fair-mannered, and saith, Do but dally with me at first; but after a while the soul insensibly abandons itself to the most wretched sinful courses: this is the case of many an apostate, they had some comfort before in God and in Christ, but having tampered with sin until they have become habituated to it, they have lost all their spiritual comforts; and now saith this desperate soul, I cannot have comfort in God and Christ, and therefore I will have it in the satisfying of my lusts. O my brethren, what a shame is this, to be guilty, so far as thou art able, of shamming even God himself and Jesus Christ! So in Heb. vi. 6, apostates are said to put Jesus Christ "to an open shame:" an apostate, that leaves the ways of God and separates himself to his lusts, puts the Lord Jesus Christ to an open shame. Oh how should God's people separate themselves for the Lord, and be wholly his, seeing idolaters separate themselves to their idols! Let them look upon themselves as a people separated for the Lord.

"And their abominations were according as they loved." This may be understood,

1. As they loved, so they were guided; they were not guided by the word, nor by any Divine rule, nor by right reason, but "according as they loved," they followed what they had a mind to, never regarding what the mind of God was.

Obs. 6. The judgment is soon gone when the heart is taken. Ordinarily people love not that way to which the rule guides them, but that to which their affections tend. It is very sinful for men to be carried on merely by the violence of their affections, and especially this is evil in the matters of God's worship; in it we may not do things as we like, that is, because we think such things are very fair, and there appears to us no hurt in them. We must examine whether we have warrant out of the word for them; we must not follow our inclinations, but bend them to that rule.

2. They were abominable as they loved; they were turned into the very likeness of that which they loved. And indeed our affections render us in some measure like that on which they are fixed. The understanding turns the object into a likeness to it, but the heart is turned into the likeness of its object.

Austin, Ep. 52, ad Maced., expresses himself in a remarkable manner respecting this. Such is every man as his love is. Does a man love the earth? he is earth. Does a man love God? what shall I say, he shall be even God too. And indeed the Scripture saith we are partakers of the Divine nature. Oh what care then had we need exercise about the object on which we set our affections! Dost thou love a thing base and filthy? then thy soul is base and filthy too. Dost thou love the glorious and blessed God? then thy soul is made like to God. Choose, therefore, good objects for thy love; love the Lord, and love his holy ways; love things that are excellent and glorious, and by the loving of these thy heart will have an excellence and glory put upon it; but if thou lovest that which is drossy and filthy, thy heart will become degenerate and base likewise. Man's soul is like the chameleon, changed into the colour of the object it looks upon.

3. That which is here translated in the concrete sense, I find may be as well rendered in the abstract. They were abominable as their love; and so it is understood by some: that is, they were abominable as the idols were which they loved, and their idols were called love, in the abstract; as a man calls his wife his love, so they called their idols their love; and they were abominable as their love, that is, as abominable as Baal-peor was, so abominable were they. So the psalmist, "They that make idols are like unto them."

4. I think the especial scope of the Holy Ghost in these words has reference to what you read in Numb. xxv. 1. You find there the people of Israel, by the wicked counsel of Balaam, were enticed to commit uncleanness with the daughters of Moab, and by them drawn to the worship of their idols. So their love to the daughters of Moab drew them to serve Moab's idols.

"Their abominations were according as they loved;" that is, setting their love upon these wicked women, they were enticed by them first to uncleanness, and then to idolatry. Solomon's wives also drew him to idolatry.

Obs. 8. It is usual for people to adopt the religion of those whom they love: if their hearts be taken with any, it is usual for them to adopt their religion; according to their kindred, according to their friends, according to the stock that they marry into, so is their religion. You will find many that have been forward in the cause of religion, grow cold because they have married into families without the savour of religion, and now they conform to their wives' dispositions; according to what they love, so their religion either burns hotter or grows cooler: it was thus usually said of Ahab for his wickedness, Such a one was his wife; and so of another king, The daughter of Ahab was his wife: their religion was according as they loved. And, my brethren, if those who are in a false way can draw whom they love to it, then certainly those in the truth should also labour to draw those whom they love to embrace the truth. Wicked wives will draw their husbands to that which they love, to idolatry, to false worship; popish wives have drawn more husbands to their popery, than godly wives (I fear) have drawn husbands to the truth: why should not gracious wives labour to win their husbands to good by love, as well as wicked wives to entice them to wickedness by their love? And, indeed, those who would gain others to good must first gain their love. The women of Moab gained the love of the people of Israel, and then prevailed on them to serve their gods. So, if you would benefit any, first labour to gain their love: let godly wives act so towards their ungodly husbands. How would you gain them? Not, surely, by reproachful speeches, but (though they be never so evil) walk lovingly towards them, that they may be convinced that your souls truly love them, and so by your loving carriage gain their love; that is the way to win them to your God. So we are told of many of the women in the primitive times that had heathenish husbands, that by their gracious, loving carriage they won them over to the truth. And so ministers, if they would win people to God, must walk before them in such a gracious, holy, loving manner, that they may gain their love, and then they will win their souls: if there be wrangling between minister and people, there is little hope of any good. And so with your neighbours and friends, if you would win them to God, gain first their love yourselves, for it is a mighty motive in matters of religion for people to do as they love.

Ver. 11. As for Ephraim, their glory shall fly away like a bird, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception.

"As for Ephraim." A pathetic expression; he makes a stop at Ephraim; O Ephraim! how sad, how much to be lamented, is thy condition!

"Their glory." By it is meant, all their pomp, riches, strength, prosperity, but especially their numerous progeny, in which they did so much glory. Ephraim, the ten tribes, prospered very much, and were far more numerous than Judah. This scripture refers to their state especially in the time of Jeroboam II., of which you read, 2 Kings xiv. Ephraim then prospered very much.

Obs. 1. A numerous progeny is accounted a glory. "Their glory." So in Prov. xvii. 6. "Children's children are the crown of old men;" the Seventy render it καύχημα, the glory of old men. Parents are wont to glory and pride themselves much in their children; for,

1. By their children they themselves are multiplied.

2. What excellency soever there is in the child, they look upon it as their own, and on themselves as the cause of it: men and women love themselves much, and because children are, as it were, portions of themselves, therefore they glory in them.

3. They have thereby hope of continuation from generation to generation; and in this hope they glory.

But let parents learn to give God the glory of their children, and to bring them up for him, and then they may rejoice in them indeed, as a great mercy of God. In Prov. x. 1, "A wise son maketh a glad father; but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother." Why is a wise son said to be the gladness of the father? does not a mother rejoice in a wise son too? And why is a foolish son said to be the sorrow of the mother? does not the father sorrow and mourn for a foolish son? The Holy Ghost, not without reason, expresses himself thus, "A wise son maketh a glad father," and that for two reasons.

1. The father usually has a more strict hand over his son, to educate him to wisdom, than the mother. Mothers, too often, by weak indulgence, spoil their children; they cannot endure that they should suffer any hardship, and hence their children prove foolish and fit for nothing, and great sorrows to them.

2. A wise son is fit for employment abroad in the world, and therefore rejoices the heart of his father; but a foolish son is fit for nothing but to remain at home with his mother, and as he grows up, to grow stout and stubborn against her. If, then, children be a glory to their parents, they should labour to be such, that they may indeed be a glory and not a shame to them. Many, instead of being a glory to their parents, are a great shame to them, as Augustus Cæsar, who had three daughters that were wicked, used to call them his three imposthumes, and his three cankers upon his body. And so children, that should be the glory of their parents, and the glory of a family, too often shame and disgrace both. And if you expect that your children should be a glory to you, you must not be a shame to them: sometimes children are a shame to their parents, and sometimes parents are a shame to their children.

"Shall fly away like bird." This admits of two expositions.

1. Men glory in their outward pomp and prosperity, and their children, but all these "shall fly away like a bird." That is, 1. Suddenly. 2. Swiftly. 3. Irrecoverably.

A bird, enaged perhaps many months, on some opportunity gets out, and is gone in a moment, suddenly, so swiftly too that you cannot follow her, and irrecoverably, that you can never take her. All outward glory is uncertain: in Prov. xxiii. 5, it is asked, "Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven;" fly away like a bird, and that bird the eagle, that flies so swiftly that there is no getting her again. How many lately in Ireland, and in our own land, have had estates in the evening, and all has been gone away swiftly like a bird before the morning! they have been rich in the morning, and have been even beggars in the evening. Let us take our hearts off from glorying in all outward excellencies, and seek that glory which is abiding, constant, and everlasting. We should look upon all outward comforts now as upon the wing; if ever we had cause to do so, at this day we have especial cause. We cannot now reason thus, We have enjoyed such prosperity thus long, and therefore we shall have a continuance of it. No, all outward comforts fly away like the bird: that comes in one moment which before came not in many years. In Jer. ix. 23, 24, "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord." Your delights are in other vain things, in estates, in bravery; but in these things I delight, saith the Lord God, and if you will glory, do you glory in those things in which I myself delight: your glory in the midst of your prosperity flies from you like a bird; but the Lord, the glory of his own people, in the midst of their adversities flies to them like a bird. I say, the glory of the wicked in the midst of their prosperity flies from them, but the Lord God, who is the glory of the saints, flies to them in their afflictions. Thus in Isa. xxxi. 5, "As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem; defending also he will deliver it; and passing over he will preserve it." "As birds flying;" it is a metaphor taken from the bird when she sees the young ones in any danger of the kite, she flies with speed to save them: As birds flying, so will I defend Jerusalem. Your glory departs in the midst of your prosperity, but the glory of the saints flies to them in their adversity.

II. The glory of their posterity "shall fly away like a bird;" that is, the Lord will cut off their numerous posterity, their young men, in whose number they gloried, so that there shall be few left among them.

Obs. 2. Godliness brings blessings swiftly, and wickedness causes them to depart as swiftly. The blessing of God upon Abraham's seed came very swiftly after it began to come; and now God threatens it shall go away as swiftly. As you may find it if you observe the story of the increase of the seed of Abraham, from the time of their going into Egypt. But threescore and ten souls went down into Egypt; but when they came out of Egypt, but two hundred and fifteen years afterwards, (for the four hundred and thirty years are to be reckoned from the promise to Abraham until their coming out of Egypt, and it is clear that there were two hundred and fifteen years from the promise to their going down into Egypt,) there came up, from twenty years old and upwards, men of war, six hundred thousand, three thousand, five hundred and fifty; besides the Levites, who, with the males from a month old and upwards, were twenty and two thousand, besides the women and all the other children: and this was in the time of their bondage. Thus the glory of Abraham's seed came very swiftly. And now it shall fly away like a bird, they shall decrease more than they did increase.

"From the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception." God's curse follows the wicked close; sometimes in their birth; sometimes in the womb; sometimes hindering the conception. You see how God has us at advantage, how he has us in his hand at every turn; he might, if he had pleased, have smitten us in our conception; if he had spared us there, stifled us in the womb; if spared there, made us stick in the birth.

Wherefore learn we to acknowledge God's mercy in the general, that he is patient, and long-suffering, and gracious unto us: let us consider the several passages of his mercy, to bless God not only for our general preservation, but that he preserved us in the very conception, preserved us in our mother's womb, and then in the birth; and then in the cradle, in our childhood, in our youth, in our middle age, and in our old age; for we lie at his mercy at every point of time.

"Their glory shall fly away like a bird, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception:" of some I will hinder the conception, some others in the womb shall die, others shall perish in their birth, and so at every time my curse shall follow them; "from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception."

Ver. 12. Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them, that there shall not be a man left: yea, woe also to them when I depart from them!

"Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them." It is here threatened that a fearful judgment from God will pursue and overtake them, though they escape that curse under which others suffer.

Obs. 1. Many think all is well when they have escaped judgments that have come on others; but know, thy preservation from such may be thy reservation to greater judgments that God intends for thee afterwards.

Obs. 2. The loss of children in hopeful maturity is a loss indeed. It is a judgment to be deprived of children in the womb, in the birth; but when you have endured much pain in bearing and bringing forth your children, much labour and trouble in bringing them up, when many a thoughtful care has been expended on their education, and they now begin hopefully to arrive almost at men's and women's estate, and you think to have comfort in them, for God then to take them away, is indeed very sad to parents, such a bereavement bows down their hearts exceedingly: yet such things as these have befallen many heretofore; and parents, though the condition must be acknowledged very sad, yet must they in such a case submit to God's hand. Perhaps some of you have in the breeding of your children endured much, and through many difficulties they have been brought till they have grown up almost to men's and women's estates; and perhaps they have been obedient and hopeful, and you trusted to have had them as the staff of your age; and yet God suddenly has made them fly away like a bird; perhaps by drowning, or some other untimely end, the Lord has suddenly torn them from you. You will say, My condition is more than ordinarily sad. Therefore God calls you to sanctify his name in a more than ordinary degree, to exercise grace more than ordinary; and the exercise of grace in such an extraordinary stroke of God upon you may be as great a comfort and blessing to you as the enjoyment of your child would have been. If a tender mother, after breeding and bringing up a child with care, and pain, and labour, should have him taken away by some untimely death, (as you call it,) she would think her condition the saddest of any living. Perhaps some such may be here, or know some of their friends who have had such a hand of God upon them; be but convinced of this one thing, which I know you cannot deny, that the exercise of grace suitable to this work of God that is now upon thee, or against thee, take it as thou wilt, I say, the exercise of thy grace suitable to this work of God, is a greater good to thee than the life of thy child could have been; it could never have done thee that good which the exercise of grace may do thee in this condition, when it is suitable to this stroke of God upon thee. And this indeed is the only way to make up any losses, be it a child, be it a husband, or the dearest friend, a wife, or thy estate, yet the exercise of thy grace is better than the enjoyment of them all.

"Yet will I bereave them, that there shall not be a man left." יְשִׁיבֵנִי יְשִׁיבֵנִי יְשִׁיבֵנִי yet will I bereave them, that they shall not men. Sometimes God lets children live, and yet they never come to be men; he strikes them in their understandings, that they are bereaved of them so far that they never attain the stature of men's minds. I remember it is reported of Sir Thomas More, that his wife was mightily desirous of a boy, (that was her word,) and she had one that proved a fool; whereupon her husband said to her, You were never quiet till you had a boy, and now you have one that will be all his life a boy.

"I will bereave them, that there shall not be a man left." I rather think the meaning of these words is, I will take them away, that they shall not live to be men, strong men of war. You boasted yourselves that you had so many of your children that were such valiant men of war before, but I will bereave you of them, saith the Lord.

"Yea, woe also to them when I depart from them!" "Yea, woe also to them!" there is added the "yea," or surely, "also," as if the Holy Ghost should say, Why do I threaten this or the other evil? the great evil of all, the rise of all evils, is God's forsaking them. "Yea, woe also to them when I depart from them!"

God departs from a people, or a particular soul, when he withdraws his goodness and mercy from them; and the reason why wicked men for a time enjoy good things is, because God's time is not yet come to depart from them; but when God's time is come to depart from them, then all vanishes suddenly: as the light continues so long as the sun is in the firmament, but as soon as ever it is gone, the darkness of the night begins to approach.

Obs. 3. It is God in the creature that upholds it. The general presence of God with his creature maintains its strength, and health, and comforts; and upon God's departing, all vanishes and comes to nothing. Thou hast thy prosperity now, and thou thinkest thou mayst enjoy it still; but how canst thou tell but God may suddenly depart? and then all is gone. The alteration of man's condition is not only from natural causes, but has reference to a higher source, God's departing. Carnal hearts think themselves safe if they do not see how natural causes shall work their ruin; yea, but know that thy prosperity, or thy adversity, depends not upon natural causes, but upon a higher cause; though thou hast the confluence of all natural causes working for thee, yet, if God pleases to withdraw himself, thou art a lost creature.

And so it is with a kingdom. When God is pleased to depart from a kingdom, he takes away wisdom from the wise, gives them up to their own perverse counsels, blinds them that they cannot foresee their danger nor discern means of help, so that they adopt measures as if they intended to destroy themselves. If God do but leave them, whatsoever their wisdom was before, all their endeavours shall be blasted and come to nothing. And in this especially we should sanctify and acknowledge God's name, acknowledge our immediate dependence upon him for all the outward good we enjoy, whatsoever second causes may concur to aid us.

Wicked men will not observe his hand in their discomforts; they cry out of this and the other as the cause of their evil, but it is God's departing from them that is the great thing they should lay to heart. Particular evils must not be compared with this of God's departing. Whatsoever our condition be, yet, if God be not departing, we are well enough; Though in the fire, though in the water, I will be with thee, saith the Lord. Mark the ground of the confidence of the saints in the time of affliction: in Psal. xlvii., (Luther's Psalm it is called, that is, a Psalm that Luther was wont to call to his friends to sing, when he heard of any danger, or of any sad occurrence,) "Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. The heathen may rage, and the kingdoms be removed:" yet all shall not trouble us. Why, what is the ground? "The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." These same words are repeated twice in the Psalm, "The Lord of hosts is with us." he is not departed; "the God of Jacob is our refuge:" therefore no great matter what men can do unto us. But if one be in misery and God departed, oh how dreadful is his condition! It was a dreadful speech of Saul, "I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me," 1 Sam. xxviii. 15. Oh, when the Philistines make war upon a people, when there are enemies at our gates, and our consciences tell us that God is departed from us, this is a sad condition. It was a woeful speech of Saul, God is now departed when I have most need of him. Woe to men then! For,

1. The root of all our evils is very deep when God is departed. They lie not in this or that particular, we might make shift to get over them, the spirit of a man might sustain his infirmity; but the root of the evil lies in the departing of God; and what can the creature do when God is departed? As the king of Israel, when the woman said, "Help, my lord, O king," replied, "If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I help thee?" And as all creatures say, If God be departed, we cannot help, nay, the very devil cannot help if God be gone: so in 1 Sam. xxviii. 16, when Saul was sore distressed and would raise up Samuel, the devil, who came in the likeness of the prophet, said, "Wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee?" No creatures in the world, nor devils, can do good when God is departed; then evil is indeed altogether evil. An evil may have much good in it, and God may sanctify it for abundance of blessings to his people, so long as he continues with them; but if he be gone, then the evil is only evil: and if God be gone all protection is gone, and therefore thou art liable to evils of every kind. And however for the present the things that remain seem to be good, yet the blessing is gone if God be not with thee. And this evil that is upon thee is no other but the forerunner of eternal evil; and the creature certainly then must needs sink when God is thus departed. Oh! if it be so woeful a thing for God to depart from a people here in this world, in regard of the withdrawing of outward things and mercies from them, what is it then for the Lord to depart for ever from the soul! What an alteration does the departing of the sun make! Take a delightful sunshine summer's day, and how beautiful is it! Now compare that with a winter's dark, dismal night; what makes the difference between these two? The presence of the sun in the one, and its absence from the other. This is but the presence, or the departing, of one of God's creatures. Oh! if that makes such a difference in the world, what must the presence or the departing of the infinite God do to the soul! Let the saints who enjoy God's presence prize it, and pray as the prophet did, "Lord, leave us not."

How vain is the heart of man, that will depart from God! If thou depart from him, he departs from thee too; and woe to thee, whatsoever thou hast, when the Lord is departed from thee!

The Lord departs from individuals, as well as from kingdoms and nations, and woe to them also! When God departs from particular persons, he withdraws his common gifts and graces, and the comforts that they were wont to have; he curses all means for their good; and gives them up to temptations: those are the three special things that God does in departing from a soul. 1. He withdraws the common gifts and graces which it had, and the consequent comforts. 2. He curses the means that would do them good. And, 3. He gives them up to the strength and power of temptation.

You will perhaps say, Many a soul that desires further presence of God, may from these observations fear that God is departed.

Now though God may, doubtless, in some degree withdraw himself even from his saints, so that they may fear that he is departed from them; yet one evidence remains to thee, let thy condition be never so sad, if thou art a saint; God does not so depart from his saints, but he leaves behind some lustre, some little glimmering of himself, which serves to show the soul which way God is gone, and to draw the heart of a poor sinner after him, and make it restless and inquiet till it come into his presence again. When God departs from hypocrites, he departs so that he leaves nothing behind him, not so much as to make them follow on after him, and so they turn away and seek to make up the loss of God in something else; but a saint of God, that has God beginning to depart in any degree, will not turn aside to seek to make up the loss of God in any thing else, but he still has so much of God as strongly to carry out his heart after him, so that he looks, and sighs, and groans, and cries after the Lord. David, in Psal. cxix. 8, shows us that God was in some degree departed from him, in his own view at least; but mark this expression, "I will keep thy statutes: O forsake me not utterly." O Lord, methinks I feel that thou art going, I feel that I have not those comforts and those stirrings of thy Spirit which I was wont to have, but, O Lord, yet for all this, "I will keep thy statutes;" I am resolved, though I should never have further comforts from thee, yet, Lord, "I will keep thy statutes;" do with me what thou wilt, I will do what I can to honour thee; "O forsake me not utterly." So long as thy heart can close with this text, and say, as David, Lord, "I will keep thy statutes;" though I feel not thy presence with me as I was wont to do, yet, Lord, I will do what I can to honour thee; though I be in a sad condition, and thou seemest to leave me, yet, Lord, "I will keep thy statutes; O forsake me not utterly;" so long, I say, as thou canst adopt David's words as thine own, it is an evidence God is not so departed as he is wont to depart from hypocrites, and wicked and ungodly men. And if it be so woeful a thing when God departs, truly then when God is about departing we had need cry mightily to him, both for kingdoms and particular souls. When a malefactor stands before the judge, and is crying for mercy, if the judge prepare to leave the bench, he lifts up his voice, and shrieks out indeed, Good my lord, have mercy! for he sees, if the judge once quit the bench, he is a lost man: so when we see God going, we should indeed be earnest in our pleadings. Many footsteps of God's departing from us there have been, and are, and yet still God leaves a light behind; yea, blessed be God, he is not so departed, but that he has left so much of himself as that we may know where to find him.

Ver. 13. Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus, is planted in a pleasant place: but Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer.

"Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus, is planted in a pleasant place." What! God departed? Woe to us when God departs from us! Why, but Ephraim might bless himself in his prosperous condition, Ephraim might say, Why do you speak of God's departing? We are in a good condition, it is but your melancholy fears that make you speak so; we were never stronger, never had better fortifications, were never more prosperous, than at present. This, as I have told you, has reference to the time of Jeroboam II., 2 Kings xiv. The prophet grants it, that they were in a prosperous estate; Ephraim was like Tyrus, "planted in a pleasant place." Tyrus was a rich city, and of exceeding strength, situated much like (as it is reported) to that famous city in Italy, Venice, on a rock in the sea, about seven hundred paces from the land. Tyre was a place of exceeding strength. Quintus Curtius, lib. 4. de Reb. gestis Alexandri., saith, that Alexander in his conquest had more to do to conquer Tyrus than all Asia besides, it was such a mighty and strong place. Pliny, lib. 5. cap. 19, saith, the compass of it was nineteen miles. It was the general mart of almost all the world, and was consequently very full of people: to this especially the prophet refers, when he saith, Ephraim was like Tyrus; because Ephraim did so glory in his numerous progeny, and Tyrus was a mighty populous place. Pliny saith, three other ancient cities came out of it, as Leptis Utica, and that great Carthage, which was but a spring out of this root; that Carthage, which was so famous a city, that it contended for a long time with Rome for the monarchy and dominion of the whole world. Yea, and Gades, divided, as it was, from the rest of the earth, was peopled by a Tyrian colony. But we need not so much recur to these authors, for in Ezek. xxvii. 3, 4, you have the city Tyrus described as a most brave, rich, and glorious city: "O thou that art situate at the entry of the sea, which art a merchant of the people for many isles, Thus saith the Lord God; O Tyrus, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty. Thy borders are in the midst of the seas, thy builders have perfected thy beauty." And then, ver. 33, "When thy wares went forth out of the sea, thou filledst many people; thou didst enrich the kings of the earth with the multitude of thy riches and of thy merchandise." Now saith the Lord here, Ephraim is thus; she said to herself, that she was so prosperous, and strong, and rich every way, she was like to Tyrus; I grant it, saith the prophet, and I have seen it so, Ephraim is thus, even when God is departing from her. Hence,

Obs. 1. God may depart from a kingdom, or an individual, in the time of their greatest prosperity. When thou art nearest eternal misery, thou mayst be at the very summit of outward prosperity. Physicians say that the uttermost degree of health in the body, is the next step to sickness: it is indeed true, that the highest degree of outward prosperity is often but the forerunner of ruin. Oh! let us learn never to trust in our prosperity, but always to walk with fear and trembling before the Lord: never let us think that we are safe and well because we have outward things as we desire; we may have them so, and yet that very night the word may come, "This night shall thy soul be required of thee," as you know was the case with the rich man in the Gospel; when he had his barns full, and was deliberating what to do, the Lord said, "Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee." And Nebuchadnezzar, at the very time when he was glorying in the magnificent palace he had made, the word came forth against him. But further, it should especially teach us that,

Obs. 2. As we should trust in no outward prosperity, so, not in any fortifications, however strong. Tyrus was an invincible place, as it seems, yet God could pull it down. Nor are we to trust in the multitude of soldiers. This example is as pointed as any to teach men to trust in no external advantages whatsoever.

Calvin renders this somewhat differently, and truly not without some probability: I saw Ephraim, that thou wert planted in a pleasant place, as in Tyrus; and interprets it thus, Thou art a plant like to the plants that were in Tyrus. Indeed the word ביתר translated "pleasant place," signifies also a building, because they are wont to build in the most delightful places; it likewise signifies a secure place of habitation. Now (saith he) Tyrus was upon a rock, and therefore they had little ground for orchards, or gardens, or plants, but only such as were made by art, and with a great deal of cost: and as men, when they are striving with nature, if they mean to do any thing at all, will do it to purpose, and fetch out the most curious plants, and bestow a great deal of cost to cover them from the coldness of the winter; so Ephraim was compared to such a plant, that is, God was at a great deal of charge for it, and very careful he was to preserve it. As before God compared his love to his people to a longing woman, that longed for the first-ripe fruits; so here God compares his respect to his people to the care expended on a tender plant in a garden made on unlikely ground, at abundant cost and charge; look, what care would be taken to preserve such plant in covering and keeping it from the frost, such was my care towards Ephraim, howsoever they have served me. Thus, saith Calvin, to aggravate their sins, God shows his care of them. But, adds the text, for all this, though my care hath been thus over them, yet they "shall bring forth their children to the murderer."

Obs. 3. God never shows so much respect to any, but that upon their forsaking him wrath follows. Yet, after all this, "Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer;" as if their children had been born for no other end but to satisfy the mouth of the sword, to be objects of the fury of the murderer.

"But Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer." Sometimes indeed in war men are led forth even by the treachery, or the spite at least, of their commanders, only that they might be a prey to the murderers. If any wicked officers in an army have a spite against a man, or any particular company of men, ordinarily this is most against the godly men in the army. They will set them upon the most desperate service on purpose that they might be cut off, or at least fall into the hand of the murderer. As David, for his own ends in another way, would set Uriah in the forefront, and would have others withdraw from him, on purpose that he might fall by the enemy. Many children have been brought forth to the murderers even in this way.

Obs. 4. The curse of God goes forward from the parents to the children. It is for the sin of the parents that the children are to be brought forth to the murderers. And especially the curse rests not upon idolaters, but goes on to their children. There are two branches in this observation:

1. The curse of God stays not upon the parents, but goes towards the children; Deut. xxviii. 18, "Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body;" and especially to the children of idolaters. So Psal. cxxxvii. 8, 9, "O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be, that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." And Isa. xiii. 18, "Their bows also shall dash the young men to pieces; and they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb; their eye shall not spare children." So in the second commandment, the Lord there threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, of them that hate him, to the third and fourth generation.

You will say, Why should children suffer for their parents' sins?

You will kill young vipers and snakes though they never have stung; so, God sees guilt enough in the children of wicked men and of idolaters, so that in justice he may destroy them; but he the rather destroys them because they be the children of such. When a man commits treason he deserves death for his own crime, but if the king hear that his father and grandfather were traitors, he shall die the rather because of them. So it is true, the children of the godly have sin and guilt in them, as well as the children of wicked men; but the children of wicked men, having guilt of their own, and so liable to God's justice, God will take the advantage the rather to do justice on them because of their parents' wickedness and ungodliness; and this is righteous enough with God.

And the children of idolaters, above all, shall not be spared, especially those that live to many years, because no sin is so much strengthened by appealing to the example of forefathers as superstition and idolatry. Why should we be wiser than our forefathers? What is the argument for our superstitious vanities, but our forefathers did thus? And therefore is it observable, that in none of the commandments does God threaten judgments upon the children but in the second commandment, and that because no commandment is so broken from the example and plea of forefathers as the second; and therefore let the children of idolaters and false worshippers look to it that they repent from the sins of their forefathers. Instead of pleading for the sins of your forefathers, you should fall down and humble your souls on account of them; or otherwise that is the very reason that God will punish the sins of the forefathers upon the children, because their fathers did worship God in a false way, and they will do so too.

2. This is a special fruit of God's curse upon children, that they shall be brought forth to the murderer. In times of war, if you make not your peace with God, it is just with God that things should be ordered so that your children should be brought forth to the murderers. O you tender-hearted mothers, who are loth that the wind should blow upon your children, look upon them and pity them; how can you endure to see their blood gushed out? how can you endure to see your little ones dashed in the streets, or upon the pikes of the soldiers? If your hearts cannot endure this, seek to make your peace with God, to deliver yourselves and your children from a curse which has befallen many. We know not what these wars may bring forth: what they have done in Ireland we have heard much of, how the parents have seen their children brought forth to the murderers; and though it is true, in many cities and places where the enemy has come, they have not generally, at least, broken forth into such abominable cruelties as this; but who knows what a summer or two may bring forth? for, certainly, where war continues it drives on with more and more rage.

You will say then, Oh! let us make peace upon any terms.

No, let it rather be your care to make your peace with God; that is your way to deliver your children from being brought forth to the murderers; for if it be a false peace, it may but hasten the evils you apprehend. The curse of God is especially severe in this, when it shall come to pass before their very parents' eyes, for so the prophet speaks, as if they should be brought forth even before them. Many of the heathens have very pathetic expressions about the sad condition of parents, when their children are slain before their eyes: as that of Priam over his son Polites, slain by Pyrrhus, May the gods, if there be any divinity in heaven which regards such things, retribute you for this! Thou hast even sprinkled the blood of the child upon the father's face. He was not able to refrain, though he saw himself ready to die next, but cries to the very heavens to revenge it. And how sad is the story of the emperor Mauritius, whose sons, and wife, and daughters, were brought and slain before his very eyes! If your children did but understand this text that I am now opening, they would even look upon you and cry with tears in their eyes, O father! mother! repent, repent, and seek God for yourselves and for us; repent and make up your peace with God, that we may not be brought forth to the murderers.

But if this be so great an evil, for parents to have their children to be brought forth to the murderers here, how great an evil then is it for parents to bring forth children to be fuel for God's wrath for all eternity, to be firebrands for the everlasting burnings. You then that are parents, look upon your children and soften your hearts by such thoughts as these: Oh! what a sad thing would it be that such a babe that came out of my womb should be a firebrand for God's wrath to burn upon to all eternity! Oh! how had I need pray, and bring up my children in the fear of God, lest I should be such an unhappy father, as out of my loins not only to bring forth a child to the murderers, but for the devils in hell! But let not this discourage you that are godly to venture your children in lawful wars; in such a cause if you be willing to sacrifice your children to God, and they be brought forth even to death, yet are they brought forth to martyrdom, rather than to the murderer. Thou shouldst rather rejoice that thou hast a child to bring forth in such a cause, than be overpressed with sorrow that the life of thy child has been taken away by the murderer; and some of your children, though with the loss of their own lives, have been a means to keep you and us all from the hand of the murderer, to keep the city and the kingdom from being overrun with tyranny, idolatry, and all kinds of profaneness; and the good which has been thus effected, may compensate the lives of your children.

Rev. xii. 11, 12, "And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them." When parents shall be willing to give up their children in the cause of God, even children, having made up their peace with God, shall be willing to sacrifice themselves in his cause; and then when they "love not their lives unto the death," there shall be joy in heaven, and they shall overcome in dying, even as Jesus Christ overcame in his death. I remember I have read of Xenophon, that when sacrificing to some idol god, he wore a crown upon his head, and there came news to him, that his child was dead, and he presently pulled his crown from off his head in token of sorrow; but then asking how he died, answer was made, that he died in the wars; whereupon he called for his crown again. So perhaps some of you have lost your children, nature cannot but work; yea, but then ask how they lost their lives; they lost them valiantly, in a work that did as much concern the glory of God as ever any war did, and seeing they died so, rather bless God than be so sorrowful that they fell into the hand of murderers.

Ver. 14. Give them, O Lord: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarriage womb and dry breasts.

Upon the declaration that they shall be brought forth to the murderer's hand, then follows, "Give them, O Lord: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarriage womb and dry breasts."

Some think this was an imprecation by a spirit of prophecy, as if the holy prophet had his heart filled with the wrath of God: "Give them, O Lord: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarriage womb and dry breasts."

But rather, according to most interpreters, I think this expression is one of commiseration; that is, foreseeing the lamentable condition that the ten tribes should be in ere long, the prophet pities their condition, and would fain come in and pray for them, and begins, "Give them, O Lord:" and then he stops, as if he should say, but, O Lord, what shall I say for them? "Give them;" but, Lord, I know not what to ask for them, I am at a stand when I consider what they are, and their many previous mercies, what warnings they have had, how hardened they are in their sin, and how thy word is gone forth; but yet, "Give them, O Lord:" shall I say, Lord, give them deliverance, give them peace, give them prosperity still? Lord, I dare not, that I cannot ask; all means have been used to bring them unto thee, and yet they stand out against thee: thou knowest they are dear to me, they are of my flesh, and I should be glad that they might be saved; but thy glory is dearer to me than they are, and therefore for that I cannot pray: but yet, "Give them, O Lord: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarriage womb and dry breasts." What! shall the enemies be let out upon them? shall they and their children be made a prey to the murderer? Lord, rather let no more be born of them, rather let those children that otherwise should have been born, and might have lived in their own land, Lord God, let them not be born rather than come to so great misery. So he doth not pray for "a miscarriage womb and dry breasts" absolutely, but comparatively.

Obs. 1. Men's sins often make God's ministers and saints at a loss what to say in prayer. Truly, though there has been a mighty spirit of prayer through God's mercy in the kingdom, yet, considering that since God has shown himself willing to deliver us, and Christ has been coming even upon his white horse, in peace, to take the kingdom to himself, as great a spirit of malignity has appeared against Christ and his saints as ever was in the kingdom, it puts many of the ministers and saints of God to a nonplus in their prayers, and straitens their very hearts in the day of their fasting; when they are to seek God, that the Lord would give forth mercy, they know not what to say. The Lord knows that our present condition is more unfit for mercy than at the very first day. Thus a nation, thus particular people, may put the servants of God to a stand in their prayers, and straiten their hearts. Oh! had people gone on in the embracing of reformation as they seemed to do at the first, how enlarged would the hearts of the saints have been in prayer! O Lord! give England mercy, give England deliverance!

Obs. 2. The fruitfulness and barrenness of the womb are from God. "Give them; give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts." This is from God. In Gen. xxx. 1, 2, when Rachel cried for children, "Give me children, or else I die," the text saith, that "Jacob's anger was kindled against Rachel; and he said, Am I in God's stead?" The learned Paulus Phagius saith that the Hebrews have this tradition, that there are four keys in God's hand, which he gives not into the hand of any angel:

1. The key of the rain. "The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season," Deut. xxviii. 12.

2. The key of food. "The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing," Psal. cxlv. 15, 16.

3. The key of the grave. "Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves," Ezek. xxxvii. 12.

4. The key of the womb, Gen. xxx. 1, 2.

These four keys God keeps in his own hand, and therefore God's providence is to be observed in this, and there ought to be a submission to his hand in it.

Obs. 3. Sin may bring such evil times upon a people that those who live in them had better not been born, or died before such times arrived. "Give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts." Children that should live to endure all the miseries of those times that are coming, had been better not have been born, or have died long before such times, saith the prophet. We must take heed of wishing this upon every little affliction that befalls us. Some, if their children do but anger them, wish they had never been born, or that they had died many years ago; but this is wicked forwardness against God himself; those that are so ready to wish their children had not been born, are the least sensible of the sin that causes the affliction upon which they wish such things.

"Give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts." There may be many reasons for this prayer of the prophet; as,

1. Such miserable havoc might be made that parents might even wish that they never had any children.

2. Cruel tyranny might be exercised on their souls and bodies.

3. They might be drawn from God by false religion, and so be in a condition worse than if they had not been born.

Hence parents to whom God denies children, or from whom he takes them away, should quiet themselves in God's arrangement, especially in such times as these. It may be God has taken away your children to deliver them from greater evils; as in the house of Jeroboam there was but one child that had any good in it, and saith God, "That child shall die; because in him there is found some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel," 1 Kings xiv. 12, 13. So that God takes away many that he loves, and lets others live for whom he has not so much regard.

Yes, some may say, if I were sure that their souls were safe, I would be content, though God took them away.

That is true indeed; if your children were saved, what loss were it for them to be taken away and received to heaven, and there to live for ever with Christ, not to sin or sorrow more? But, however, you may satisfy yourselves by these reflections:

1. That they are under an indefinite promise, though not a universal.

2. Suppose they should not be saved, yet it were better they should be taken away than live to sin more against God. They might have lived to have done a great deal of mischief in the world, if they were such as God did not intend to save; therefore quiet thyself. God sees further than thou dost, when he either denies thee children, or takes them away, in such times as these.

3. Times when public evils are threatened are good times to die in. If it be better not to be born in evil times, then certainly it is no great evil to die in evil times. Good men are taken away from the evil to come. As, if a woman's breast were to be lanced, or cut off, would not the tender father take the children out of the room in the mean time? Who knows but God may have the breast of his church, our mother, to be even cut off for a time, and now oblige her to suffer heavier things than ever she has done. If God then take away his tender children, that will not be able to bear such a sight as that, what great evil is it? So we read, when God's glory was to pass by, he puts Moses into the hole of a rock; and truly the graves of the saints are but as the holes of the rock till the glory of God's justice passes by a people.

4. If the sins of parents may be the cause of such things to children, that they had better never been born, let parents take heed that they lay not up such wrath for an inheritance for their children; their children afterwards may even wish they never had been born of such parents. If parents be careless in the education of their children, and bring them not up in the fear of the Lord, hereafter their children may curse the time that ever they were born of them, and say, Oh that I rather had been of the offspring of vipers, or the generation of dragons, than that I had come of such parents! Oh that my mother had had a miscarrying womb, or that she never had had breasts to give me suck! Certainly, this will one day be the voice of many children against their parents. Look to it, that there be not a father nor mother in this place that may give cause to their children thus to wish they had never been born of such parents. And, certainly, if the enduring of sorrows and misery in this world may put them into such a condition, what then will sin, and being the authors of miseries to others, do? Those children that are abominable and wicked in their lives, and are causes of mischief to others, with how much cause may it be said, that it had been better their mother's womb had miscarried: as it was said of Judas, that it had been better that he had never been born. And so it may be said of many at this day. What abundance of evil are they the cause of to others! What woeful disturbances, distractions, and calamities do some men bring upon a nation! Had it not been better that their mothers' wombs had miscarried, and their breasts had not given them suck?

And again, What horrible wickedness are some guilty of! How many mothers this day have cause to say, Oh that my womb had miscarried of such a child! that my breasts had never given such a child suck! that ever one should have come out of my womb to do so much mischief, to take up arms to fight against his country, and against the saints, for the establishment of slavery and tyranny! Oh that these breasts of mine had never nourished such, for it may be they will prove very murderers! Certainly, if ever there were a time to wish their wombs had miscarried, and their breasts had never given suck, these are the times many may do so. Christ saith, in Luke xxiii. 29, "Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck." I say, concerning many in this kingdom at present might this be said. If any prophet could have foreseen that thou shouldst have been an actor in so much mischief as has been done in this kingdom of late, thou wouldst have said Amen to his prayer when he cried against thy mother, Lord, give this woman "a miscarrying womb and dry breasts."

Ver. 15. All their wickedness is in Gilgal: for there I hated them: for the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of mine house, I will love them no more: all their princes are revolvers.

"All their wickedness is in Gilgal: for there I hated them." What this Gilgal was, I opened in chap. iv. ver. 15. It was a place very famous for many remarkable things: stones were set up in remembrance of the great mercy in crossing the Jordan, there was the first passover after their deliverance, and there, too, they were circumcised: "And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day," Josh. v. 9. They were not circumcised during all that time in the wilderness, from whence it was called Gilgal, because the reproach was there rolled away. There, too, they first ate the fruit of the land. But now they have rendered this place of many mercies, the most abominable in the country; for because there were such great things done in Gilgal, they thought that it was a holy place, and therefore might justify their superstitious rites: God afterwards chose another place for his worship, yet they thought to sacrifice and worship in Gilgal; they thought it might be justified, because it was a place where such great things had been done. Now, saith God, I never intended that; "all their wickedness is in Gilgal."

Obs. 1. The superstitious are proud to put holiness upon places in which remarkable occurrences connected with religion have taken place. This we have had occasion to speak of before, and therefore I pass it.

"All their wickedness." That is, their chief wickedness; as if God should say, There is a great deal of wickedness among them, there are murders, and thefts, and abundance of other evils, breaches of the second table; but yet, above all, their wickedness is at Gilgal; they think to make use of that place where I showed so much mercy to them, they think to justify their superstitious worship by performing it there, but I will have them know that I hate this: "there I hated them," saith God, I abhor this whereby they think to justify themselves.

Obs. 2. Above all sins, the sin of idolatry makes a people hated of God. Because in that sin men think, by their own forms of worship, to atone to God for their wickedness; they present their own ways of worship, to justify themselves in all other kind of wickedness.

Obs. 3. To take occasion to sin from God's mercy, is that which God especially hates. They had met with much mercy at Gilgal, and they made it an occasion to their wickedness. To make that which should engage us to God to be an occasion of wickedness against God, is abominable in God's eyes. As you read in the law, you must not see the kid in its mother's milk, Exod. xxiii. 19; that which is the milk to preserve the kid, must not be a means for a second death; to see the or boil it in its mother's milk, saith God, is unnatural cruelty: so for us to turn those things which should be a means to engage our hearts further to God into an occasion of further sinning against God, is abominable; "there," saith God, "I hated them."

But further concerning Gilgal. Their idolatrous priests told them, as is probable, that that place was a holy place, and that surely God, who had appeared so to them there, would accept of their services in that place rather than in any other; and so, though God afterwards chose another place, yet still they doted upon this Gilgal, and that which was so famous for God's worship, became as infamous for superstition and wickedness.

Polanus on the text compares Wittenberg in Germany to this Gilgal. Those places where the Lord has been peculiarly gracious to people, the devil seeks especially to corrupt. Wittenberg was the beginning of the Reformation by Luther; now, saith he, the devil has made it the theatre of divers heresies: so here, that place which had been the scene of the greatest mercy, is the place of the greatest wickedness; the devil envies it so much the more, and all their wickedness is here.

"All their wickedness." That is, their chief wickedness: their superstition and idolatry is the chief and the great wickedness that provokes God against a people; not only because of the presumption in it, but because it is an inlet to all other kind of wickedness.

Obs. 4. Where there is false worship in any place, all manner of wickedness follows. People stick to their superstitions more than to any thing, and therefore that is the chief wickedness; yea, and they think by them to satisfy God for their other sins; all their wickedness is there.

Obs. 5. To sin where there are the testimonies of God's abundant mercies, is very abominable. That is a great aggravation of sin, to sin in the face of the testimonies of the mercies of God. What! where so much mercy, yet there to be wicked and abominable? Does God fill thy family, thy chamber, thy closet, thy bed, thy shop, with the testimonies of his mercy? Take heed how thou sinnest there where there are abundant testimonies of God's mercy to witness against thee, to the aggravation of thy sin.

"All their wickedness is in Gilgal: for there I hated them." I find some interpreters, and that makes me speak of this interpretation.) that refer this wickedness to the casting off the government that God had appointed, and introducing a new form: Gilgal was the place where they would have Saul to be their king, and cast off the government by judges that God had appointed among them; now this was the ground of all their other obstinate wickedness, and God remembers this a long time after, and saith, "All their wickedness is in Gilgal; for there I hated them."

Obs. 6. It is hateful to God to cast off the government to which God would have us subject. The Jews had both their civil and ecclesiastical government by Divine institution, they were both mixed in one there. And though now we have not our civil government by Divine institution, but it is left to the creation of man, according as in prudence men in several countries shall think best: but ecclesiastical government certainly is as much by Divine institution now, as ever it was; and it must be so, because it is spiritual, and nothing can work in a spiritual way upon the inward man, but that which is by Divine institution: therefore whatever the government be, (I will not meddle with the particulars,) yet we must take heed how we cast off that which is appointed by God, for that is hateful in his sight: "there I hated them." We had need therefore search and examine to find what that is, and if we think it be not so clear as their government was to them, we must take so much the more pains to examine, and not think it long that there is so much time spent in seeking to find out what the government should be, for it is no light matter. Many think it but a circumstance, and that we need not trouble ourselves so much about it, nor spend so much time in searching it out. Learn henceforth to look upon it as a great matter, as a matter upon which the welfare or the evil of a kingdom much depends, for so it was here: Because they cast off, saith God, the government that I would have, "there I hated them."

Obs. 7. Some sins provoke God to anger, and some to grief, but some to hatred: "there I hated them." It is dreadful when our sins provoke hatred. This is the great difference between the sins of the saints and others; the sins of the saints may anger God, may grieve God, but the sins of others provoke God to hatred. "There I hated them."

Obs. 8. Sometimes God manifests his hatred in the very places where men sin against him: "there I hated them." As a man's spirit will rise if he come to a place where he has been wronged by any; so saith God, every time he looks upon Gilgal, Oh, there was this wickedness committed, "there I hated them."

"For the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of mine house." They shall remain no longer in a church state, they shall remain no longer in my house.

Those who, under the colour of being under the church of God, yet live in the ways of wickedness, God will unchurch them even in regard of the outward appearance of a church estate; "I will drive them out of mine house." This is a dreadful expression: for a father to take his child or servant, and drive them out of his house, denotes great indignation: to be driven out of God's house is a sore evil, that makes all other evils indeed to be evil, as abiding in God's house is a great blessing, and recompenses the want of many outward blessings. If any of you that have been servants to great men, have been driven out of their houses for conscience' sake, yet if God take you into his house you are well enough; and for that you have a famous scripture in Psal. lii. 8, "But I am like a green olive tree in the house of God: I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever." Upon what occasion was this Psalm penned? When David was driven out of the house of Saul by means of Doeg, who so exasperated Saul against him, that David was driven from his house, so that he dared not come into it. What comfort had David then? "But I am like a green olive tree in the house of God;" though I cannot be in Saul's house, and enjoy its privileges, yet, blessed be God, that I may be in his house, and there thrive and prosper as a green olive tree.

Obs. 9. God cannot endure wickedness in his house, "For the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of my house," neither should we. As God accounts it his dishonour to have wickedness and wicked men in his house, so should we in the church regard the ungodly. We must not make God's house an unclean place for all; the profane should be driven out, as Christ drove out the buyers and sellers out of the temple; yea, and so should all Christians drive out of their families wicked and ungodly servants: "He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house: he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight," saith David, Psal. ci. 7. It is a dishonour for any who make profession of religion, that though they be not themselves scandalous in their own lives, yet there are those in their house that live scandalously, their servants are as wicked as any; this is a dishonour to religion: God drives out wickedness out of his house, and do you expel it from yours.

"I will love them no more." By "love" here is meant, the communication of outward good things, for that carnal hearts account to be the only love of God: indeed, if they may have outward prosperity here in this world, they make that an argument of God's love to them. Well, saith God, though you have had many such fruits of my love, yet I will love you no more, I will take away all those privileges and good things which you have enjoyed. There are privileges and good things that come from no other love but that which may be taken away; oh, let not us be satisfied with such, let us be satisfied with nothing else but that which comes from everlasting love! You may have your outward estates, you may have comely bodies, health, strength, success in your labours, yea, you may have church privileges, and yet all this not come from the everlasting love of God, that can never be taken away: these fruits of God's love may be taken from you, and God may say as concerning all these, I will love you no more; but there are fruits of love, the sanctifying graces of God's Spirit, the fruits of electing love, and God can never say of these, I will love you no more.

"No more." After the many deliverances this people had in a way of love, God resolves with himself that he will have done with them, he "will love them no more," he will deliver them no more. God may withdraw the sense of his love from his people for a while, but yet manifest it again; the afflictions of the saints are but a little cloud that soon passes over, the sun soon breaks in again upon them, and love shines; but the sun of the wicked and ungodly sets, and never rises again. This is dreadful, when a man's ruin, or a people's ruin, is thus sealed by God; whatever mercies you have had heretofore, yet now there is an end of all; adieu, mercy, adieu, love; I had gracious manifestations of them once to my soul, but they are now gone; I must never enjoy them more, God has now changed his administration toward me, I must expect nothing but wrath, nothing but ruin, from the hand of his sore displeasure, and to be sunk everlastingly. Oh, let not thy provocations of God be continued, do not add to them. I have dealt falsely with God, dallied and trifled with the Lord, many times promising fair, but when I was delivered then have I dealt wickedly with thee, O Lord; but now, Lord, no more. Oh, take heed, if thou addest any more to thy wickedness, lest that this dreadful sentence be pronounced in heaven against thee, I will love thee no more. The words in the original are, לֹא אֶחְסֶה אֹתָם I will add no more love: I have done enough already, I will do good to this wretched creature no more; my goodness and mercy have had their turn; now, Spirit, strive with them no more; ordinances, no more do them any good; mercy, meddle no more with them: "I will love them no more."

"All their princes are revolvers." This is a very strange expression. What "all?" Yes, even from Jeroboam to Hosea's time, all the princes of Israel were wicked men, for two hundred and fifty years, in all successions every one was naught, false, and ungodly, all were revolvers. The paranomasia in the original is elegant, שָׂרֵי־מַלְכוּת princes revolvers, its force cannot well be expressed in our version. The Seventy render the latter word by ἀπειθοῦντες, men that could not be persuaded; all their princes were men that could not be persuaded; they were set upon their own way, their own ends, and would have their own politic fetches; and let prophets, let any of the godly, attempt to show them the mind of God, they were resolved on their own way, they would follow this course at all risks, for it they would venture even their lives, and the loss of their estates.

Obs. 10. Men great in power and authority think it a dishonour to alter their minds; such men will go on desperately, to the ruin of themselves and of their kingdoms, rather that hearken to counsel. Luther on the place has this expression; Being elated by their power, they would be above the word itself; they thought it much that their hearts should submit to the authority even of God's word. This is the wickedness of men's hearts, when they grow great they swell above the word of God.

"All their princes are revolvers." Some of them

made some kind of show when they came first to the crown, and raised great hopes that their times would be better than before, and that things that were evil in former princes' reigns would now be reformed, but within a while they went all the same way: thus Jehu, and so some others, promised fair at first, but they all turned to be revolvers. From whence,

Obs. 11. The nature of creature engagements. See what they will work in the hearts of men when in the pursuit of their honours, their preferences, their great places of dignity, and power, and profit, and gain; see what they will do. Evil princes being engaged, and afraid of losing their power, if any should go to Jerusalem to worship, all went in one stream, not one of them was taken off from their great engagements; indeed many in smaller matters may be drawn off to God, but if it come to a great matter, then none. Thus it has happened with us. Perhaps some poor ministers, with small livings, would discern the truths of God, and the sinfulness of ceremonies; but where did your deans and bishops? where did any of the prelates that had great engagements? they would never see the truth that now almost every body sees, their great engagements hindered them. And so the great engagements of princes hindered them, though the truth was clear enough.

Obs. 12. According to people's interests so they are; as they see those above them go that have power over them, that way people will go. Ephraim is wicked, because "all their princes are revolvers." Those that are in places of power drive the people along before them. God has little honour in the world but as it suits men's interests.

Obs. 13. Princes, though they should be used with reverence, yet must not be flattered; their sins must be showed plainly unto them, though they can hardly bear it. "All their princes are revolvers." "Touch the mountains and they will smoke;" touch the great men, reprove but them, and presently the heat of their wrath rises, and they smoke even with indignation. But yet those that are faithful about them should trust God with their places, and estates, and with their lives. Oh had we but those about princes that would deal faithfully, and show them how far the guilt and the evil of blood may be upon them! certainly it would be otherwise with us than it is at this day, had we but Latimers and Deerings. Of Latimer it is said, that sending a book to King Henry the Eighth, he wrote in the first page of it, "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." And Deering, in his sermons even before the queen, speaking of disorders of the times, said, "These and these things are thus and thus, and you sit still and do nothing. May we not then well say with the prophet, It is the mercy of the Lord that we are not consumed, seeing there is so much disobedience both in subjects and in prince." Certainly much good might come had we now men of such spirits as heretofore lived.

Obs. 14. When princes successively are wicked, there is little hope of good to a people. The saints under the persecution of one groan and cry to God, but another comes and oppresses them more. We had need therefore pray for those in high places, for princes, for it concerns much the people, as we shall presently see more at large.

Ver. 16. Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit: yea, though they bring forth, yet will I slay even the beloved fruit of their womb.

"Ephraim is smitten." הנה אפריים God had threatened Ephraim long before, but now "Ephraim is smitten;" not threatened only, but smitten. The phrase imports as if he were smitten from heaven by a thunderbolt, as if in a dreadful manner God himself smote him.

Obs. 15. God will not always forbear sinners. "Ephraim is smitten." He threatens a long time, but he smites at last. God may be a long time bending his bow, and making his arrows ready, and preparing the instruments of death, but at length he smites, and when he smites he smites terribly. How sad is the condition of a wicked man, who has had many warnings, and toward whom God has showed much patience, but of whom at length this is the news that one neighbour tells another, Oh, such a man is smitten of God, the wrath of God has pursued and has overtaken him, the fearful stroke of God is upon him! This certainly will he said of all wicked, impenitent, secure sinners. What sad reports are there at this day in all countries about us, even throughout the world! What is the news throughout the Christian world almost but this, England is smitten, the Lord has smitten her? The Lord has indeed smitten us with a dreadful stroke, and he still continues to smite us. Isa. v. 25 is made good upon us this day, "The anger of the Lord is kindled against his people, and he hath stretched forth his hand against them, and hath smitten them;" mark what follows, "the hills did tremble," (oh that our hearts did,) "and their carcases were torn in the midst of the streets:" (and so it has been with us:) yet "for all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still." And thus it is with us. And the principal cause that is there given of such woeful smiting is, as you may observe in the 20th and 23rd verses, the perverseness of men's spirits in turning things quite contrary to the mind of God. As thus, "They call evil good, and good evil; they put darkness for light, and light for darkness; put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter: they justify the wicked for reward, and take away the righteousness of the righteous from him." This is the cause of this smiting; and never was there such perverseness in the hearts of men to turn things quite contrary, to cry truth for falsehood, the ways of sedition for the ways of Christ, to cry out against the saints that are for peace, as the great troublers of the kingdom, and in many places to "justify the wicked for reward." What favour have many malignants! and those that have most appeared in the cause of God, how are they discountenanced! This is the cause why God should smite us, and why our carcases should be torn in the very streets. The Lord has smitten us this day, as he did the people in 1 Kings xiv. 15, "The Lord shall smite Israel, as a reed is shaken in the water," (and then there follows,) "he shall root up Israel out of this good land." So it is here, "Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up." The Lord this day has smitten us "as a reed is shaken in the water." That which men cried up at first, they cry down again presently after; wavering and inconstant in all their ways, they know not indeed what they would have. The Lord has smitten us so that he has fetched blood, yea, the Lord has smitten us by those that should have protected us; and that is a sore smiting, to smite us by the hand of such as should protect us. Such a threatening is denounced in Zech. xi. 6; oh how is it made good upon us this day! the text there saith, "I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land, saith the Lord; but lo, I will deliver the men every one into his neighbour's hand, and into the hand of his king, and they shall smite the land; and out of their hand I will not deliver them." It is a very strange scripture, I know not the like in all the book of God. God threatens to smite this people, and how? "I will deliver the men every one into his neighbour's hand, and into the hand of his king, and they shall smite the land." Why is it so great an evil to be delivered into the hand of our neighbour, and into the hand of our king? Truly at this time it seems it was. The Lord thus smites us this day, he smites us sorely by giving us up to smite one another. We smite one another with the tongue. In Jer. xviii. 18, "Come, let us smite him with the tongue," say they. When was there ever such smiting with the tongue as there is now? yea, even good men smite one another. There was a time when the prophet desired to be smitten by the righteous; in Psal. cxli. 5, "Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head." But now we may justly cry out to God, Lord, let not the righteous smite me: the very smiting of the righteous is a sorer smiting this day than the smiting of enemies; yea, and worse too. In Isa. lviii. 4, they "fast to smite with the fist of wickedness;" that may imply too with the pen; and to smite with the pen is a sorer smiting sometimes than smiting with the sword. And they smite with the sword too, for brother is against brother, and father is against child, and child against father; and this is a forerunner of God's smiting the earth with a curse. In Mal. iv. 5, 6, the very close of the Old Testament, Elijah is prophesied to come, and to "turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest" (adds the text) the Lord "come and smite the earth with a curse." Oh that Elijah might come amongst us! otherwise, what can be expected but the Lord's smiting the land with a most dreadful curse? When were fathers against children, and children against fathers, as now, and that in matters of controversy? It was wont to be a proverbial speech among the Jews, when they had any knotty controversy that they could not untie, When Elias shall come, then we shall know the meaning of this. We may say at present, Well, because we see what controversies and what differences in judgment exist, the Lord Christ (whose forerunner Elias was to be) will come ere long, and open all things to us: the Messias will come again and tell us all, and satisfy us in all our difficulties, and put an end to all our disputes. But for the present the Lord smites us, not only by the sword, but he smites us as he smote the men of Sodom, "with blindness," Gen. xix. 11. The curse threatened in Deut. xxviii. 28, 29, is even now upon us, "The Lord shall smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart; and thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy ways: and thou shalt be only oppressed and spoiled evermore, and no man shall save thee." O my brethren, how is this fulfilled at this day! with what blindness, and madness, and astonishment are the people of this land smitten! If God smote not men now with blindness, it is impossible but they should see what should be done in such a time as this. Indeed now almost every man in the kingdom eries of being oppressed and spoiled evermore.

We thought that when the spoilers and oppressors who were amongst us had passed away, that we were safe and well. Oh! but it is renewed again, and now come the spoilers the second time, and the third time, spoiling evermore; and this is the fruit of God's smiting men with blindness and madness. And yet who is it that returns to him that smites him? But, Lord, seeing thou art smiting, oh that thou wouldst smite once more, smite these rocky hearts of ours; if thou wilt but smite there, that might free us from other strokes; then might gush out tears of repentance, then might we smite every man upon his own heart, and turn unto thee.

From the connexion of this and the preceding verse, Obs. 2. When God suffers rulers to revolt, the people are smitten. "All their princes are revolvers;" and, "Ephraim is smitten." Pray then much for your rulers; and let not them that have the chief government in their hand think it strange that people inquire into their actions, and that they use all means in their power to keep them upright; for if they revolt they not only undo themselves, but undo us. It concerns us to inquire how it is with them, and to be solicitous about them; and they must not bid us that are beneath them to let them alone and meddle with our own business, and follow that which concerns us, as certainly what they do does indeed much concern us: were it indeed that if they miscarried they only should be smitten, then we had less to do to look after them; but if they revolt we are smitten. If a child should, in all humility and reverence, beseech his father to leave off certain sinful courses, or to take heed that he not misled by certain counsels, and his father should say, Concern yourself about your own business; the child might well answer, O father, I hear in the word of God, that God doth visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, and I may suffer for these sins of yours when you are dead and gone, therefore I beseech you, consider what you do: so I say, if we should petition and labour with our governors in all humility to take heed of any evil counsel, and they should bid us look to our own concerns, we may well answer, We have heard in the word, that when the "princes are revolvers," "Ephraim is smitten;" that if governors revolt from any former protestations, the people are likely to suffer. It is, we know, from the revolting of many of our lords and members of the high court that we have been smitten as we have been. How many of them have now revolted to the enemy! their revolting has been the cause of our being thus sorely smitten.

Obs. 3. The compulsion of authority does not excuse sin. It cannot free Ephraim from being smitten because their governors are evil; they cannot excuse their sin by that. Perhaps the people would plead thus; What could we do? we could not help it, those that were in power enjoined such things, and if we did not obey them they would undo us; we were not able to bear their smiting of us, therefore we were forced to yield. Oh! better endure the smiting of man than the smiting of God; "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

Obs. 4. The apprehension of God's hand in smiting should humble the hearts of sinners. Thus in 2 Chron. xxvi. 20, it is told of Uzziah, that when he saw that he was smitten, though he were stout and proud before, yet then "he hasted to go out" of the temple. There is no longer standing out, for the Lord has smitten. So when we apprehend God smiting, there is no standing out against the great God, we had need make haste to reform.

"Their root is dried up." But though we be smitten we hope we may grow; we may lose our leaves and some of our boughs, but we hope that we shall spring again. Perhaps these are the vain apprehensions of some men, who never look to making their peace with God. No, saith God, I will not only smite to take off your leaves and branches, but I will smite the very root; "their root is dried up." There is difference between the pruning and lopping of a tree, and the drying up of its root; there may be help so long as the root remains alive. I will never trouble myself any further (saith God) with them; I have already smitten off their boughs, and that has done no good, I will dry up the very root now. It is a great aggravation of God's smiting when he smites at the root. Every smiting is not a drying up of the root. It is the base unbelief of our hearts, the discontentedness, frowardness, sullenness of our vile spirits, that makes us thus conclude almost upon every stroke of God, that he intends our undoing; if he but smite us so that a few leaves or branches are removed, we are presently ready to conclude that God intends to blast us, and to dry up the very root, and ruin us utterly. How often in our unbelief, when tried by temptations, and the leaves of our comforts, our enlargements, and the like, have been shaken off, how often do we conclude, Oh! the Lord is coming against me, and he will certainly blast all, all that I seem to have, the very root of all my hopes and comforts, will presently be blasted! This is the evil of our hearts, and springs from our sullen, froward unbelief. It may be God intends only to prune thee and to take away superfluities, that so the sap may go down more to the root, that thou mayst more exercise the root-graces, humility, patience, faith, self-denial; God perhaps smites only to make the sap go down more to nourish these root-graces, though thou concludest that he will dry up the root presently. In this smiting wherewithal the Lord has smitten us we hope that he intends not to dry up the root, but we may say of it as in Isa. xxvii. 7, "Hath he smitten him, as he smote those that smote him? or is he slain according to the slaughter of them that are slain by him?" The godly party may suffer much, but I make no question but the ungodly party has suffered as much; and "by this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit to take away his sin." And in the 4th verse God tells us, that "fury is not in him;" God is fain to make an apology to his people when he is smiting; Though I smite you, yet not so as I smote those that smote you, but "I stay my rough wind in the day of the east wind," and "fury is not in me;" "by this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged," the end of all is "to take away his sin."

Obs. 5. God has his time to dry up the roots of sinners, and the roots of nations. 1. God dried up the roots of many that have made fair profession in former times; they had no other root but only parts, and common gifts, and morality, and this root God dried up. Many fair and glorious professors, how are they this day blasted! sapless, dry spirits, and useless in the world, even at this time when there is so much service required of them! And by being dried up, what are they but prepared for the fire? Old, withered, sapless professors, I say, whose "root is dried up," are fitted for nothing but the fire; they are like those spoken of Jude 12, corrupt trees, ξύερα φθισοπωρία, trees that are corrupt in the autumn. Thus it is with many professors, at the time when God expects fruit, they are sapless, corrupt, dried up by the root; and what then are they fitted for but for the fire?

2. God has his time to dry up the root of nations, as in Isa. v. 24. Now we might seek to understand what the root of a nation is, but I think we need not in this place, because it is sufficient by way of metaphor, to show that God does not only afflict a nation, but designs its utter ruin and destruction.

Yet a word or two on this point.

What was the root of Ephraim?

1. The covenant that God made with them. And when God intends to break his covenant with them, because they broke theirs, then he dries up the root; and therefore in the next chapter you find that God charges them with dealing "falsely in making a covenant," Hos. x. 4.

2. The godly in Ephraim. So Isa. vi. 13, "But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten: as a teil tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them, when they cast their leaves: so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof." So here, "the holy seed shall be the substance thereof." The holy seed in a kingdom is as the root and substance of it; and yet such is the perverse wretchedness of men, that, in stirring against them, they would root out the very root of the nation.

3. The vigour and power of the fundamental laws in a kingdom are as the root of it, from whence springs all its outward peace and comfort.

4. The blessing of God upon the wisdom and faithfulness of those in place, that is as the root of the good of a nation; in these things especially consist the roots of a nation.

We hope that God will not wholly dry up our root, only let us take heed of this: though there be indeed a difference between the covenant of God with the nation of the Jews, and any covenant that God makes with any nation at this day, yet if we be false in the covenant that we make with God, this may root us out; let us look to it that the vigour and power of the fundamental laws of the kingdom be maintained, and that the godly be not discountenanced; let us not set ourselves to root out them, for in so doing we do but seek to root out ourselves; and let us pray that the blessing of God may abide upon those that are in place of power; and while these things continue we may hope that the Lord intends, though he may scatter and break us in pieces, yet to suffer a root to abide, and, notwithstanding all our misdeeds, to preserve it to his own glory. There will be a root of the saints that shall flourish till Jesus Christ comes again: "The root of the righteous shall not be moved," Prov. xii. 3; though the righteous may be lopped from all their outward comforts, yet their root must not be moved, that lies deeper than any creature power is able to reach. But there is a root, oh that God would dry it up! a root that the Scripture speaks of, Deut. xxix. 18, a root of bitterness, "that beareth gall and wormwood." Oh what bitter fruit does that root bear amongst us! Oh that God would indeed dry it up!

"They shall bear no fruit." They would bring forth fruit to themselves, and seeing they would bring forth no other fruit but to themselves, they shall bring forth no fruit, saith God. How happy were we if God would say to the root of bitterness that we speak of, as he said to the fig tree, "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever!" Matt. xxi. 19. Oh that such a curse from God would fall upon the root of bitterness which is in the hearts of so many, that we might never hear the evil language, the evil speeches of people, and the bitter expressions which we have heard heretofore!

"Yea, though they bring forth, yet will I slay even the beloved fruit of their womb." מֵהַרְבֵּי translated here "beloved," signifies also desirable, the desires of their womb. Children are the desires of the womb, that is, women are very strong in their desires after them, "Give me children, or else I die," said Rachel. Indeed harlots care only for their lust, and would have no fruit of their womb; an excellent emblem are they of the vanity of many preachers, who, if they can satisfy their lusts, and show their wit and parts, care not for any fruit at all, care not for begetting any children to God. The same word here used for desires, and translated "beloved," is likewise in other scriptures similarly rendered: Dan. ix. 23, O man "greatly beloved;" O man of desires. So in Dan. x. 11, where Daniel is called, "a man greatly beloved," it is, a man of desires. And so in Prov. xxxi. 2, "What, my son? and what, the son of my womb? and what, the son of my vows?" You see with what a great deal of affection Solomon's mother speaks, "my son," "the son of my womb," and "the son of my vows," or desires. But indeed the word is there properly rendered, "the son of my vows." I made vows to God, if God would give thee me, I would give thee up to God, and by vows dedicated thee to his service: "what, the son of my vows!" Women therefore should look upon their children as the children of their vows, and show forth their love to them in the way that God would have them. We have a strange scripture in Tit. ii. 4; "the aged women" are there commanded to "teach the young women to love their husbands, to love their children;" it is a strange thing that a mother must be taught to love her children. Thy child is "the beloved fruit" of thy womb, but yet thou must be taught by God, taught by his people, and by his word, to love thy children in a right and holy way; take heed of loving them so as to provoke God to take them from you, take heed that they be not slain for your sakes. Many mothers have slain the fruit of their womb by loving them too much. Do not honour your children above God, as Eli did: when you look upon their natural comeliness, consider they have that in them, and that too by your means, which, except they have another birth, will make them objects of God's eternal hatred. They are the beloved fruit of your wombs, and you look upon them and see that they are sweet and comely babes; yea, but think withal that through you they are so conceived and brought forth, that if they have not another birth, though they be objects of your joy by being born to you, yet they will be objects of God's hatred by being born in sin by you, Psal. li. 5: you may look upon them as objects of your delight, but God may look upon them as those whom he has appointed to death. Alas, those poor, sweet babes, what hurt have they done? God sees enough in them that in his justice he may slay them. But in this that he saith, he will "slay even the beloved fruit of their womb," or the desirable fruit,

Obs. 6. If what is dear to God be not dear to you, even the very fruit of your womb shall not be regarded by him. That is the scope of the threatening. Here, saith God, is a people to whom my honour, my ordinances, my saints are not dear; therefore even the desirable things of their womb, the very "beloved fruit of their womb," that which goes more to their hearts than any thing in the world, that which is the dearest to them, I will slay in mine anger. If you would have what is dear to you dear unto God, let that which is dear to God be dear unto you.

Ver. 17. My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him: and they shall be wanderers among the nations.

"My God will cast them away." Not their God, but my God. There is much to be observed from hence.

Obs. 1. Let all the world forsake God, a faithful soul will not. Hosea lived in wicked times, all the ten tribes generally had departed from God; but still "my God," my soul shall keep close to God; I have chosen the Lord to be mine, and I have found such soul-satisfying good in him, that he shall be mine for ever; here will I rest for ever; I have chosen thy way of God's true worship, I will not conform myself to the common mode of worship where I live, but I will choose God to be "my God," whatsoever the world doth. Such was the prophet's constancy and such should be ours.

Obs. 2. In evil times, when others forsake God, yet a gracious soul can claim God as its God: yea, and especially when times of trouble come, when sore evils are ready to fall upon the people generally, yet here is the comfort of a gracious heart, "my God." Blessed be God for the interest which I have in him; they may take away my house, my estate, my means, but they cannot take away "my God," in him I have interest still, which they cannot take from me. This was the comfort of Micah, in chap. vii.: he describes the evil of his times, "The good man is perished out of the earth: and there is none upright among men: they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net," ver. 2. "The best of them is a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge," ver. 4. "Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom," ver. 5. But after all, in the 7th verse, he exclaims, "Therefore I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation: my God will hear me." O my brethren, there may come times ere long that the knowledge of God, and interest in him, may be worth to us ten thousand thousand worlds.

Obs. 3. It is no presumption for individuals to challenge a special interest in God, in way of distinction from the multitude. "My God." How singular was Hosea at this time! This people might think him very presumptuous: What, as if nobody had interest in God but he! Is not God our God as well as his? He is bold to speak this in way of distinction: You may forsake God and his worship, but I have cleaved to God, he is "my God." So in 1 John v. 19, you may see how singular John was: "We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness." How could the world take such an expression? What are you? A few poor people; and yet "we know," saith he, "that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness." What are you more than others? Yes, John knew, and would not be discouraged to affirm, that the world did lie in wickedness; and yet, "we know that we are of God."

Let not men then be offended at the fewness of those who keep the truth, and the multitude of those who forsake it. In the life of Phocion the Athenian, Plutarch relates, that there was once an oracle of Apollo Delphias read before the people, which said, That although all the people agreed, yet there was one man amongst them who dissented from them. Now the people were startled at this; but Phocion stepping forth before them all, bid them never seek further for the man, for it was he, who liked none of all their doings; and yet Phocion at length gained as much respect from them as ever any man did, and they chose him forty times to be their prætor. And so, let never so many go on in a way for which thou canst not see light in thy conscience, keep to thy principles, only examine them thoroughly. The respect we owe to ourselves and to others, calls us to make a narrow scrutiny. We should think we may possibly be rather in an error than they, and we ought to give all due reverence to the judgments of men more in number, more learned, perhaps, and more wise, than ourselves; praying to God above all to show us his mind, and searching our own hearts to see that there be nothing particular to bias or prejudice them. After all such endeavours to find out the truth, if God still persuade our consciences, we should not be discouraged because the greater part go the other way, but keep to that which our consciences tell us is the right. Thus it was with Hosea, though they went generally another way, yet he could exclaim in truth, "My God."

Obs. 4. It is a dreadful thing for wicked men to be declared against by the godly. "My God will cast them away." Those who have interest in God, who know God's mind, know that such a God as he is cannot have communion with such people. Thus Isaiah speaks at the latter end of the 57th chapter, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." He puts the emphasis there: he saith not, "There is no peace to the wicked," saith God, but "saith my God." Oh! when those that have an interest in God, and keep close communion with him, and thereby come to be much acquainted with his mind, when they shall declare concerning you, "There is no peace," do not slight it. If any of them should say, If I know any thing of the mind of God, if I have any interest in God, certainly there can be no peace to thee in such a way as thou art in; take heed of slighting such warnings from men that are godly and humble. True, many that make very great profession of religion, may be bold to suspect and to censure others, who, may be, are better than themselves; but if I see one that walks humbly, strict in his way, holy, and heavenly, and self-denying in other things, if such a man should but have any suspicion of my condition, I had need look to it, it should daunt my heart to have such a Christian look upon me but with a suspicious eye.

Obs. 5. When men are violent in wickedness God will be violent in his judgments. "My God will cast them away," with violence and with anger, as a man takes his stubborn child or servant, and thrusts them out of his house. So Lam. ii. 6, "He hath violently taken away his tabernacle." They abused that ordinance of God, abused his tabernacle, and he has taken it violently away. O unworthy, wretched people, that should enjoy mine ordinances so, and abuse them! "He hath violently taken away," as in anger and indignation against them.

Take heed of being violent in the ways of sin. You will cast the cords away, and cast away the truths, Psal. ii.; Isa. v.; take heed thou becomest not a cast-away thyself: those that are so ready to cast away God's truths, it is just with God that he should cast them away, as a man casts away a loathsome thing. They cast away their idols "as a menstruous cloth, and say unto them, Get thee hence," Isa. xxx. 22. You perhaps cast away the truths of God as loathsome now, but the Lord will one day cast thee away as a filthy and loathsome thing.

"Because they did not hearken unto him." "My God will cast them away." But why? "Because they did not hearken unto him." This is a notable sentence, saith Luther, and worthy to be written upon all our walls. Indeed there is much in it; they would hearken to such and such, and to the rules of their policy, and to their own ends, but not to God. Hence the special point to be observed here is,

Obs. 6. In what concerns God's worship we must hearken to God. The not hearkening to God is that which provokes God to cast away a people with indignation. "My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him!" Perhaps other duties we may know by the light of nature; but when we come to matters of worship, there God must be hearkened to, and none else. God expects that his creature should hearken to him in what he saith; we should be all as the servant was with his ear bored, Exod. xxi. 6. Christ himself had his ear bored, he would hearken to what his Father said; therefore Psal. xl. 6 saith, "Mine ears hast thou opened," or bored: Christ was as a servant with his ear bored, to note that he would have his ear at the command of his Father. And who or what are you, that you should have your ears free? In Isa. xxviii. 23, mark what several expressions we have about calling to hearken; "Give ye ear, and hear my voice; hearken, and hear my speech." In one little verse there are these four; "give ye ear," "hear," "hearken," "hear." Oh, God expects that we should have a hearing ear; and that is the way for wisdom. In 1 Kings iii. 9, Solomon prays, "Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart;" but in the Hebrew it is, a hearing heart; that I may have a hearing heart, so as to be able to judge thy people. They that have not a hearing heart, have not an understanding heart. The not hearkening to God comes from the pride of heart. In Jer. xiii. 15, "Hear ye, and give ear; be not proud: for the Lord hath spoken." There is no such pride as the turning away our ears from hearkening to God. And turning away our ear from the law of God is that which makes God turn away his ear from hearing our prayers; it is an evident sign of coming destruction. In 2 Chron. xxv. 16, mark what the prophet saith to Amaziah, "I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel." Dost thou come to the word, and not hearken to the counsel of God in his word? It is an evident sign that God intends to destroy thee. Oh hear! "hear, and your souls shall live," "your souls shall live." Indeed here lies the ground of almost all the evil in professors of religion, the not hearkening to the truth. I suppose those that make profession of religion, if they have enlightened consciences, dare not sin against a known truth; but now here is the evil of thy heart, and look well to it. Thou dost say, If I knew it were a truth I would not go against it. Yea, but the corruption of thy heart makes thee unwilling to hearken to it, you would fain have such a thing not to be a truth. I appeal to you, have you never felt some corruptions thus stirring within you, that when you see that if you should be taken off from the side you have espoused, a great deal of ease and liberty and outward comforts would be gone, your hearts are very loth that that should be true, and therefore you are not willing to hearken with a clear heart, so as to entertain the truth, when proved? It is the sign of a gracious heart, to be willing to retain every truth, to be willing to let the truth prevail, whatever it be; but the lusts of men's hearts hinder them from hearkening, and render them loth to receive those truths that most affect them. But when any shall be able, in the presence of God, upon an examination of their hearts, to say, O Lord, let thy truth prevail, thou knowest that I am willing to hearken to every truth of thine; though it should pluck away all my outward comforts, I would fain know thy truth, thy very strictest truths, those which most concern thy glory, and thy true worship. Whatever becomes of my credit or estate, Lord, let thy truth prevail in my heart. It is, I say, a gracious heart that will thus hearken to God and his truth. But, as Jeremiah saith, men have "uncircumcised ears, that cannot hear;" through the corruption that is in their spirits, they cannot hearken to those things which seem to make against them.

"They shall be wanderers among the nations." These last words contain the threatening.

Obs. 7. It is a judgment to have an unsettled spirit. A spirit wandering up and down, unable to settle to any thing, sometimes in this place, sometimes in that; sometimes in this way, and sometimes in another; this is a judgment of God. Solomon saith, "Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire," Eccles. vi. 9. The wandering of men's appetites and desires work them a great deal of vexation.

Obs. 8. Those who are cast away out of God's house can have no rest; they go about like the unclean spirit, seeking rest, but can find none. The church of God and his ordinances are God's rest, "This is my rest for ever," Psal. cxxxii. 14, and should be the rest of the hearts of his people; and they are indeed the rest of the hearts of those that are gracious. But alas, poor soul! who art wandering from God, whither goest thou? where indeed will be thy rest? It was the curse of God upon Cain, to be a wanderer up and down upon the face of the earth.

But you will say, May not men be wanderers; that is, may not they be cast out of their habitations and countries, and wander up and down, and yet not be cast off from God?

True, we read in Heb. xi. 37, that the Christians "wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins; of whom the world was not worthy." But that was in a way of persecution for God, and for his truth: it was not because they would not hearken, but because they would hearken. And though thou shouldst be forced to wander from thy brethren, and the sweet habitation that thou hadst, and thy friends, and art perhaps fain wander up and down even for thy life, yea, but canst thou say, Yet I hope I am not one of God's cast-aways? It is one of God's epithets in which he glories, that he "will gather the outcasts of Israel." Man has cast me out, yea, but I bless God, I carry a good conscience with me. Such need not be troubled at their wandering state, as can carry a good conscience with them. You are cast out from your friends; yea, but still thou hast the bird that sings in thy bosom. Canst thou say, I have not cast away thy commandments, Lord? Indeed, if a man's conscience tell him that he has cast away God's commandments, then, if he wanders, it is dreadful to him. What though thou art wandering from thy house, from thy outward comforts, yet not from God's commandments; "Cast me not away from thy presence," saith David; though thou art cast out from thy friends, yet not from God's presence. Here it is, "They shall be wanderers among the nations;" and Psal. xlv. 11, "Thou hast scattered us among the heathen." It was a great judgment of God to be scattered among the nations, for they were a people that were separated from the nations, and not to be reckoned among the nations, they were God's "peculiar treasure." This curse is upon the Jews to this very day; how are they wanderers among the nations!

Obs. 9. We should prize the communion of saints. Let us learn what a blessing it is to live among our own people, especially among the saints, in the enjoyment of God's ordinances; let us make use of it now, lest God teach us what it is by casting us away and making us to wander among the wicked and ungodly: then your consciences will fly in your faces, and tell you, Oh what blessed times, what sweet communion, we once had! but we began to neglect the prize that God put into our hand. Oh if we were where once we were, we would meet often, and pray, and confer, and would labour to edify one another in our most holy faith, and warm one another's spirits, not spending all our time in wrangling and jangling; but now those times are gone, and we are cast away, and are wandering up and down among wicked and ungodly people. Truly there has not been a time for many years when the communion of the saints has been so little improved as at this day; we now wander, as it were, among ourselves, and little converse one with another, what we should do living together. Just were it with God to bring this judgment upon us, that we should wander among wicked people here and there, and that we should not be privileged to see the face of saints, to have converse or communion with them.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1. Israel is an empty vine, he bringeth forth fruit unto himself: according to the multitude of his fruit he hath increased the altars; according to the goodness of his land they have made goodly images.

GUALTER makes this the beginning of Hosea's seventh sermon. The argument is like that of the former, upbraiding and threatening. Hosea had to deal with tough and stout spirits, and therefore he still strikes with sharp rebukes and severe threats.

"Israel is an empty vine." The church is often in Scripture compared to a vine, as in Psal. lxxx. 8, "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt: thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it." And in that known place, Isa. v. 1, "Now will I sing to my well-beloved a song of my beloved, touching his vineyard."

The church is here compared to a vine, and that for many reasons:

1. No plant has a more unpromising outside than the vine; how mean is its appearance! it looks so weather-beaten, rugged, grizzled, and weak with its hollow stalk: and such is the church; the outside of it is very unpromising, little beauty and comeliness; as Christ himself had little beauty and excellency in his outward form.

2. The vine is the most fruitful plant that grows out of the earth. That great naturalist, Pliny, tells of very strange fruitfulness of some kind of vines; in lib. 14, c. 4, he tells of ten culei, about eighteen hundred gallons, that an acre of vines brought forth in a year; nay, in the first chapter of the same book, he tells of one stock, one single vine, planted by Livia the empress, which yielded a hundred and eight gallons of good wine yearly. The vine is a very fruitful thing, though unpromising in the outside. And what fruit indeed is there brought forth to God in the world but by his churches? and God expects much fruitfulness among his people; however, as you shall hear, they are charged with being empty.

3. No plant requires so great care as the vine; what a deal of pains are bestowed in dressing, underproping, and pruning it, what constant looking to it requires! And the Lord has the greatest care of his people, of his church: he accounts it no dishonour to be the husbandman himself, as he is said to be in John xv.: and in Isa. xxvii. 3, you have a most admirable expression of God's taking care of his church, as his vine; "I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment: lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day." I will keep it, and I will water it, and that "every moment;" and again, "lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day." And this is the vineyard that he speaks of in the beginning of this chapter, and it was the vineyard that brought out red wine, the best sort of wine. Those that bring forth the best sort of wine, shall have the best of God's care, and charge, and protection over them.

4. The vine is the most depending plant in the world; unable to underprop itself, it must have props more than other plants, and therefore nature has given it tendrils by which it catches hold upon any thing near it. And so the church, weak in itself, the most depending thing in the world, depends upon the props that God affords it. You have an excellent place illustrative of this in Isa. xxvii. 2, 3, where the Holy Ghost, speaking of "a vineyard of red wine," saith in the 4th verse, "Fury is not in me;" which shows that there should come a kind of great storm and tempest, but he would not have his people to be discouraged. "Fury is not in me." And then in the 5th verse, "Let him take hold of my strength, that he may make peace with me, and he shall make peace with me." "Let him take hold of my strength;" that is, speaking to his church as a vine, In the time when my fury is abroad, yet do you, like the vine, which catches hold upon a pole, and there underprops itself, so take hold of my power, act but faith upon it in time of storms and tempests, and you shall have peace; thus, though never so much troubled abroad in the world with others, yet in me the church may, nay shall, have peace. It is the nature of the vine to catch hold upon that which is next it, especially in time of storms; and so when the strongest oaks are rent in pieces, yet the vine, clinging to its supports, abides unharmed.

5. If it be not fruitful, it is the most unprofitable thing in the world. I suppose you are familiar with Ezek. xv. 2-4, "What is the vine tree more than any tree, or than a branch which is among the trees of the forest? Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work? or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon? Behold, it is cast into the fire for fuel!" it is not meet for any work; the vine is meet for nothing, not to make a pin, if it be not fruitful. And no people in the world are so unprofitable as professors of religion, if they bring not forth the fruit of godliness. The world may be rid of such people better than of any else.

6. A vine is the most spreading of plants, it spreads larger than other plants, and fills a great deal of room with its branches; and so is intimated by the promise of the church in Isa. xxvii. 6, "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit."

7. The vine is the softest and most tender of plants, the emblem of peace; the sitting under our vines is said to set forth peace. And so the people of God should be of tender, soft spirits, not like the bramble, nor the thorn; if we sit under thorns and brambles we may be pricked with them, but sitting under the vine, there is nothing but sweetness and delight.

"Israel is a vine," yea, but he is an "empty vine." The word in the original is קֶסֶם Israel is an emptying vine; the sense is much the same, an empty vine, or an emptying vine: that is, though there be much cost bestowed upon Ephraim, so that he might be fruitful, yet he makes himself empty. This shows how he comes to be an empty vine; not because God's mercy is scant to him, but he makes himself so by his sin; what sap and moisture he has, he pours it forth into other things, and so is empty himself.

Israel was a vine full of clusters, refreshing God himself; as you heard in chap. ix., he was to the Lord as grapes in the wilderness, as a vine that did bring forth grapes in the wilderness, sweet to a weary and thirsty traveller. Israel was once such; yea, but now he is come to be "an empty vine," though he grows in the vineyard of God, and not in the wilderness.

"An empty vine," and no marvel, for, as you have heard in the latter end of the former chapter, he would not hearken to the Lord, he would not hear the word of the Lord, and so the Lord threatened to cast him away.

Whence Luther observes, The word is like a fruitful rain, there can no true fruit be without the word. Those that will not hearken to the word, no marvel though they be empty; it is the word that makes fruitful, it is that which is as the fruitful rain: those that leave and forsake the word, observe how fruitless they become, what empty spirits they have. When heretofore they were forward in hearing the word, and loved it, and delighted in it, then they were fruitful; but since they have been taken off from the word, you find their spirits empty, and their lives empty. No men in the world so empty as those who would worship God in another way than the word appoints; men that would think to worship God after their own fancies and ways, oh how empty are they in all the duties their will-worship dictates!

Obs. 1. Emptiness in those who profess themselves to be God's people, is a very great evil. Oh, it is a grievous charge to be brought against those who grow in God's vineyard, who profess themselves to be God's, that they are empty, "an empty vine." When we would speak of a man contemptuously, as having no natural or acquired excellency in him, we say such a one is an empty or light fellow; and that is the meaning of the word which you have in Matt. v. 22, "Whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council;" the word Raca signifies empty, and imports as much as if he should call his brother an empty, worthless fellow. So in James ii. 20, "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" The words are, ὁ ἀνόρωπε κενὸς, O empty man; Knowest thou not, O empty man, "that faith without works is dead?" Many keep a great deal of noise about faith, and God's free grace, and yet are extremely empty men, and understand little of the true excellency of the covenant of grace: Knowest thou not, O empty man, "that faith without works is dead?" Speak as much as thou wilt of faith and God's grace, yet if there be no works thou art an empty man. Nature will not endure emptiness; some of the philosophers have said, that the world would rather be dissolved than that there should be any vacuity; creatures will move contrary to their nature rather than they will suffer a vacuity. Certainly a vacuum in the souls of God's people is the worst possible vacuum: for,

1. It is unnatural.

2. It is a dishonour to their Root. Christ has all the fulness of the Godhead in him, and of his fulness are we to receive grace for grace: to grow upon him, upon such a Root, and yet to be empty, oh what a dishonour is this to Jesus Christ!

3. It frustrates the Lord of all the care, and cost, and charge he expends. If thou wert another plant, that grew in the wilderness, it were not much; but a vine, and one in God's vineyard, and yet fruitless, oh this is a sore evil!

4. There is no blessing upon thy soul if thou art "an empty vine;" as in Isa. lxxv. 8, "As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it." If there be wine in the cluster, then a blessing is found in it, but otherwise destroy it. No blessing is found in those that are of empty spirits.

5. If there be grace, it cannot but bear fruit. It is an evil in a vine to have but a little sap, to shoot forth in leaves and bear no fruit: yea, but what is that to grace, which is the Divine nature itself, the most glorious thing in the world? Therefore for Christians to be without fruit is an exceeding great evil. Dost thou know what fruit is? One gracious action that comes from the sap of the root that is in Christ, is more worth than heaven and earth; one single gracious act, I say, is more worth than heaven and earth. Oh, the fruit of the saints is fruit to eternity, and to be without this fruit must needs be a great evil. Those that are with and without fruit are said, in John xv. 6, to be but ὡς ἐκλήμα, "as a branch," and then such a branch as must be cut off. God will cut off those branches; he will cut them off from their profession, and suffer them to fall so that they shall not continue to the end.

6. Common gifts shall be taken away. Oh, how many that heretofore seemed to flourish, yet, bearing no fruit, but leaves only, now their leaves are gone, their common gifts are taken away from them; they are not only withered, but cast away, cast away from God, and out of the hearts of the saints; and men shall gather them, the men of the world shall catch them, and shall make use of them, and they shall be cast into the fire and burned; cast into the fire, not for a fiery trial, but that they may be burned: these are the threatenings against those that bear no fruit. It is the glory of God's people, to be filled with "the fruits of righteousness." Phil. i. 11; to "be filled with the Spirit," Eph. v. 18; yea, to "be filled with all the fulness of God," Eph. iii. 19. Oh how contrary is this to emptying! And filled indeed the saints should be with fruit, because they are the very fulness of Christ, "the fulness of him that filleth all in all." In Eph. i. 23, the church is said to be the fulness of Jesus Christ himself; and shall the church be an empty vine, when it is the very "fulness of him that filleth all in all?"

7. An empty spirit is a fit dwelling-place for the devil. In Matt. xii. 44, he findeth the house empty, and then comes in: where the devil sees an empty spirit, there is a fit place for him to enter. It is an evil thing for you to grow upon God's ground and to cumber it, to cumber any part of God's ground; it may be, if thou wert gone, there might be another in thy family, or place, that might bring forth fruit to God; God might have more rent, but thou hinderest: for all his possessions in the world the great rent is, the fruit that the church brings forth. As in Cant. viii. 11, it is said, that Solomon let out his vineyard, and it brought him in a thousand pieces of silver for the fruit of it; so God, he lets out his vineyard, and his rent is, the fruit that the saints bring forth to him. What glory has God in the world, if those that profess themselves to be his people should be empty?

8. God does not let us sit under empty vines; our vines have been fruitful vines, shall we then be empty vines ourselves?

9. The Lord has justly made this our vine bleed for its emptiness; it bleeds, and is in danger to bleed to death; it has brought forth little fruit, and therefore it is just with God that he should let this vine now bleed even to death.

10. The evil of emptiness is great according to the greatness of opportunities. To be empty when God puts great opportunities of great service into our hands, and expects an energetic fulfilment of them, is surely most vile. Oh, my brethren, that we were but sensible of this!

But if it be an evil thing to be empty, what then is it to bring forth "the grapes of Sodom," and "the clusters of Gomorrah?" to bring forth the wine of the gall of asps, wild grapes? And yet a great deal of such fruit has been brought forth; and truly the fruit that most men bear now, is wild grapes at the best. If men do any thing, yet they do so mingle the vanity of pride, the sourness of their own spirits, the rigidity of their own nature, with what they do, that all is but ungrateful to God.

Well, to conclude this, about the emptiness of the vine: O let us prize fruitfulness more, and say, as the vine that is brought in in Judg. ix., "Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?" Oh! so, shall we leave our fruitfulness for any earthly advantage in the world? Let us account it a greater advantage to bring forth much fruit to the glory of God, than to glory in any earthly good. No matter what becomes of us, so we may be but fruitful: though God dung us, though he cast all the filth and reproaches in the world upon us, yet if God will make this but cause us to be fruitful, it is no great matter.

But further, from the manner of the phrase: Israel is a vine emptying itself.

That is an aggravation of emptiness, when we empty ourselves; when God is not wanting to us in means, but we are in their use. And what is the cause of emptiness, but the pouring out our strength and spirits on our lusts and the world? No marvel though we have no fruit for God, and strength in his service, when we let out all to other things.

The Vulgate renders it, vitis frondosa, a leafy vine. The Sept. ἐκλιματώσα, a vine that brings forth goodly branches. And our version, "an empty vine." "Empty;" that is, all the strength and juice of it is let out in the goodness of the branches and leaves. So, many professors in these days empty out all the strength that they have, and all their parts, merely into leaves; and have goodly branches, make goodly outward profession, and give goodly words, and will speak much of religion; but nothing but leaves, nothing but words, all this while.

Pliny, lib. 17. cap. 22, saith of vines, that it is fit (at least for two years together after their planting) to cut them down to the very ground, that they may not sprout out in leaves, and so lose their juice and strength at the root. And truly this is that which has marred the hopeful beginnings of many young people in these times, they have presently sprouted out into leaves; for never was there a more hopeful time of young people than at the beginning of this parliament, and no greater encouragement was there than from them at that time; I will not say it is wholly lost, but oh how many of them that began to understand the ways of God have let out all their strength in leaves, and contests, and disputes, and wranglings, and strange kind of opinions, and little fruit is come of any thing! nay, there is little savour at all in their spirits. Oh how happy had it been if God had kept them down in humiliation to the very ground for a year or two together! Now any work of humiliation is a thing that is altogether laid aside, all presently sprout out into leaves. My brethren, whatsoever may be said, or whatsoever heretofore has seemed to be preached, to the contrary, yet certainly, if rightly understood, they have been but doctrines that must of necessity be acknowledged. We do not press humiliation as the condition of the covenant of grace, we look not at it so, but humiliation keeps the spirits of men low, and empties them of themselves; keeps them down, (I say,) and renders them a great deal more fruitful, so that they cannot run up as mere leaves, and spend their strength in vain, outward show. How many of those amongst us are fallen off again, not only to be slight and vain, but even to be wicked and ungodly, because they were not kept down low for a while; but God ordering things so that they should live in times of liberty, oh how luxuriant have the leaves of their profession been! When God lets a people grow rank, and prunes them not, they quickly grow barren. We had never so many rank Christians growing out in luxurious branches as at present; they think they have overtopped all, because they can talk more than others do; whereas there are some poor Christians that grow low to the ground, and when they get a little comfort it is gone away from them presently, who yet walk humbly before God, and nobody takes notice of them, they are despised and contemned; but these will grow and be delightful to the palate of God, when such rank professors as those shall wither and be cast out. The pruned vines bring forth the best fruit: compare Isa. v., with chap. xxvii. In the 5th chapter God complains of his vineyard, that when he looked for grapes it brought forth wild grapes. There the prophet speaks of the time before the captivity; but in the 27th chapter there is a scripture that seems to refer to the times after the captivity, and there the vineyard of God is said to be "a vineyard of red wine;" and God speaks much unto it what it should be after the time of the captivity, it should bring forth the best kind of wine, for then God pruned it. They thought that God would come in a furious manner upon them; no, saith he, "Fury is not in me," my intent hereby is "to purge away the iniquity of Jacob." The vines that are pruned bring forth the best and the most fruit.

But I find other interpreters render this text thus, Israel is a spoiled vine. And Luther refers it to the emptying of the abundance of her riches and prosperity. Indeed these two go together, emptiness of fruit, and being emptied of our comforts and prosperity, being spoiled. Israel has spoiled herself, and I have for her sins let the spoilers come among her, and so have emptied her of all her good: even while she enjoyed her outward prosperity, she was emptied of the blessing of God upon her; but afterward the Lord emptied her of all her outward good also.

Obs. 2. Sin will empty a land of all the blessings God has bestowed. Sin is an emptying thing, sin empties lands, and families, and persons of all their outward comforts. In Isa. xxxiv. 11, God threatens "the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness," for sin. And oh how has it emptied many parts of our land! how has sin emptied us! what empty houses are there in many places! Houses that were wont in every room of them to be filled with costly furniture, now the owners look upon the walls and see them bare and destitute: chests, too, that were filled with such brave clothes heretofore, now are broken to pieces: and those places which were filled with diet and plenty are now empty; barns empty, purses empty, and bellies empty; yea, the veins of men emptied even of their very blood. Oh how are we a spoiled vine now at this day! The vine that a while since was so delightful to God and man, and so glorious even in the esteem of all round about us, yet now, how has the Lord sent his emptiers to empty us! as in Nah. ii. 2, "The Lord hath turned away the excellency of Jacob, as the excellency of Israel: for the emptiers have emptied them out, and marred their vine branches." This text is fulfilled towards many parts of this kingdom at this day.

"He bringeth forth fruit unto himself." This is very strange, "empty," and yet bring forth fruit; if he brings forth fruit, how empty? Yes, it may very well consist: "he bringeth forth fruit to himself;" he is empty with respect to any fruit he brings forth to me, but yet has juice and sap enough to bring forth fruit to himself. Oh how many that are barren towards God, and have no abilities to do any thing for him, yet, when they come to do any thing for themselves, how active and stirring are they! when you put them upon any duty for God, then they are weak, and unable, and the like; but in a matter that concerns themselves, there they have spirit enough, and too much a great deal. If parents have children that sin against God, they scarcely notice it; but if they offend against themselves, oh how do their spirits rise, and what rage is there in the family! The truth is, were our hearts as they should be, if we have no strength for God we should have none for ourselves; and whereas we excuse ourselves, saying that we are weak in our memories, and unable to resist temptation, and can do nothing for God, we should take a holy revenge upon ourselves, and say, Certainly, if I can do nothing for God I will do nothing for myself; if I cannot rejoice in God I will not rejoice in myself; and if I cannot take care for God I will not take care for myself. To be barren to God and fruitful to ourselves, this is a great disproportion.

"Unto himself." The Vulgate renders it, fructus ad-quatatus est ei, his fruit is like to himself; he bringeth forth fruit like to himself.

Obs. 4. Men of base principles will do base things, corrupt hearts will have corrupt ways. An ingenious spirit sometimes wonders to see the ways of many so base and vile as they are; men in public employment who have opportunity to do God a great deal of service, and when it comes to it, how sordidly and basely do they carry themselves, not caring what becomes of the public good, of God, and kingdoms, and churches, so be it they may scrape but a little to themselves! Yea, but do not wonder, it is fruit suitable to themselves; they are men of base spirits, of base, corrupt principles, and therefore they bring forth fruit like themselves, fruit like the stock. So many times children are like their parents; their parents are wicked, and they wicked accordingly. Like an imp or branch of such a stock, such are the fruits of many.

"He bringeth forth fruit unto himself." That is, in all that he does he aims at himself, he has regard to his own ends, to fetch about his own designs, to bring his own plots to an issue, and all must be subservient to them. Ephraim had many designs and plots to make themselves rich, and all their strength and ability were made to subserv their own designs. It was said of Judah in their captivity, in Zech. vii. 5, 6, They did fast, and eat, and drink to themselves; all that was done was with a view to themselves; whereas the fruit that they should have brought forth, should have been to God, and not to themselves. There is a very sweet place for that in Cant. vii. 13, "At our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved." Thus should every gracious heart say, and especially then when God makes your hearts most fruitful with pleasant fruit, new and old. Have ye at any time found your hearts enlarged and melt towards God, and felt full liberty in his service? Take heed now that this pleasant and sweet fruit new from God, and the old experiences which you have had heretofore of his goodness, be not but as fruit brought forth to yourselves; let not corruption reap that which God has sown. You know it is a curse that one should sow and another reap: it is God that sows, and shall the flesh reap now? and shall the devil reap? Oh! let not these sweet fruits, especially the fruit of enlargement in prayer, and the fruit of abilities to do God service in any public work, let them not be as fruit for yourselves, do not take the glory of them to yourselves, but let this fruit be for your Beloved. When at any time you find your hearts most fruitful, graces most fully exercised, O think thus, I will lay up this for my Beloved, I will lay the experiences of the goodness of God unto me, that may fit me to glorify God more than heretofore. Oh that is sweet indeed, when God comes in with fruit, and we lay it up for our Beloved! God is to have all our fruit. You observe in Cant. viii., that Solomon let out his vineyard; but mark, in letting it out he must have a thousand pieces of silver, and the husbandmen must have two hundred: if God afford us some wages for what we do, let not us attempt to take the greater part to ourselves; let Solomon have the thousand, and let us be contented if we may have two hundred; but ordinarily we take the greater sum, and return the less to God in any fruit. But observe further the 12th verse, the difference between Solomon's vineyard and Christ's vineyard; Solomon let out his vineyard, but Christ saith, "My vineyard, which is mine, is before me:" there is noted this difference, that Jesus Christ takes the care of his own vineyard, he does not let it out, "it is before him." And therefore if we have any thing, we must not have it so much for our wages as free gift; for Christ does not let out his vineyard as Solomon did, but he keeps it and dresses it himself, and therefore it is fit that he should have all the fruit. In Isa. lxi. 3, "That they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified." Such should the saints be, they should bring forth fruits unto God. And in Phil. i. 11, "Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God." So should the saints be, and all the fruits they bear.

But carnal hearts aim at themselves; all that they do, they act from a principle within themselves, and no further, and therefore they cannot go beyond themselves. It is an argument that all thou doest has a principle not higher than self, when thou adest for thyself; whereas the principle that the saints act by, is the principle of grace derived from heaven, and therefore carried to heaven, as the water is carried as high as the fountain from whence it comes, Eccles. i. 7. A selfish heart is a narrow heart; but a gracious heart is a heart enlarged, it enlarges itself to infiniteness; such is the property of grace, though it cannot be infinite, yet it is enlarged to infiniteness. Those that work for themselves, the truth is, lose themselves in their working, and lose all their fruit; it is thy worst self that thou aimest at. There is a kind of selfishness which we may aim at; that is, if we can make God to be our own end, our happiness, as the saints do. In such a case no men in the world may do more for themselves than the saints; yea, but how? because they make more of their own good to be in God than themselves, and they make themselves to be more in God than in themselves, and therefore they have themselves more than any, but they have themselves in God. And no men lose themselves more than those that seek themselves most. "He that will lose his life, shall save it." Those that will aim at themselves, what is that but a little money, and credit, and esteem of men? O poor, base, vile heart, hast thou nothing else but this? whereas all the glory that is in God himself may be thy portion, and thyself may be in it; so that if God himself be happy, thou mayst be happy, because God himself may come to be thy portion; and is not that a better self to be emptied into God? but therein thou darest not trust God, nor thyself to empty thyself into God, but certainly that is the way to enjoy thyself. "For all seek their own," (saith the apostle,) "not the things which are Jesus Christ's," Phil. ii. 21. Oh! this selfishness, it is vile at all times, but never so vile as at this time; for men now to look and aim at themselves, especially those in public places, is the most abominable and the most foolish thing in the world. Mariners in the time of a calm may look to their several cabins, but during a storm, then to be painting and making fine their cabins, were worse than foolish; how would they deserve to be pulled out by the ears, and to be cast into the sea, that should then be looking to their own interests! What is your joy more than the joy of others? and what are you that you must have ease and content more than others? If ever God calls us to be emptied of ourselves, certainly it is in such times as these are. But we should chiefly,

Obs. 5. It is all one to be an empty Christian, and to bring forth fruit to oneself. Men think that which they bring forth to themselves is clear gain; but this is an infinite mistake, for that which is for thyself is lost, and that which is for God is gained. Professors that are selfish are empty. Many of you complain of emptiness and unfruitfulness, here is the reason, You are so selfish. That prayer is an empty prayer, though never so full of words and excellent expressions, whose end is self: many of the saints, in joining with persons, find their prayers to be such, though there be excellent words, because they see selfishness. Men that aim at self, had need be cunning to keep it from being seen. Let self be seen in a duty, though it be never so glorious outwardly, yet it is loathsome in the eyes of the very saints. Let but a man appear to be affected with himself in what he does, with the tone of his voice, or carriage, or gesture, or any thing else, we know how abominable it is in the eyes of all. And so for sermons, where they are selfish, certainly they are empty things; and so I might instance in every other thing that men do. The fulness of the spirit in a prayer or sermon, or any other duty, is the seeking to lift up the name of the blessed God in the duty, in that consists its fulness. Many of weak parts and very poor abilities, yet having their hearts upon God in a duty, there is a fulness in their service; there is more in that weak expression, in those sighs and groans, than in all the eloquence of your empty hypocrites, they not being filled with all the will of God; so Col. iv. 12 should be rendered: it is in your Bibles, "That ye may stand complete in all the will of God;" but the original is πεπληρωμένοι ἐν παντί θελήματι τοῦ Θεοῦ, being filled with all the will of God. If thou wouldst have a fulness in what thou doest, a fulness in a prayer, a fulness in thy service, in any thing thou doest, be filled with the will of God, and not with thy self-ends. You know empty vessels will break when you set them at the fire, and so will selfish spirits; those that are selfish, quickly grow empty. You that are merchants know, that if your factors abroad trade for themselves, they seldom do any great matters for you. I have known merchants that have therefore been chary to permit their men to trade for themselves. And God loves not to see us trading for ourselves, but only as we trade for him, and so account that to be for ourselves. And here is an evident demonstration that your selfishness will make you empty for God. How many are there that complain of emptiness! Oh! they cannot do this, and they cannot do that! Why? because except they find comfort, and that coming in which they aim at, they have no mind to any duty. They go to prayer, and strive to pray, and they come away and say, Oh the empty prayers that we make! But what is the reason that you cannot pray as you would? You have no heart to pray. If you would have enlargement in prayer, and present answer of your prayer to get what you would have, O, then your hearts would be much let out in prayer, and then you would have a mind to pray; but now, though it be your duty to pray, because you there-by tender up the worship that a creature owes to God, that is no argument to put you upon prayer: so self appears in your very prayers. But now try this way, try this way but to get above yourselves once, and be emptied of yourselves; look with a more single eye to God when you go to prayer, let this be the great motive, O Lord, this is that worship which I as a creature owe to thee, the strength of my body and soul are due to thee; and though I have not enlargements and comforts, though I feel not that I get by duty to myself, yet, in obedience to thee, and that I might lift up thy name, and that I might worship thee, I am resolved to go on in such duties as thou requirest of me: try but this way, and see whether you will not grow more fruitful in prayer than you did before.

But to pass that, I find that Pareus and others render the words thus, An empty vine he is, although he treasure up fruit unto himself: and so we may understand emptiness by that word which I have opened to you, a spoiled vine; he is a spoiled vine, and he is emptied of all his prosperity, and riches, and glory that he had, although he seeks to treasure up unto himself. They seek to treasure and enrich themselves, to lay up and provide for themselves now, that they may have store by them come what will come; but this will not do, saith God, Israel must be a spoiled, empty vine for all this. And here we may profitably

Obs. 6. When God is spoiling a nation, it is vain for men to think to provide for themselves. Certainly it is not the time, when God is spoiling and emptying a nation, or other parts of the kingdom, for men to have their thoughts intent on scraping together an estate to themselves even out of the evils of the times, by places and by offices to enrich themselves; certainly there can be little honour or little comfort in such an estate. It surely is the very frame and guise of a vile spirit to think of enriching itself in such times as the present. What God may cast men into by extraordinary providence at any time, or on account of some eminent services, we speak not of; but certainly, if God in his mercy shall put an end to such times as these are, and men shall prove to be rich after this storm is over, who had not some eminent providence of God to cast it upon them, I say, whosoever shall so appear rich after these times, it will be little honour to him or his posterity, but rather be the most dishonourable riches ever gained in the world. In Jer. xlv. 4, 5, the Lord saith to Baruch, who was a good man and yet in this much misguided, "Behold, that which I have built will I break down, and that which I have planted I will pluck up, even this whole land. And seekest thou great things for thyself? seek them not." I am breaking down that which I have built, and plucking up what I have planted, and doest thou seek great things for thyself? seek them not. In Acts viii. 20, saith Peter to Simon Magus, "Thy money perish with thee." So may I say to many, Is this a time for men to treasure to themselves, for men to have their chief care now to gain riches? Oh! it is just with God to say to thee, Thy riches perish with thee. Whosoever now will make it his chief care, and think now it is a time of trouble, and now I may gain thus and thus, and it will not appear; I say, those that shall make this to be their care now, to take advantage of these times to treasure up to themselves, just were it with God to say of them and their riches, Thy money and thy riches perish with thee. There follows.

"According to the multitude of his fruit he hath increased the altars; according to the goodness of his land they have made goodly images." Here you have the unthankfulness of Ephraim; you have had his barrenness, and selfishness, in the two former expressions, and now here his unthankfulness. The devil loves superstitious and idolatrous people to have good lands and good possessions, that he may be served accordingly; idolaters serve their idols according to the lands and possessions that they have; "according to the multitude of his fruit" were the multitude of his altars. And certainly it is great reason why all the papists are so desirous to get England, and contribute so much that they might but get into England, and get possession here, for in no place could they have more goodly images, and more brave things, than here in England; the fruitfulness of this land is that which makes it such an object to the antichristian party, and to the devil; he thinks that, might the popish party get here, oh the brave things that I should have here! I begin to have fine altars, but if they had possession of all the riches in the land, then what golden monuments should I have! We began to have great charges laid out upon temples, (as they called them,) but certainly if they should prevail now, you should have them build them up to the very skies, such pinnacles and glorious things there would be; for the land is a great deal more fruitful and goodly than it was heretofore, it is improved mightily now. What brave buildings were there in our forefathers' time! witness these that we have near us, Westminster, and Paul's, and the like. I remember Latimer, in one of his sermons before the king, tells of his father, a man of good hospitality, and that kept a horse for the king, that the portion he gave with his daughter was some five pounds. So I say, if that men were so poor and mean in former times, and yet from superstition raised such edifices, certainly, if the superstitious party had the possession of the land now, there would be brave things done; and therefore the devil, seeing that, strives to bring it into their power.

Obs. 7. To make God's blessings the means to increase our wickedness, is an abominable thing; to increase our sins according to the increase of God's blessings. How many may be charged with this, That when they were of low and mean estates, then God had more service from them than he has now they are of higher estates! the higher they are raised in their estates, the lower they are in the work of God: as it is observed of men that grow very fat, they have so much the less blood. And so the fatter men are in their estates, many times the less blood and life, and less spirits, they have for God. There are many reasons against this.

1. Certainly this is against the ingenuity of a Christian, to be less for God when he has most from him; when his own turn is served, then to turn his back from the Author of all his good.

2. This is a main Christian principle, that the good of an estate consists in this, That it gives a proportionably large opportunity for the service of God. This is a great Christian principle about estates; an estate affords either a less or greater opportunity for God's service; upon this principle does a Christian go in the enjoyment of his estate. Now for a man to be less for God, or more for that which is evil, the better his estate is, he thereby goes against that great Christian maxim.

3. Yea, and it is against thy prayers for a sanctified use of thy estate. Does God give thee an estate? I hope thou dost seek that this may be sanctified. Now for thee to do less for God, and more for that which is evil, by the increase of thy estate, thou dost go against a sanctifying prayer.

But yet the chief point of all I take to be this: Mark here, They do "according" (for there lies the very strength of these words): "according to the multitude of his fruit," and "according to the goodness of his land they have made goodly images." There is a great deal of elegancy in the Hebrew, so that from these two expressions, "according," and "according," here is the note: That the love that idolaters bear to their idols, it is proportionable to what abilities they have to show their love; "according to the multitude of his fruit," and "according to the goodness of his land." When idolaters are low they will yet do what they can, and as they grow up they will do more.

Virgil has a very fine expression of the idolater toward his idol there: Wc Nunc te narmorum pro tempore fecimus: actus, et futura preceps supplent, aureus esto. Ecl. 7. Now make thee but of marble, but if so be our flock does increase, and we have as many lambs as we have sheep, we will make thee of gold.

And thus the true worshippers of God should do in their service to God that which is proportionable; if they be able to bestow but marble for the present, if God raises their estates their marble is to be turned into gold: and not only in regard of their estates, but of the gifts and means they have, their abilities; know that that which God will accept of when thou art low in thy gifts, and means, and parts, will not serve turn when God increases thee in them all. Have you more than others? Account it your shame that it should be said of any in the world, That there is such a one that has less mercies than I, and yet God has more service from him than he has from me. There is no proportion between many of your increases for God, and your increases from God. Now you must look to the proportion, to make it as exact as can be, my increase from God, and my increase for God. O, be often paralleling these two together, and see whether one do not by far exceed the other; and be not at rest, O Christian, except thou canst make a meet return: those who are rich, must be rich in good works. In 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18, God "giveth us richly;" therefore "be rich in good works." It is not enough for a rich man to give sixpence or twelvecpence for some great service, but he is to be rich in good works, and for relieving distressed ones, and the maintenance of the gospel; he is to be rich in good works, and to account his riches to be as well in his good works as in his estates. Thou hast so much comings-in more than others, thou art rich in that; yea, but what works go from thee more than others? art thou rich in that? If we should judge the riches of men and women by their good works, how many rich men would there be accounted very poor! Every man must be serviceable as God has blessed them, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. O, this meditation would be of very great use to those whose estates are blessed by God: think thus, Is there such a distance between what service I do for God and the service others do, as there is between what I receive from God and what others receive from God? This meditation (I say) would be very useful. Cast up your accounts thus: Consider, what service do others for God, and what do I? I do as well as others. True, but is there as much distance between the service that I do and the service my poor neighbour renders, as between my estate and his estate? You perhaps can look upon poor people carrying tankards, earning dearly twelvecpence or twelvecpence a day, and you have many hundreds a year coming in; now is there as much difference? You would be loth to be in such a condition as those are in; oh, but is there as much difference between the glory that God has from you, and the glory that God has from them? It may be, some of them, after having been hard at work all day, when they return home, and get alone with their wives and children, fall a praying, and with tears bless God for their bread and drink.

Obs. 3. Superstitious altars and images are to be taken away. It is the magistrate's work to take away those that are in public places; but I have spoken of that before, and shall not recur to it now; only if you meet with any superstitious pictures and images, you must not keep them, and say, What hurt will these do? though they do not hurt now, yet they may afterwards: you are not to sell and make gain of them, but do as God does, break them down and spoil them, that they may not hereafter be snares to others.

Obs. 4. Those things to which we give that respect which is God's due, are liable to the stroke of God. They gave to their altars and images the respect due to God; God's Spirit rises against that; "he shall break down their altars, he shall spoil their images," saith God. So, whatsoever it be to which you give that respect which God challenges to himself, you may expect that God will spoil it and break it down. If you give to your estates the respect due to God, you make an idol of them, and may expect that God will break them; yea, to your children, your names, your bodies, parts, whatsoever you have, if you rob God of that respect which is due to him, and give it unto them, expect that God will break such things.

Obs. 5. If it be God's will to break down that which is evil in his worship, let us take heed that we have no hand to set it up; that we do not endeavour to set up false worship, for it is in God's heart to break it down: let us not set up idols, either in our hearts, or elsewhere.

Obs. 6. We must not break down superstitious and idolatrous things to make up our own broken estates. We should labour to abolish those things, and not seek our own benefit by them; as certainly many do in breaking down things that are naughty and superstitious, they endeavour to make up their broken estates, and that is all they truly aim at. But, saith God, I will break them down and utterly spoil them: so should we, and look not to our own advantage.

"He shall break down." I find some interpreters render the words thus, it shall break them down, and so apply it to their divided hearts. The pronoun translated "he" is relative, and the antecedent, according to the former exposition, is in that last verse of the former chapter where he had spoken of God; but according to this interpretation the antecedent is, "Their heart is divided;" their hearts, their very dissensions, their divisions, shall break down their altars, and spoil their images. From such an interpretation we might profitably

Obs. 7. Men's divisions and contentions break the neck of that which they contend for; especially when men in their contentions are violent, furious, outrageous, and heady, they do usually by their rage and passion break down and spoil the very thing that they would fain maintain; and their party is very little beholden to such as thus act in a spirit of contention. You know those furious, violent prelates, did not they break the neck of their prelacy merely by their fury and outrageousness? And in any party it always happens, that those who are the most furious and outrageous do the least service to their party, and many times are the very break-neck of their party, and of their cause: it shall break them down.

Ver. 3. For now they shall say, We have no king, because we feared not the Lord; what then should a king do to us?

What! break down our altars, and spoil our images? No, the king will maintain them against you all: let the prophets say what they can, and a company of precise fools oppose them as they will, we have the king on our side, he will rather lose his crown than he will lose these things, he will stand for them to his very life, and therefore we do not fear that they shall be broken down. No, that will not serve your turns, (saith the prophet,) your king shall not be able to help himself, much less to help you in those superstitious ways that you would have.

"For now they shall say, We have no king." They rejoiced and gloried much in their king, they relied altogether upon their king; no matter for the prophets, they have the king's commandment, for what they have done they can show the king's broad seal, and they were sure that they had the king's heart with them, their king would bear them out in all. They cared not therefore what they did, so be it they had the countenance of their king, that he would defend them; and not only defend, but, by being zealous and forward for his ways, they hoped to have promotion by him; they did not fear to be questioned for any thing, no matter whether they went against law or not, they could shelter themselves under the power and favour of the king: the pomp and glory of the court were a great thing in their eyes, and made them bold in their idolatry and oppression; because of the power and greatness of the king, who should control them in any thing that they did? But now, (saith the prophet,) you have had your day; you have had your time that you could thus shelter yourselves under the power of the king, and do what you list, and oppress, and rage, and nobody durst meddle with you because of the power of the king, but now the case is altered.

"For now they shall say, We have no king." Had they no king? Yes, Hoshea was their king; but the meaning is, it is all one as if we had no king, his power is so broken that, the truth is, he cannot help us. Drusus, upon the place, saith, He cannot protect us, which is the duty of the king, and therefore it is as if we had none.

"Now they shall say, We have no king;" alas, he is not able to save himself, he can do nothing for us, his pomp, his power, and glory are in the dust; he is distressed himself, and we are miserably disappointed of our hopes, we are undone. Who can help us now? whither shall we go? what shall we do? Our consciences upbraid us now for our bold, presumptuous wickedness. Oh how far were our hearts from the fear of the Lord! we dared the God of heaven and all his prophets, we boldly ventured upon those ways which we were told, yea, which we knew in our very consciences, were a provocation to the Lord; we set up our own worship, we pleased ourselves, we made our wills to be the rules of all our actions, we took liberty to satisfy our lusts, we mingled our own ways with God's ordinances, we subjected religion to public ends, we were rigid and cruel towards those who differed from us, we upheld the authority of the king against God and his people; and now God has justly brought this distressed estate upon us, that the king's power, in which we so trusted, is broken, and in a manner gone. Oh, now we see we feared not the Lord; we have none now to help us, we now know what it is not to fear the great God; God is above us, and therefore now what can a king do to us? What could he do for us, suppose we had him again? alas, our misery is beyond his help; seeing God is provoked with us, and has forsaken us, what should a king do for us? And thus, in this short paraphrase, you have the scope of the words, as if the people should have spoken in this manner.

But now the question is, what times does this refer to? "Now they shall say, We have no king," &c.

When did they say so?

The times that this refers to seem to be those which we read of, 2 Kings xvii. In that chapter you find the times that this has reference to; then they might well

*Ac si non esset, nam in quem habebimus,
non potest nos protegere,
quia est officium regis.

say, "We have no king." The observations from it are,

Obs. 1. It is a great evil for a people not to have the protection and the blessing that might be enjoyed in the right government of a king over them. It is a great evil, and they complain of it as such, and so far their complaint is right, that they are now deprived of the protection and good that otherwise they might have had from the right government of a king over them.

And, my brethren, our condition is even such in regard of the personal presence and protection of a king; in those respects we may almost use the same words as here, and say, We have no king among us. And whether is it better for a people to have no king, or to have no protection from their king? But that which is contrary to protection is a question fitter to be discussed and determined in a parliament than in a pulpit; and to them I shall leave it.

But the church of God shall never have cause to make this complaint, that they have no king: in Psal. xxix. 10, 11, "The Lord sitteth King for ever. The Lord will give strength unto his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace." In Psal. xlv. 6, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre." Psal. cxlv. 13, "Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations." Psal. cxlix. 2, "Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King."

"Because we feared not the Lord." Here

Obs. 2. It is a great evil not to fear the Lord. "Fear ye not me, saith the Lord, which have placed the sand for the bound of the sea?" It is an evil and a bitter thing, that the fear of the Lord is not in men. For God is a great God, infinitely above us, clothed with majesty and honour; trembling frames of heart become his presence. None like unto the Lord: great and marvellous are his works; oh! who would not fear him? God has infinite authority over us, to save, or to destroy; he has us all at an infinite advantage, by the least word of his mouth to undo us. His wrath is insupportable: "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" Isa. xxxiii. 14. Darest thou, a vile wretch, presume to rebel against any word of the Lord, when the next word may sink soul and body into the bottomless gulf of eternal horror and despair? Who art thou that dost not fear the Lord? Dost thou not fear the commanding word of the Lord, when the next word that proceeds out of his mouth may be a destroying word, to undo body and soul for ever?

Obs. 3. In times of prosperity, when men have the favour and countenance of great ones, there is little fear of God among them. "We feared not the Lord." Oh! those times when we had the favour and countenance of great men, there was little fear of God among us. So long as men have any confidence in the creature, so long they see no need of God, their hearts are swollen with pride, God is not in all their thoughts; they say to God, Depart from us, we do not desire the knowledge of thy ways. They set their hearts and tongues against the God of heaven, they can venture upon any thing then; to tell them it is sin against God, nothing at all affects them. How vile and foolish are the hearts of wicked men, that the enjoyment of such poor things as they have in the creature, should imbolen their hearts against the great God of heaven and earth! Yet thus it is, men little consider that even those things which their hearts do so much rest upon, are absolutely at the disposal of this God whom their hearts do not fear.

But let the saints of God take this note with them, Shall creature confidence take men's hearts off from God's fear? then let God's fear take your hearts off from creature confidence. Certainly this is far more reasonable. Oh! it is infinitely irrational that creature confidence should take the heart from God's fear; but it is infinitely rational that God's fear should take our hearts off from creature confidence.

Obs. 4. The taking from a people the protection and benefit they might have by kingly power, is a punishment for their want of the fear of God. "We have no king," we are deprived of the benefit and the protection we might have by kingly power; it is "because we feared not the Lord." What evil we feel in this, let us attribute it to the want of the fear of God in ourselves, and in the people of the land. We complain of those that are about the king, and of her that lies in the bosom of the king, and of the evil of his own heart in part; but whence is it that God has left him, either to them, or to any evil in his own spirit? The Lord in this punishes the sins of the people. It is usual for God to punish the sins of the people by leaving governors to evil courses; in 2 Sam. xxiv. 1, you have a remarkable scripture for this, "And again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel." And what then? "And he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah." "The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them." To what? God lets temptations be before David, to lead him into a sin that might bring evil upon the people. It was because the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel. It is because that a people fear not God, that the Lord leaves kings, leaves their governors, to those evil ways to which they are attached; and therefore learn we, when we hear of any evil done by the countenance of kings, or of any in power, learn we to lay our hands upon our own hearts, and say, Even this is because we feared not the Lord. How easy had it been with the Lord to have wrought upon his heart! oh what prayers have been sent up unto the Lord for the heart of one man! never since the world began have more prayers been proffered for the heart of one man. But the Lord has seemed even to shut his ears against the prayers of his people; now let us lay our hands upon our hearts, God has denied our prayers, it is because we have not feared him. Now certainly there has been but little fear of God amongst us, and little fear of the great God is still to this day amongst us.

Obs. 5. The times of God's wrath and judgments force acknowledgment from men that they did not fear God. When God comes against them in ways of wrath, now they can acknowledge that they feared not God. Had the prophet come to them before and told them, Oh! you are a wretched, vile people, there is no fear of God among you. Why, wherein do not we fear God? As in Mal. i., they would not be convinced; but now, when the wrath of God is upon men, now they shall say, We see now apparently we feared not the Lord. As Cardinal Wolsey, when in distress, is reported to have said, Had I but served God as well as I served the king, it would have been otherwise with me than it is; but I sought to please the king rather than God, and now I am left in this distressed estate. He would have scorned that any should have told him before that he pleased the king more than God; but afflictions will draw forth acknowledgment: for in afflictions God appears dreadful to the soul, it is no dallying, and trifling, and putting off then; we see we have to deal with an infinite, glorious, and dreadful God. And in times of affliction conscience will assert its rule over men, it will not be quieted and stilled as in the season of prosperity; but it will speak, as Zebul, in Judg. ix. 38, "Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech?" So saith conscience in times of affliction to wretched creatures, Where now is that bold and presumptuous heart of thine? Thou didst scorn at fearing and trembling before God, and slightedst his word; but where now is that proud, wretched heart of thine? In times of affliction men's hearts are abased and humbled, and therefore are ready to say, It is because we feared not the Lord. Mark here,

They do not when in affliction and trouble say, There were a company of factious people who would not yield to any thing, and we may thank them for all this; you hear no such words, O no, but it is, "Because we feared not the Lord."

Obs. 6. When the heart is humbled, it will not put off the cause of evils to other men or other things, but will charge itself as the cause of the evils that are upon it. Oh how much better, my brethren, were it for us to see the want of the fear of God by his word to us, and his Spirit in us, than by his wrath against us, or his stroke upon us. Let us every day examine our hearts, How has the fear of God been in me this day? has the fear of God actuated and guided me in all my thoughts, counsels, and actions this day? How happy were it whenever we lie down to rest to have such a short meditation, Has the fear of God been the thing that has acted, and governed, and guided me in my course this day? But there follows.

"What then should a king do to us?" Suppose we had him; now he is gone, but if we had him, what good would he bring to us? As if they should say, We speak much concerning our king, but now we have not the king with us as he was; yet if he were with us again, what should he do for us? what would our condition be better than it is? And indeed, what good had their kings done for them? The people of Israel were very desirous of a king, they must needs have a king, God yielded to their desires in giving them Saul; then afterwards they must have a king again, so they had Jeroboam, and he must be the king of the ten tribes. Their first king was given in God's wrath, and almost every one of the kings of Israel was a plague to them; what had they done for them? All the time they had judges they were in a better case; Israel was in a far better case when they were ruled by the government of God. And Peter Martyr, in his preface to the Book of Judges, observes three things wherein Israel was better when they were under judges, than kings.

First, All the time they had judges, they were not led captive out of their own country as afterwards.

Secondly, Whenever they were oppressed, and God raised them up a judge, he did always prevail so as to deliver them from their oppression, before he had done he delivered them from their oppression; that is to be observed in the story of the judges, but their kings did not so.

Thirdly, We find not any one of their judges charged or condemned by God as evil, and executing unrighteous judgments among them, as the kings are; Such a one did evil in the sight of the Lord, and such a one did evil; almost every one of the kings of Israel did so. God does not charge the judges so; it was otherwise therefore with them after they had kings. And the truth is, that Christ has been but little beholden to, I may say, the most of our kings; yea, little beholden to most of the kings that have lived upon the earth; and he has taken as little care of the greater part of them: as they have taken little care of his honour, so he has taken little care of the greater part of them. Of all the sixty-three Roman emperors elected by the senate, historians agree that but six had such protection from God as to die a natural death, but six of threescore and three: there were twenty-nine of the emperors that did not reign above twenty-five years and some months; yea, there were twelve of them that reigned but three years and some months: see what havoc was made of them: they regarded not the honour of Jesus Christ, but were enemies unto him, and he regarded as little their safety. From hence the notes are these:

Obs. 7. When God forsakes a people, nothing can do them good. "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it," Psal. cxxvii. 1. "What then should a king do to us?"

Obs. 8. It is just with God to make those things unuseful to men which they sinfully dote upon, and put their confidence in. They sinfully doted upon kings, and put their confidence in them, and God does now justly make the power of kings unuseful to them. "What then should a king do to us?" If we dote upon them, it is just with God to make them unuseful to us. Or if we dote upon our credit and names, and so upon kings and princes; if men expect preferment from them, it is just with God to blast all their hopes, that they should be forced to say, Now I see God fights against him, as well as against me. Thus the people spake in respect of their kings.

This scripture may well be a comment upon that text in Psal. cxlvi. 3, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help." Do not put your trust in princes, have no confidence in them; if you put your trust in them, they will be unuseful to you. And Chrysostom upon that very psalm has this note: Whereas they would say, Oh, he is a prince! Saith Chrysostom, Let me tell you that which you perhaps will wonder at; because he is a prince, therefore put not your trust in him. And he gives this reason, Because who is in a more unsafe condition than they? Are not they fain to have their guards go about them to protect them? In times of peace, even in a city that is ruled by good laws, yet are they fain to have the instruments of war round about them to protect them; and therefore put not your confidence in them, because they are princes. But then, in the Psalm, they are called to put their confidence "in the Lord, which made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is; which keepeth truth for ever." Alas, you may put confidence in princes, but they will not keep truth; they will make fair promises to you, that you shall have some great matters by them, but they use you but to serve their own turns; but put your trust in the Lord. "The Lord shall reign for ever;" kings do not reign for ever, they are the children of men, the breath is in their nostrils; but "the Lord shall reign for ever, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations."

Obs. 9. How great an evil is it to a people then, whose complaints are, What doth a king not do against us? Musculus, upon the forenamed Psalm, (those that read his comment shall find that note in it,) saith, You are not to put your trust in princes that are the children of men, they are but men; yea, but what shall we say to those that are cruel oppressors, that are rather like tigers and such kind of wild beasts among men, that seem not to be children of men, how shall we put our trust in them? Oh! it is a sad condition indeed that a people is in, when they have this cause to complain, when they shall have cause to cry out and complain, Oh how, how doth he run from place to place, plundering, spoiling, breaking, tearing, destroying wheresoever he comes! That people is in a sad condition. What shall he do for us? nay, what doth he not do against us continually? and all this, because we have not feared the Lord.

See here the alteration of the spirits of these men towards their king. King; not long ago they put their confidence in their king, and gloried in their king, and now, "What shall a king do to us?" Hence the note is,

Obs. 10. God can soon make a great change in the hearts of people in reference to their kings; that even those that did dote and admire him, and own no other God but their king, shall even turn their hearts and say, What can a king do for us? The least turn of God upon the hearts of people will make such a change as this is.

Obs. 11. The difference between the blessed estate of God's people, and the wretched estate of wicked men. Those who fear God can say, What shall a king, what shall men, what shall devils do against us? but other men in their straits, What shall they do for us? We are in a distressed condition, and what shall they do for us? But the people of God are never in such a distressed condition but they are able to say, What shall men or devils be able to do against us? for God is our protector.

Obs. 12. The more stoutness and sinful creature confidence there is in any, the more do their hearts sink in desperation when they come to be crossed in their hopes. They were very stout and full of creature confidence before they were brought into misery, and now what low, sordid spirits have they! now they sink in desperation. None have their hearts sink in desperation more than those who in the ruff of their pride are the most bold and presumptuous against God and his servants.

Obs. 13. A carnal heart is not led by experience of the vanity of creature confidence to seek after God. "What then should a king do to us?" Their hearts sink in regard of any hopes that they have from their king. But yet you read nothing of their hearts being set upon God, and mourning, and working towards God; when they are taken from the creature they say not thus, Now we see our vain confidence in our king, and what hopes we had of preferment in him God has crossed; well, we will go and seek to make the King of heaven our portion. No, no such thing comes from them as this. Their heart lies sullen and sinking, it has no interest in God, and cannot go to him to make up what it wants in the creature. But it is otherwise with a gracious heart; The hand of God has taken off my confidence in the creature, yea, but I hope it is in mercy to my soul, that I might have the more confidence in God, and that God might have the more glory from me; and therefore I hope that this taking off my heart from the creature, will for ever unite my heart more to the Lord than ever heretofore it has been. Yea, this is a gracious work indeed, when the heart is taken off from creature confidence and brought nearer unto the Lord.

Ver. 4. They have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant: thus judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field.

They are convinced of their sin, that they have not feared God, they cry out of their misery, "What then should a king do to us?" But mark what follows; they were not gained to God ever a whit the more, but when taken off from their hopes one way, see how they set upon another.

"They have spoken words." Luther here saith, this is a Hebraism, for, they have anxiously consulted; that the Hebrews are wont so to express an anxious consultation; and for that he quotes Isa. viii. 10, "Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought; speak the word, and it shall not stand." So then the words here would signify, they get together and contrive one with another what they shall do in such a case as this, how they may any way help themselves. As we read of the people of God in Mal. iii. 16, "They that feared the Lord" met one with another and spake together; so these wicked wretches, that were thus disappointed of their hopes, met together, and spake one to another, some such words as these:

Our case is very sad, oh! who should have thought such things should have befallen us? We are as much crossed of our hopes as ever any men were; we made account we should have overrun them, and they would have been but as bread unto us, we should have made a prey of them, and all their estates would have been ours long before this time. Those prophets who told us that God was against us, those ministers that encouraged people in the name of God, and those people that differed from us, now we see that their words are fulfilled, and what they thought would come, is now come upon us; now is come to pass what such precise ones among us, whose consciences would not submit to our ways and the way of our king, said. Surely they cannot but look upon us as a most wretched, miserable, forsaken people, now we are like to lose our houses, estates, honours, and all those delightful things which we hoped might have made our lives prosperous and jocund. Oh! what shall we do in such a distressed state as this? We had almost as good die as endure such a miserable life as we are like to live, at the mercy of men who we know scorn and hate us. Is there no way to help ourselves? cannot we get some to join with us? can we call in no help from any strangers? no matter what compliances in return they demand. Thus they toss up and down, not knowing what in the world to do in their conference.

Or thus; May we not yet possibly make up some peace though we be in this distressed condition? Whatsoever propositions they shall proffer to us, we will, rather than fail, yield to them all; we may perhaps get some advantage hereafter, or be in some means in a better case to revenge ourselves than now we are. If they will have us take the covenant, and nothing else will satisfy them, we will do it; and when we have taken it, perhaps they may put some of us in places of trust, and so we may privately work about our own ends, and drive on our own designs that way better than in any openly hostile manner. And if together with their covenant they will have oaths, we will take them too; and if we cannot agree to their oaths or covenant hereafter, we will say, We were forced to it, and therefore they do not bind us. Some such kind of communication it is like they had. And could you hear the communication of our adversaries when they get together in those straits that God has brought them into, you would likely hear some such kind of stuff as this is, they spake such words one to another.

"They have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant." רבו ודרבו אלות שוא כרת ברית Others refer this to the times of the prophet's threatening, or when they saw their danger imminent. The Chaldee paraphrase has it thus, They spake violent words; that is, they rage and fret, they speak proud, swelling words, they swear and curse: What! shall our images be broken down, shall we be brought under and made to serve our enemies? We scorn it, we defy all that shall attempt it. We will do this and that, we will have our minds, we will die for it else; we will enter into leagues, we will get such and such to conjure together with us, and surely make our party good. Thus they speak of the great things that they will do: thus they speak words, in making a covenant with oaths of vanity, for so you may render the original. And indeed, if men could prevail with great words, and daring expressions, and bold resolutions, and desperate oaths, and wicked curses, then may some hope to prevail against the God of heaven and his saints; but saith he, These things shall do them no good. And indeed these things should never move us, though we hear our adversaries speak proud, swelling words, and say what they will do, threaten monstrous things, let us not be troubled at it, for they do but hasten the wrath of God against themselves. In the mean time, while they are swearing, and cursing, and making brags, and boast what they will do, the counsels of the Lord work their ruin, and bring about surely the good of his people. But further,

"They have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant." What has this reference to? What covenant did they make? and wherein did they swear falsely? Some think it refers to the covenant which the people made with Jeroboam at the first, and so with his successors; that is thus, The people came to him and took their oaths, and entered into solemn league, that they would support him in the breach which he made from the house of David, and stand by him in opposing those who would not yield to him in the alteration of worship: for their princes would not probably have been so strongly set upon the alteration of the ways of worship, had not the people joined themselves freely to them by oaths and covenant: now when they saw that the people came in flocking and willing to yield to the oath which the king would give them, upon this they the rather confirmed Jeroboam in his purpose. I find that Arias Montanus and Vatablus thus interpret the words.

But now others, and that more probably, understand this covenant and swearing to be the covenant they made with the Assyrians and with the Egyptians, the story of which you have in 2 Kings xvii. Hoshea "sent messengers to So king of Egypt, and brought no present to the king of Assyria, as he had done year by year." First, he had covenanted with the king of Assyria, and that was broke; and then they would covenant with So king of Egypt; and so they sware falsely in making a covenant with the Assyrians and the Egyptians. Now the observations are,

Obs. 1. Carnal hearts, in their straits, take shifting courses. They have no God to go to, and so, as a dog that has lost his master, they will follow after any for relief.

Obs. 2. It is an evil thing for professors, in straits, to combine with wicked men. God professes he will not take the wicked by the hand, neither should we. It is a sign the cause is evil, when men can have no other help but by combining with the wicked and ungodly. Just thus it is at this day with the adversaries to the parliament; all men generally that make any profession of godliness, see they cannot have help from God, therefore they combine, and bring into covenant Irish rebels, papists, Turks, or Jews, any in the world, to help themselves withal: this is the wickedness of men's hearts.

Obs. 3. No trust is to be reposed in the oaths or covenants of the wicked. Let their protestations be never so solemn, their oaths, their covenants, it is but only to gain time to work about some advantage, that they cannot effect for the present, while they have any opposition. If they have not things under their power as they desire, they will promise you any thing in the world; but when once they come to get power in their hands, then who shall require the fulfilling of their promises, their oaths, their covenants? And therefore, certainly, when we have to deal with those whom we have experienced to be false, we must ever retain this conclusion, except we see an apparent change in their hearts; for it is not enough that they are willing to take covenants, that is no new thing; but till we see that God has wrought some mighty work upon their hearts we must carry this conclusion, Certainly, if they can, they will ruin us, therefore our condition cannot be safe till it is such that they can do us no hurt.

Obs. 4. Breaking covenant, though with wicked men, is a wickedness which God will punish. I have heretofore spoken of falseness, and falseness in covenant and promises, and shown you the example of Saul and Zedekiah, therefore I shall not look back to those things. God loves human societies, which cannot be preserved but by faithfulness; Faithfulness (it is the speech of a heathen) is the common safety of all men. I remember

I have read of the Romans, that, by the light of nature, they did so esteem of faithfulness in covenants, that they built and dedicated a temple to it, as to a goddess; and in that temple all their leagues, truces, covenants, and bargains were made, which were so religiously observed, that whosoever broke them was to be held as accursed, and unworthy to live in human society. The Egyptians too would punish perjury with death. Among the Indians the fingers and toes of perjured persons were cut off. And I have likewise read, when Tissaphernes the Persian warred against the Grecians, he broke covenant with the Grecians, and thereupon Agesilaus rejoiced greatly, saying, By this means he has made the gods his enemy and our friend; wherefore let us boldly give him battle. We know how our enemies have broken their covenants from time to time, and the very conditions which they have made themselves, yea, even lately in that town which we hear such good of now; in that we hope the Lord is even revenging himself upon them for breaking covenant in that very place. Now, my brethren, as even the very heathen are convinced that this is so great and dreadful an evil, what cause have we to lay our hands upon our hearts this day in respect of that part of our covenant which concerns one another, for certainly since the time of our solemn covenant there was never more treachery than there has been in England, and in Scotland too; there has been as much treachery since that time as ever yet was since either of them were a nation: we have been false one to another so far as relates to ourselves. But further,

"They have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant." Calvin, in his notes on this scripture, understands this oath and covenant not to be a covenant to men, but their covenant with God, in promising repentance and new obedience; and so they spake only words, "swearing falsely," they did but deceive him in swearing and making a covenant. And this indeed is a sore and dreadful evil, to swear to the high God, and to covenant with him, to draw so nigh to him, and yet to be false. God threatens in Lev. xxvi. 25, that he will send a sword to avenge the quarrel of his covenant; and when we see the sword rage so as it doth, we may have cause to fear that the Lord has a quarrel against us, in avenging our falseness in the late covenant that has been made. And that we may see further our guiltiness and evil in swearing falsely in making a covenant, we must know that many ways our hearts may be false in our covenants with God. It is a dreadful evil to be false any way in covenant with God: any of you that upon your sick-beds have been solemnly promising to God reformation if God restored you, if you be false, O know, that the Lord has a quarrel against you, and he has a dreadful evil to charge upon your souls. How many of you have been false in your private covenants! But to be false in public covenants, that is most dreadful. But our hearts may be false divers ways: as,

1. If we make our covenant merely upon politic grounds. If we make the solemn worship of God, wherein we express our fidelity for reformation of religion, to be merely subservient to politic grounds, here is a falseness of heart, we are false in swearing thus, and making a covenant; we do not sanctify the name of God as we ought.

2. If we put on it false interpretations we are false; when we shall make our covenant a mere snare to our brethren. Let us consider how far any of us are guilty of this, and let the Lord judge between us. I say, when we seek to make it a snare even to our brethren. How have those been accused for the breach of this oath, in things which have not accorded with the points that are in controversy with our brethren! as if this oath were put upon all men to determine most abstruse and difficult points of controversy, to bring men to submit to such things as are very abstruse and difficult to understand: this were to make an oath a snare, and to take the name of God in vain in a fearful manner. Certainly the Lord never would have oaths put to men to this end, that men that are of different ways and opinions in controversial things, should be forced by means of an oath to be of the same judgment, and to do the same things: this is a great abuse of this oath, wheresoever it is urged so far. Certainly no man is guilty of the breach of this oath and covenant, that shall but endeavour as far as he can to understand what the mind of God is, and then to practise according as he understands, though he should mistake; as in that part of the covenant regarding the point of schism, the thing itself being a sin, we may as well swear against it, as David did to keep God's commandments, Psal. cxix. 106; but now, if David did labour to understand God's commandments, and practised as far as he did understand, suppose he did not understand all things aright, it might be his weakness, but not his perjury. So let us be in point of schism, or any other point of the covenant; if men do endeavour to understand what is schism by the Scripture, and accordingly do, in their several places, by what means their consciences tell them is lawful, endeavour to oppose it, though they should not think that to be schism which their brethren account schism, or perhaps is so, yet they are not forsworn. This is evil, to make a covenant to be a snare unto us, and our hearts so far are false in it.

3. Then is the heart false in making a covenant, when it does not fulfil it according to the nature of it, when it goes quite opposite to its tenor. As, since our covenant has been made, when were there ever greater divisions? our covenant is for unity. When more profane ungodliness? our covenant is against it. When more injustice? our covenant is against all such things; and yet, since England was a nation, never did stronger cries ascend to heaven for these sins, than since our covenant. Therefore certainly there is a great breach between God and us in this respect.

4. When men make their covenant to be a cloak for malignity; that is, though they have malignant and vile, wicked spirits, yet they can but take the covenant, and then all is well. Here they swear falsely in making a covenant. After this their covenant there is a great deal of injustice among them.

"Thus judgment springeth up as hemlock." By "judgment" some understand the judgments of God, and then the sense is, Those wicked ways of yours are the seeds that bring up God's judgments, as hemlock, bitter and deadly. There is a truth in this interpretation, though I think it is not the full scope of the words here; but it may be, the Holy Ghost would hint some such thing unto us in it, that our actions are as seeds, and sown here, they will bring forth according to their nature. Wicked actions, when sown, will bring forth bitter fruit, will bring forth hemlock. It may be, saith he, you look for peace and prosperity; but, contrary to your expectation, behold hemlock and bitterness. I beseech you, take heed of preparing to yourselves a potion of hemlock against you lie sick and are cast upon your death-bed: a man has sown his field, he thinks to have a good crop of corn, but judgment, the judgment of God, comes up, and there is hemlock instead of it.

But because I think this not to be the scope of the place, therefore I pass it by, and rather think that by "judgment" is here meant, righteousness, equity, and justice.

That whereas there should be righteousness, equity, and justice; behold, instead, there springs up a crop of oppression, unrighteousness, and injustice, that is bitter as hemlock. I rather think that this must be the meaning, because I find that in divers scriptures injustice is compared to bitter things, yea, to hemlock itself: in

Amos v. 7, "Ye who turn judgment to wormwood, and leave off righteousness in the earth." And in Amos vi. 12, "Ye have turned judgment into gall, and the fruit of righteousness into hemlock." I will not stand to open the former text, but you see the Scripture charges the people, by this expression, of sinning against judgment and righteousness, that they turned it to hemlock.

Now I find three things especially recorded of this herb.

First, It is a very venomous herb; therefore I find Pliny records of it, in the 25th Book, 13th chapter of his Natural History, that the Athenians were wont to give it to malefactors that were condemned to die. And Socrates, that was so wise a man among them, because he did not yield to their gods, but spake against them, maintaining there was but one God, therefore they adjudged him to die by drinking hemlock.

Secondly, I find the same author saith of it, that the leaves are somewhat like to coriander, but more tender, and with a strong, stinking smell, and the seeds like to aniseed. So justice seems to have a very fair pretence sometimes, and to do things that are very good; under very fair pretences men are very unjust: the leaves when they come up one would think there should be such a fine fruit, one would think to have coriander or anise, but the truth is, it comes to hemlock at last.

Thirdly, That which Jerome reports of it in his comment on my text, where he saith, that hemlock grows up very stiff and full of joints, and that at the joints it puts forth stalks, which not only sprout upwards and bear fruit, but downwards to form roots; and he saith that every branch, if it has but a joint in it, will serve instead of a seed; yea, he saith, if any pieces fall on the ground, they will grow up so as that it will be very hard to extirpate them. And truly thus it resembles injustice, which, if let alone but a little, oh how quickly it multiplies and spreads itself through the whole land!

Pliny too observes, That the root of it is hollow, and so unfit for any use at all. And so are the hearts of the unjust, hollow hearts and unfit for any thing.

That the leaves are beneficial for swellings, and sore eyes. And God turns even the injustice that is many times among a people to be medicines to his people against their swellings, and to open their sore eyes.

That if hemlock be drank in wine, it will certainly kill a man, and that without remedy. So if men be unjust, and take delight in their injustice, and scorn and contemn those that they can oppress, such men are in a desperate condition indeed.

And lastly, That this herb kills by cold; that if the leaves or seeds get the mastery of any, they feel themselves begin to wax cold in their inward parts, and so die inwardly. Oh! how many who have been very hot and zealous, yet, having gotten power into their hands and unrighteously used it, have grown cold in that in which they were formerly zealous, and still grow colder and colder; and thus their unrighteousness is like to prove their death!

"In the furrows of the field." Calvin puts this question, Why doth he not say, It springs up in the field, but "in the furrows of the field?" And he gives this answer to it, Where there are furrows in the field, there has the plough come that has broken up the field; and it is to prepare for good seed when the field is laid in furrows, and therefore less tolerable for hemlock to spring up there than in the field that is not ploughed, or in other unprepared ground. When a field is ploughed and prepared for seed, and one would hope to have much advantage by his field, to have much justice and righteousness in a country; where we see there have been great works of God to cast out those that were unjust before, and the expectation of all the people is, that certainly now there will be nothing but righteousness and judgment; when, instead of that, comes up injustice and oppression; as hemlock, when it springeth up in such a field that is so prepared for justice; this is a sore evil; the Lord is much provoked against, and so complains of it, "that judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field."

Obs. 1. That people is in a sad condition, and it is a sign the Lord has forsaken them, that they are near ruin, when in those places where there is most likelihood of justice and equity, there exist injustice and oppression. Oppression and injustice in places where God expects righteousness and equity, is a sad omen, a forerunner of great evil to places. It is God's complaint, in Isa. v.; just before he threatened the utter spoiling of his vineyard, he gives this reason, "I looked that it should bring forth grapes, and behold, it brought forth wild grapes." And he mentions, among the wild grapes, injustice: there it is called "wild grapes," as "hemlock" here, for both are very sour, and bitter before the Lord. Injustice in places from whence justice may be expected, is by the Lord accounted a most fearful, a ruining, sin. In Amos v. 12, "I know" (saith the Lord) "your manifold transgressions and your mighty sins." Now the word translated "mighty sins," in the Hebrew signifies your bony sins, because the strength of a man is in his bones; and therefore he calls the strength of that sin bony; it is a very strong sin, it cannot easily be resisted. Your sins have great bones in them, saith he; and what are they? You afflict the just, you take a bribe, that you may turn away the poor in the gate from their right: those are their great and their mighty sins. In Jer. xxii. 15—17, "Did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice? and then it was well with him?" Again, "He judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well with him;" and, "Was not this to know me? saith the Lord." Let men talk never so much of reformation, and of setting up the worship of God, and of casting out false worship, yet if they rejoice in injustice and oppression instead of that, God will not take himself as known. "But," saith he, "thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for violence, to do it." And in Amos v. 21, is a remarkable place for this, "I hate," saith he, "I despise your feast days, and I will not smell in your solemn assemblies." You have many feast days, and days of thanksgiving; you bless me for what I do for you, but I will not care for your days of thanksgiving. Why? In the 24th verse, "But let judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream." As if he should say, Keep as many days of thanksgiving as you will, I care for none of them, except "judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream." Mark here the expression of the Holy Ghost; judgment and righteousness is compared to a river; that is, it should be common for all, that the poorest might come and take of it as well as the richest: it must not be like a pond, or well, enclosed for a man's private use, "But," saith he, "let judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream," as a river; it must be as a river. Now, you know, from the Thames every poor person may come and fetch water for their relief. So justice should be like the water in the Thames, that the poorest of all may have it for the very fetching of it. But till then, saith he, I regard none of your days of thanksgiving. And so in Isa. lviii., there is one special reason why the days of fasting were not regarded, it was because of their oppression of the poor, and their uncharitableness, and their injuriousness in the courts of justice. We have now many days of fasting and thanksgiving, more than ever yet England knew, and we may think that God will smell a sweet savour; but oh! this hemlock coming up "in the furrows of the field" will imbitter all, for if ever God did look for righteousness and judgment from a people, then certainly he looks for righteousness and judgment from us at this day. Oh! for us now, that stand in need of so much mercy, that cry for mercy, that we should be oppressing at such a time as this, it is a most dreadful thing. What! is all the cost that God has bestowed upon us come to this, that there should be no other fruit but hemlock come up in the furrows of the field? all the cost of God and man, all the works of God towards us, do they come but to this issue, only to bring forth hemlock? Were there ever more cries, were there ever more bitter moans and complaints, because of injustice, than of late have been in this land? Never were people so frustrated in their expectations. When indeed such as were notoriously wicked were in place, then we expected nothing but hemlock; but now they are cast out, and others come in, we hoped that there had been such a preparation that nothing but fruits of righteousness would have come up. But now, to be oppressed by them that are in the places of former oppressors, this is grievous. Lord, what is man? In Isa. lix. 9, it is said, "Therefore is judgment far from us, neither doth justice overtake us: we wait for light, but behold obscurity; for brightness, but we walk in darkness." This light is especially spoken of the light of justice; as if they should say, The land once indeed was dark, all the courts of judicature, and all the men that had places to judge in, were darkness, we had nothing but darkness; yea, but now we waited for light, we hoped now there would be reformation; it is spoken after their many days of fasting and prayer; but yet, behold darkness, behold oppression still. Oh! many who are come empty into places of power such harder than some former oppressors did. And what will be the end of these things? How many poor men travel many times far, expecting fruits of justice, but they meet with hemlock! they sigh and lift up their eyes and hearts to heaven, sending up their moans to God, Lord, is this the fruit of our labour? do our hopes come to this? what! must we go home with sad hearts, and be made a scorn and prey to those that are wicked round about us? Oh! these are sad moans at such times as the present.

My brethren, it were easy to name many stalks of hemlock that there are come up amongst us instead of righteousness and judgment. I will name one or two.

First, That such as have been notoriously malignant, yea, such as have been upon actual war, should yet, upon any slight acknowledgment, or from having for their own ends taken covenant, get into committees, and have power there over the well-affected party who have been most forward from the first; that now those who hate them, and have spirits full of bitterness against them, should have power over them to tax them as they please; power over their estates, their liberty; power to order the affairs of the country round about them, and to revenge themselves upon them because they were so forward in the beginning; what grows in the furrows here but bitter and venomous hemlock? Where the fault lies, that we cannot determine; but such men, doing such things, in such places, it is nothing but "hemlock in the furrows of the field."

Secondly, Here is another stalk of hemlock, That poor men, taken from their families, who were the only means of support to their wives and children, yet should be so left without pay themselves, that their wives and children are destitute of bread and clothing; and officers in an army, who were but mean men heretofore, and knew scarce how to live, should now live bravely, glisten in their gold and silver lace; what is this but hemlock? Is not here injustice and oppression? that thousands should want food, that widows and children should cry out for bread, who lived pretty well heretofore; and others who before knew not how to live, yet now shall be brave in a far higher way than ever formerly; is not here hemlock that grows up "in the furrows of the field?" I know not neither where to charge this, but yet we see hemlock both come up.

But now, though we might name many other stalks of hemlock, yet certainly take this caution along with you.

Every man in times of distraction, such as those wherein we live, must account to suffer something, things cannot be carried on with that equity as if all things were settled among us; therefore, though we may in a humble and peaceable way make our moans one to another, and seek to inform those that are in power, and petition, yet it ought to be our care, whatever we suffer in our particular, to preserve as far as we can the honour of our supreme court; better many suffer individually hard things, than the honour of that should not be kept up, for by not maintaining that we make way to suffer worse things than ever yet we have done. For how would we have help when we meet with wrong and injustice? Under God there are but three ways, two extremes, and one middle, for men to have right in case of injustice.

1. The king's arbitrary power, acted by those that are about him. We have tasted enough of this hemlock heretofore; would we think to have our help that way? We know what that hemlock means.

2. The appeal to the people. That were a remedy worse than the disease, for then all would seem to come to be in a confusion that way; if the people, the generality of the people, should take up the matter, we should then have nothing but murders and robberies. Then the meanest man in the kingdom, if he has but as strong arms and legs as the richest of all, he is presently equal with them, when things come to be redressed by the tumultuous people.

3. Therefore the third means of help in case of injustice is, the mean, that is, our parliament, which, as things are now, is the only regular help that we can have. If therefore we see or feel some things amiss, we may be sensible and seek help too, but in a peaceable and humble way of petitioning, being more tender of their honour than of our own private right. And an appeal to Heaven there may be likewise; but by an appeal to either of the two extremes, certainly in that we make our remedy worse than the disease. Pray much for them therefore, that there may not one stalk of hemlock rise up among them, or any seed fall down from them, but that they may be as the field which the Lord has blessed, full of the fruits of justice and righteousness; that themselves, and this city, and the kingdom, may be the habitation of justice; that mercy and truth may meet together, that righteousness and peace may kiss each other; that truth may spring out of the earth, and righteousness look down from heaven, Psal. lxxxv. 10, 11.

Now there is one note more, that I find in Tremelius, Pareus, and many others, on the words, "the furrows of the field." In the latter end of the word translated "field," there is, say they, a jod, which by some is considered paralogical, or a formal addition only, but by others as an affix for the plural number; and so they translate it thus, hemlock in the furrows of my field. And that is a great aggravation. Hemlock in the furrows of any field is an evil: but what! my people, men that profess godliness? what! those that profess to set up reformation, yet hemlock there in the furrows of my field? Oh this is sad and evil indeed! In Jer. xxxi. 23, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; As yet they shall use this speech in the land of Judah and in the cities thereof, when I shall bring again their captivity; The Lord bless thee, O habitation of justice, and mountain of holiness." When I bring their captivity again, and own them to be mine, then there shall be such eminent justice and holiness that this speech shall be used, "The Lord bless thee, O habitation of justice, and mountain of holiness." So if we would have any evidence to our souls that God does own us, and that we are his, and God indeed has delivered us from our captivity, we should labour that justice and holiness may be so eminent that all the people about us may say, The Lord bless this land, the "habitation of justice, and mountain of holiness." Both must go together; we must not think to raise up the ordinances of God, and cast out superstition, but we must be "the habitation of justice," as well as "the mountain of holiness," if we be the land that the Lord has blessed.

Ver. 5. The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Beth-aven: for the people thereof shall mourn over it, and the priests thereof that rejoiced on it, for the glory thereof, because it is departed from it.

"The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear." You heard before that they were convinced in their consciences that they did not fear God: "For now they shall say, We have no king, because we feared not the Lord." They feared not God, but now they shall fear: "The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear."

Obs. 1. That those that fear God least, are most afraid of every thing else. Where the fear of God is not, other base fears will be; and so much the more, the less we fear God. Oh how much better were it that our fear were set upon God, than upon other things! You must love something; were it not better that your love were placed upon God than on any thing else? And you must fear something; were it not better that your fear were upon God, than any thing else? And you must rejoice in something, and sorrow, and the like. Fear is a very troublesome affection if misplaced. O, learn to place your affections right, place them upon God. By the fear of God you shall come to fear nothing else; oh how excellent is God's fear! This one thing sets out the excellency of the fear of God; that where the fear of God is settled in the heart, all other base fears are rooted out. Would not you be glad to be delivered from creature fears, especially you that have lived in many dangers a few months since? Oh, if you might be delivered from the fears of the creature, how glad would you be! Here is the only way; let the fear of God be strong in your hearts, and the fear of the creature will not prevail with you. You see it clearly in the example of Habakkuk, Hab. iii. 16, "When I heard, my belly trembled; my lips quivered at the voice: rottenness entered into my bones, and I trembled in myself." But now, Habakkuk, why trouble yourself with so much fear? Mark, a great good came to him by it; "that I might rest in the day of trouble, when he cometh up unto the people." When there shall be a coming up unto the people, and the enemy shall prevail, and when "the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls;" when things shall be brought into the very saddest condition, so that men shall be at their wit's end, and know not what in the world to do; then, saith he, "I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." When God spake, then "my belly trembled, and my lips quivered at the voice." Yea, but when men came in the greatest rage, and when all things were dark, and dismal, and black abroad, yet then did I "rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation;" all fear was gone. Men can rejoice in the time of their prosperity, but in times of affliction then they fear; whereas those that fear the Lord in their prosperity, in the season of their affliction may most rejoice. Nazianzen, in his 12th Oration, saith well, This is our care, that we are afraid of nothing more than that we should fear any thing more than God. That is his expression. Here is an excellent fear, a fear rightly set. Would you fear? fear to fear any thing more than God, and then your fear is set right; but if you do not, &c. Though men that have no fear of God may seem to have bold spirits, and it seems to result from the greatness of their spirits that they will not fear God, yet these men in the time of danger are the most base, cowardly men in the world. I will give you a notable instance for this: Manasses was a proud and insolent man, that seemed to be fearless of any threatening of God, and scorned his prophets; but mark, when he came into danger, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, where did they find Manasses? He was run into the bushes; this brave, bold-spirited man, that dared God and his prophets, and cared not for what was said, yet in danger what a base, low spirit had he! he runs and hides himself in the midst of bushes and briers.

This is the temper and guise of the spirits of men that will not fear God.

"Because of the calves of Beth-aven." You know what they were, those that Jeroboam set up in Dan and Beth-el, the golden calves.

Luther, upon the place, moves a question; What a wonderful thing is it (saith he) that Jeroboam should be so bold as to set up calves to worship, when there is that eminent story of God's revenging himself for the people's worshipping a calf that Aaron set up, that at one time cost the lives of twenty-three thousand men, and yet that Jeroboam should presume to set up calves again to worship! It was a strange, bold attempt, saith Luther, it was a wonderful thing that he should be so bold, and that he should prevail with the people. Luther thus answers this question: The truth is, there is nothing so horrible and vile but people in a little time will be brought to yield to; if great ones, by their example and by their endeavours, labour to set it up, it will be set up; and, be it never so vile, never so abominable, the people will be brought to receive it. That is his answer.

And truly we find it so, that let people seem to abhor things never so much, yet if they find it be the wish of great ones, and if it be once set up in a way of power, they yield to it. One would think it an impossible thing, God having now cast so much odium upon our prelates, for the people of England ever to be brought to yield to them, and I make no question but many of you say so when you meet together; but do not deceive yourselves, if so be that those had prevailed that sought to prevail against us, we should quickly have the spirits of people turned, and as much for prelates, and ceremonies, and altars, (the generality of the people I mean,) as here they were for these calves again, though they had that sad story in their ears continually, of so many thousands that were slain for calves before.

"Because of the calves of Beth-aven." Why, were there many calves at Beth-aven? Indeed there were calves at Dan and Beth-el, but there was but one at each of them. This Beth-aven and Beth-el were the same. Jeroboam was so subtle to set up the calf at Beth-el, because the place took its name from God; but here the Holy Ghost calls it Beth-aven, a house of vanity, or iniquity. We may call things by names that may hold up some honour and respect, but God will give another name to these things on which we would fain put honour.

He calls it "Beth-aven," and "the calves of Beth-aven." Why, were there many calves at Beth-aven?

Now the answer that some give is this: There was but one at Beth-el indeed; but both Beth-el and Dan may have the name Beth-aven, (for they are both houses of vanity,) and so "calves" mentioned here in respect of them both.

Others thus: "The calves of Beth-aven." As if the prophet should say, Set up as many calves as you will, they shall not help you if you had a thousand of them.

But rather, as I find Arias Montanus, with others, say, they are called the calves of Beth-aven, because, according to the example of the calf that was set up at Beth-aven, their workmen made other little ones for their houses. Like as Demetrius the silversmith made shrines for Diana's temple, and it was his trade also to make little temples in silver, either to hang about their necks, or to be set up in their houses as ornaments; so probably the calf set up at Beth-aven had so much honour put upon it, that they had little things like to it made of wood, or silver, or gold, according to their estates; and so had them in their families; and therefore they are called "calves," in the plural number. And if this were so we might have a good note:

Obs. 1. That the true worshippers of God should labour to bring his true worship into their families. They would bring the calf into their families, or houses; so should we bring the ordinances and worship of God into our families, and not content ourselves with public worship, but have private worship too: they did not content themselves with a calf abroad, but had them at home in their houses or families.

But further, some remark, They are called the calves in the feminine gender, the she-calves, by way of contempt.

"The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear, because of the calves of Beth-aven." Why "the inhabitants of Samaria?" The calves were not there. Samaria was their chief city; as London is to England, so Samaria was the chief city to the ten tribes. "The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear." Samaria was a very strong city; and when the Assyrians came and carried away the ten tribes captive, they took all the country round about before they took Samaria. It was with Samaria as with London in these sad times; when there have been wars round about in England, London has been safe for these three years together. And so when there were wars in all Israel, yet Samaria continued safe; yea, not only when some towns, but when every town was taken, Samaria was so strong as to be able to endure a siege for three years together: thus you find in 2 Kings xvii. 5, that the king of Assyria came and besieged Samaria three years: yet, this being so, the text saith, "The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear, because of the calves of Beth-aven." That is, though they were a strong city, yet when they heard that their gods were taken away, yea, when they did but hear that Beth-el and Dan were in danger of having their gods taken away, they felt this; and though they themselves were safe in their outward condition for the present, and had strength enough to resist the enemies, yet they were afraid; that is, there was a solicitous fear in them about the calves of Beth-aven before they were taken, and when they were taken their hearts were daunted, and they knew not what in the world to do. Thus you see the meaning of the words. Whence,

Obs. 2. In times of danger our hearts should be most solicitous about the worship of God. It was so in the season of their danger, their hearts were especially solicitous about Beth-el, where they had the worship of their gods. So are idolaters solicitous in time of danger, not so much because of their outward peace, (it is not said that they were afraid because the enemies would come and take their corn, or their estates,) but for Beth-aven, where the calves were, they feared. When there is any danger, the honour of God, his church, his ordinances, should lie nearest to our hearts: thus it was with old Eli; "Eli sat upon a seat by the wayside watching: for his heart trembled for the ark of God," 1 Sam. iv. 13. He had his sons in the army, yet his heart did not tremble for them, nor that if the enemies should prevail he was likely to lose his estate, and there would come woeful misery upon the land; no, his heart trembled not for these, but for "the ark of God." I appeal to you, what was that which your hearts trembled most for in the time of our greatest danger? Was it for "the ark of God?" was it because of his ordinances? Oh! if they prevail they will trample the ordinances of the Lord and the saints of God under feet. The true worship of God, and the power of godliness, did your hearts tremble because of this? Certainly if your hearts were right they would do so. What! shall idolaters tremble because of their calves, and shall not our hearts tremble because of our God? 1 Kings viii. 44, 45, "If thy people go out to battle against their enemy, whithersoever thou shalt send them," what should they do? "and shall pray unto the Lord toward the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house that I have built for thy name: then hear thou in heaven." In prayer they must look towards the city and the temple; for the temple was a type of Christ, so the city was a type of God's ordinances, where the people went up to worship. Oh! that should be in our eyes. The city where the ordinances of God are, when we go to war let that be in our eyes, and let that make us fight valiantly; and when we are praying to God, let us not pray so much that we may be delivered from our adversaries, as that the temple and the city of our God may be preserved.

Obs. 3. Cities that are strong and safe themselves, should be sensible of the miseries of others. "The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear." God knows how far we have been wanting in this very thing; if a stranger had come out of another country into London, and walked about the streets, could he have imagined that there were such civil wars in this land as there are, such wonderful desolations as have been made in other parts? Oh how little did we lay the afflictions of others to heart, because they were at some distance from us! Oh the mercy of our God, that has not brought us into the same evils and miseries! this one sin had been enough to have provoked God against us, because we were so little sensible of the miseries of the surrounding countries and cities. This Samaria was full of wickedness, yet when they heard what dangers Beth-el and Dan, and their other cities, were in, oh, they were mightily affected with it. Learn we from hence to be humbled for our shortcomings in this respect, and if ever the Lord should yet try us further, let us learn to be sensible of the miseries of others that are about us.

Obs. 3. There is no staidness of heart in resting upon any thing but the living God. They that stay themselves upon any thing else, if any afflictions or dangers happen, their hearts are filled with fear presently. They are afraid "because of the calves." When their calves are gone, all their confidence is gone, and then their hearts are overwhelmed with fear. When men have nothing to rest upon but their own inventions, their own ways, no marvel though they fear in times of danger; they begin to bethink now that all that they rested upon is vanity: yea, the service of God, that men in times of prosperity can rest upon and can satisfy their consciences withal, yet in time of danger it will not do; no inventions of men, no external duties of religion, especially such as are mixed with superstition, will then uphold the heart from being overwhelmed; it is only the confidence in the living God, the union of our souls with Jesus Christ, and enjoyment of communion with him in his own ordinances, that can comfort our souls in time of danger. So it is said of the godly in Psal. cxii. 7, 8, "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord. His heart is established, he shall not be afraid." It is again repeated; let evil tidings, come what will, his heart is fixed, because he trusts in the Lord.

"For the people thereof." Here he speaks of the calf of Beth-aven in the singular number, for the people of it, that is, of the calf; for so I find the word "thereof" referred by most interpreters, to the calf, not to Samaria. From thence the note would be,

Obs. 4. Idolaters dedicated themselves to their idols, they were the people of the idol. Those that were the very peculiar treasure of God and his own people, now are called the people of the calf, for they have none to go to for help, but only to that idol of theirs; they had forsaken God.

"Shall mourn over it." Though certainly at first the setting up of the calf could not but be a very strange thing to the people of Israel, yet after a little they were used to it, and paid it worship; and it took their very consciences, so that they loved it, and when it was taken away they mourned, and were in extreme distress and trouble.

Obs. 5. Idolaters do mourn when their false worship is taken from them. At this day, my brethren, how do many mourn after the superstitious vanities and customs that they were wont to have! Now prelates, and service-book, and altars, and such kind of things are taken away, and when they meet together they exclaim, Oh! now all religion is gone! So they persuade poor people in remote parts, that the parliament has taken away all religion; and there is a great mourning in their spirits, they think they know not how in the world to serve God if their book be taken away from them: and I make no question it has been a cause that many have taken up arms, merely to defend such their superstitious vanities and customs. They mourn for their wonted burials for the dead, and would almost as lieve lose their lives as such kind of things. I remember I have read of some Indians that were wont to worship an ape's tooth, a religious relic among them; and that when it was taken from them, they so mourned its loss that they came and offered a very great price, even many thousands, to redeem this their ape's tooth, because it was a religious relic. And so we have men this day who, though their superstitious vanities and customs be no better than a very ape's tooth, yet mourn over them, and would be willing to part with a great proportion of their estate to redeem them again, they mourn after their calves.

Oh! how then should we mourn after the true worship of God, how dear should that be to our souls! For if calves, superstitious relics and customs, ape's teeth, and such things be so dear to idolaters; oh! those ordinances of God in which our souls have met with so much soul-refreshings and communion with God, in which so much of the Spirit of God and such enlightenings have been imparted to our souls, oh! how should we mourn after them! You that have gotten any thing by the word or by his ordinances, that have ever known what it has been to have communion with God in them, you should think with yourselves, if these should be taken from me, then I should have cause to mourn indeed. I have lost much of my estate, and my friends, many of them are gone, and these are a cause of mourning; oh! but if I should lose the ordinances and worship of God, what cause would there be then of mourning!

"And the priests thereof that rejoiced on it." The priests especially mourn. The word here translated "priests," is in the Hebrew כֹּהֲנִים and I find the word from whence it comes signifies three things.

1. To sound aloud : and so some think that therefore they are called Chemarims, because of the clamorous sounds they were wont to make in their superstitious worship : just as we were wont to have bellowing in the cathedrals, so they were wont to have, and therefore were called Chemarims, because of their mighty noises and sounds that they were wont to have.

2. To burn, or to be hot : and so Luther understands the word, and saith, that they were called Chemarims from their burning desires after their ways of false worship.

3. To be black from burning ; because those things that are burnt are made black. When the flame first takes hold upon a thing it makes it black : and so Chemarims are as much as black ones, or indeed black coats,* in allusion to the black garments that they were wont to use. And I find in 2 Kings xxiii. 5, that this word here rendered "priests," is there used for "idolatrous priests." Those black coats that were then, accounted it a kind of religion to go in black, and from thence they derived the name. And though certainly it is fit for the ministers of the gospel to go gravely and decently, and not to express lightness and vanity in their garments, yet so to regard black, as if necessarily they must wear black coats, and no other garments will serve the turn, savours of superstitious vanity. Though gravity be required in their very garments, yet to stand so much upon the very colour may be dangerous ; and for those that are looked upon as religious men, that they should be tied and bound to it, is, I say, evil. They were wont to do so here : and so almost all your heathens and superstitious people have had always a special colour for the garments of their priests ; so the Turks have green, others different colours. Thus much for the name Chemarims.

"The priests that rejoiced on it;" that is, they that did exalt over the calves. The priests got the king on their side, and made the calves brave, and had a splendid kind of worship, and many pompous ceremonies ; the priests gloried in this, for they had a special hand in all, and because they had the countenance of authority for their calves, they were able to crush any that spake against them, they "rejoiced on it," saith the text.

But now it is threatened, that they shall mourn ; those priests that did so glory in their calves, (as who were they that did glory so much in pompous altars and other outward adornings, as your priests ?) they exulted and had all under them, and would quickly crush a man reluctant to yield to them ; they did even brave it over all, and call themselves sometimes the triumphant clergy, just like your Chemarims ; but now here they were like to lose all, and they mourned.

Polanus, on this very place, refers it to the fat livings, parsonages, prebendaries, deaneries, and bishoprics, and such kind of preferments. Oh how do our prelates and their satellites mourn this day for the loss of these things ! Thus they that did so rejoice to expect preferment, are gone now, the world is at an end with them, and they mourn one to another because of the loss of such things as these are : and long may they mourn upon this ground. In Rev. xviii. such people are well set forth : upon the fall of Babylon, the text saith, that "the merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her ; for no man buyeth their merchandise any more:" then in ver. 14, "The fruits that thy soul lusted after are departed from thee:" and in ver. 15, "The merchants of these things, which were made rich by her, stood afar off, weeping and wailing." Those that were made rich by the whore of Babylon stand afar off, weeping and wailing. And so weep and wail those made rich by the prelates, and by superstitious vanities ; and blessed be God that we see them mourn that did so triumph and rejoice over the people of God ; blessed be God that he has so changed things, that now they hang down their heads and mourn, even because of their calves that are taken from them.

"For the glory thereof." They sought to make them as glorious as they could, and they accounted them very glorious. Now shall wicked men, idolaters, account their idol worship glorious ? Oh how glorious should the worship of God be in our eyes, the true spiritual worship of God ! Let the true ministers of God learn not to glory in the flesh, but desire to "know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified."

"Is departed." For divers years together the worship of the calves had a great deal of glory put upon it, but it went away. And so you know what glory was upon our prelates, and such kind of worship as they of late set up, but "the glory thereof is departed." And look to it, whatever the inventions of men are, if unsanctioned by God, the glory will depart from them.

Ver. 6. It shall be also carried unto Assyria for a present to king Jareb : Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel.

"It shall be carried unto Assyria for a present to king Jareb." What king Jareb was you heard in the fifth chapter : his name signifies a helper : as now the king of France is designated The most Christian king ; our king, The defender of the faith ; so king Jareb was called The helper. Now the calves are to be sent to king Jareb, that was their help. Some think that they sent it for a present, but the text will not bear that ; but his soldiers, taking Dan and Beth-el, send the calves to king Jareb as a trophy, as that which they knew he would much rejoice in : they rested much upon king Jareb as a help to them, and now their form of worship, their very religion, is at Jareb's disposal, for he has now the calves in his hand, to do with them what he will.

Obs. 1. Our dependence on men for help is dearly bought, if it comes to that, that they shall have the disposal of our religion. Jareb was their helper, and they would have him to help them ; but now their calves are sent to him for a present, and Jareb has the disposal of them for their religion.

Obs. 2. Idolaters are wont to rejoice much when they get one another's gods. As when the Philistines got the ark, they rejoiced much, they carried it to Dagon's temple. Also the enemies of the church will rejoice much if they can get the power to trample upon our religion ; they will rejoice much if they can get your estates, but they will rejoice more if they can do what they will with you in regard to your religion. Oh ! this would be that which would make them glad at the very heart, if they could control us in our worship. Oh ! let us know this beforehand, that we may cry to God the more earnestly, that whatever the Lord gives them power over, he would not give them power over our religion ; for at that they most aim.

"Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel." Jerome upon the place refers to this tradition of the Jews : That the priests of the calves had taken away the golden ones and set up calves of brass instead, only gilt over with gold ; and now the king of Israel, when he was in straits, sent these calves to king Jareb for a present to pacify his anger, and the shipping, as 1 Kings xviii. 27, or to be a common name whereby those idolatrous priests were known, as 2 Kings xxiii. on which place see Munster's Annotations.

king of Assyria, supposing that the calves were of gold, rejoiced, but afterwards, when he found that they were of brass, he sent messengers to the king of Israel to tell him how he had cozened him, and thereupon the king and all the people were ashamed. But this is but a tradition of theirs, and not very probable. But I rather take the following to be the true interpretation :

“Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed,” that is, their hopes shall fail them, and they shall see their counsels come to nothing, and this shall cause them shame and confusion of face. The ten tribes “shall receive shame.” Failing in our hopes makes us to be ashamed. They had good hopes they should prevail because of their calves, but now their calves are taken from them, and now they are ashamed. So Job vi. 20, “They were confounded because they had hoped; they came thither, and were ashamed:” they hoped to have relief, but had not, and therefore they were ashamed; the disappointment of hopes causes great shame. Oh, then, what shame and confusion will there be at the great day, when we shall be disappointed of our last hopes! If we had been disappointed of our hopes now in respect of our adversaries, oh what shame would have been upon the people of God! our adversaries would have cast shame upon us, and said, What is become of your fastings and prayers? As it is likely the Assyrians did when they took the calves; Oh, now we have gotten your gods, said they; and upon this the people were ashamed: and so if our adversaries had prevailed they would have reviled us in like manner. My brethren, we have cause to bless the Lord from our souls that he has delivered us from such a temptation, as to be ashamed of our hopes; though the truth is, if we considered aright we should not have been ashamed, for our hopes were not so much in the saving of our estates, as in this, that God would acknowledge his own cause in the end; and so our hopes would not have failed: yea, but if they had but apparently failed, if the enemy had but seemed to have prevailed, I say, it would have been a mighty temptation for us to have been ashamed of our hopes. Oh! blessed be God for preventing this, that the Lord has not even for a season made his people ashamed of their hopes and prayers! The ministers of God can stand up and look comfortably on their congregations, because they incited people, and encouraged their hearts in this cause; and they have comfort to their souls in this, that when things were at the lowest, yet still they could place their hopes on God, and believe yet in God that he would go on in such a cause as this is; and the Lord has not caused the expectation of his poor people to fail. But if it be shame (I say) now to be disappointed in some present hopes, O remember, in the midst of earthly disappointments, what shame would it be before men and angels if it should prove that any soul in this place should be disappointed of their last hopes! Thou hast hopes of salvation, and of eternal life, and if it should prove, when all secrets are to be made public before the Lord Jesus and his angels, that all thy hopes are but delusions, what would become of thee? David prays, “O Lord, let me not be disappointed of my hope.” Let that be thy prayer, especially in regard of thy last hopes. In I John ii. 28, we are counselled to “abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.” Oh, that is the comfort of the saints, that they shall not be ashamed at the coming of Jesus Christ; and many that are not ashamed now, yet at the coming of Jesus Christ, oh the shame that shall be cast upon them! But the main emphasis lies in the words that follow.

“Of his own counsel.” Now what was that counsel? What? why it was this. The counsel that was between Jeroboam and his princes and the priests, together with some eminent men of the people, first, for the setting up of false worship; secondly, for the forcing of all men that belonged to the ten tribes to forbear going to Jerusalem. This was thought a notable plot, a notable counsel, they considered it to be the only means to keep things in peace among them. Why, (say they,) if we shall suffer every one that has a fancy in his head, to go to Jerusalem to worship, we shall have nothing but confusion; and therefore let us take such a course that people shall have a place to worship in, and a form to worship by: it is but only a few that are so strict that they must needs worship in Jerusalem, and therefore let us determine this, that we will have a constant form obligatory on every one, and we will have no more going to this Jerusalem to worship, but they shall be content to worship at Dan and Beth-el, and this will keep things in peace. Now this counsel seemed to be a fine plot to keep things in order. But, saith the Lord, “Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel;” though they think those men who advise thus sage and wise, yea, even good men, and earnest for peace, and so cry up mightily the counsel, yet the Lord “sitteth in the heavens,” and “laughs,” and saith, “Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel.” Perhaps now, whilst they are permitted to carry all before them, they bless themselves in their counsel, and think it very excellent, and approved of by God; but when my time shall come, when they shall see what evil it brings upon them, then they shall be ashamed of their counsel.

Obs. 3. Men's own counsels bring shame to them, especially in religion. Men naturally are very blind in the things of God, they do not see far in them; their hearts are full of corruptions, which strongly bias them: we may instance some.

1. There is much self-love in men: any thing that is men's own is much regarded, a great deal more than truth that is another man's; if it be their own they mind that, but let another man speak that which has truth, it is little regarded. There is in men's hearts much violence to maintain their own counsels, and therefore it is very like that their counsels will bring them to shame. There is nothing that men can bear to be contradicted in, less than in their counsels. And the more men are set upon their own counsels, the more likely are they to bring them shame in the conclusion.

2. A judgment from God comes upon men's spirits, if they will follow out their own counsels; I say, there is ordinarily a judgment of God upon them to leave them to folly when they rest upon their own counsels. So it is threatened in Psal. lxxxi. 11, 12, as a great judgment of God upon men, to give them up to their counsels: “My people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me. So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust: and they walked in their own counsels.” Oh! it is a terrible place; I beseech you consider it well: these are times wherein every one is plotting; oh! tremble at these words, “I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust; and they walked in their own counsels.” Men's own counsels bring them to shame; oftentimes they come to nothing after they have made a great deal of stir, so that they are fain to sit down, and there is an end of all their labour; perhaps they have laboured to advance their counsels by much evil, much sin, much heart-burning, and when it comes to all, there it lies, there is an end of it; thus they are ashamed of their counsels. Yea, many times the counsels of men work quite contrary; God much glories in this, in making use of men's own counsels to bring them into snares. What has brought our adversaries into snares but their own counsels? What brought the prelates down but their own counsels? so that they would bite their very fingers for what they did in their pretestation. God has been pleased to deal thus graciously for us, to bring our enemies into snares by their own counsels. So in Job xviii. 7, it is said of the wicked, "his own counsel shall cast him down." And Psal. ix. 16, "The wicked is snared in the work of his own hands. Higgaion. Selah." You have not those two words conjoined elsewhere in the whole book of God. It seems to imply that it is a thing to be meditated on very much, that "the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands." O consider this work of God, in bringing men down by their own counsels!

It is just that it should be so; for men provoke God by their counsels, Psal. cvi. 43. Oh! the Lord looks upon the counsels of men, and is much provoked by them, and therefore just it is with him to make their counsels so to be a snare to them, that they should be ashamed of them at the last. It concerns us therefore, my brethren, to look to our counsels, what they are. I will give you a few rules about them, that they may not bring you shame.

First, Keep out from your counsels those things that would hinder you. As,

1. False principles; be not actuated in your counsels by false principles.

2. Wicked men; take heed that they do not join with you in your counsels; as in Job xxi. 16, "Lo, their good is not in their hand: the counsel of the wicked is far from me;" and so in Job xxii. 18. O keep out wicked men from your counsels.

3. Your own ends; take heed how they come in: if any of a man's own ends come into his counsels, they will warp them.

4. Conceitedness, and pride; when you come to counsel, O take heed of a conceited spirit, in leaning to your own understanding; God is wont to blast such.

5. Flesh and blood, "I conferred not with flesh and blood," saith Paul, Gal. i. 16: I did not look to carnal excellency, but laid all such aside; they would have advised me to this and that, and I should never have done as I did if I had consulted with flesh and blood.

6. Passion and frowardness. "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness: and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong," Job v. 13. If once you find in your counsels your hearts begin to be hot, rather break off; take heed of resolutions formed at such a time. It is a safe way for you, if you would consult about business of moment, as soon as heat appears to fall to prayer; we had need of cool and quiet spirits when we are consulting: as, if you would weigh a thing exactly with gold scales, (as in counsels we should weigh things very exactly,) you would not weigh in the midst of a wind: when men's passions begin to be up they weigh things as a man would weigh gold abroad in the wind; they cannot weigh exactly. Take heed then of passion in your counsels.

Divers other things there are that spoil our counsels, that we should be aware of. And if we would have our counsels right, then observe these further rules.

1. Look up first to Jesus Christ, that great Counsellor. He is called in Isa. ix. 6, the "Counsellor;" it is he that is "wonderful in counsel." God has entitled his Son the "Counsellor;" he is to be the counsellor of thy soul for thine eternal estate, yea, and to be thy counsellor for all matters of religion, and the worship of God: look up then to him.

2. Pray much. If you would not have your counsels miscarry, pray much. In Prov. viii. 14, "Counsel is mine," saith wisdom, representing Christ. That which some note respecting the counsel of Ahithophel and the counsel of Hushai, is very remarkable. The counsel of Ahithophel, the truth is, if we examine it, was the wiser counsel of the two; and Absalom loved Ahithophel exceedingly, and his counsel was ordinarily accounted as the oracle of God; yet then, because God had an intent to bring down his counsel, it was rejected, and the counsel of Hushai embraced; God thus heard the prayer of David when he prayed, "Lord, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into folly." And let us pray much that God would be with our counsellors, that there may be none among them like those spoken of in Ezek. xi. 2, "These are the men that devise mischief, and give wicked counsel in this city;" and that likewise the Lord would sway counsels, and that men would yield to that which is the safest and the best counsel, to that which is the best in the eyes of God. Many times, when a company meet together, there are some things cursorily mentioned that are neglected by the company, whereas if God were with them to guide them, that very thing perhaps would sway all their counsels: let us then pray much. "Guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory," Psal. lxxiii. 24. Oh, especially in matters that concern our souls and religion, we should pray much that God would guide us by his counsel, and so bring us to glory.

3. Let the fear of God be strong in your hearts when you come to ask counsel. Oh, it is a good thing when any are going to counsel about matters of consequence, for them to possess their hearts beforehand with the fear of the great God, and then they will counsel well: you have a notable scripture for this in Ezra x. 3, Come, let us go to do "according to the counsel of my lord, and of those that tremble at the commandment of our God." It may be there are some with greater depth of understanding; yea, but have they the fear of God in them? is there hope that they are guided by the Lord? let us take heed to do "according to the counsel of those that tremble at the commandment of our God." Do you see a man whose heart is possessed with the fear of God and his word? if his parts be but ordinary, you may expect that God will be with him rather than with those that are bold and presumptuous, and slight the word of God.

4. Be sure to look at the word, especially in matters of religion; and think not thus, I reason and prudence such a way were better, and would more conduce to peace. Luther saith, Reason is a most deadly enemy even to faith, it is dangerous to reason in matters of faith; and so in matters that regard the worship of God. Keep to the word therefore in all your counsels, and in them all labour for sincerity of heart: what makes men miscarry in their counsels is this, that their hearts are biased with some lust or other, and therefore when any thing is spoken to them suitable to their inclinations, that they embrace; and if any thing be spoken to them that is otherwise, they reject it. Oh, it is just with God to answer thee according to the idol that is set up in thine own heart.

5. Take heed of being put off with any fair shows. When the Lord is leaving any, yet he will suffer those that give evil counsel to mix a great many good things with that which is evil. As some that will put a few brass shillings into a great bag of money; the rest is all good current money, yea, but here are some brass shillings amongst it. So sometimes in the midst of a great deal of good counsel, there is a little mixture that may turn all: therefore those that would counsel, especially in public affairs, had need have their eyes about them, and poise every word and line, and examine every particular, or otherwise they may quickly come to be ashamed of their own counsel.

6. God has promised to direct the humble, therefore come with humility in your counsels, and be sure in what is evidently right to follow; and then you may with the more confidence expect God to help you in other things.

7. Consult with indifferent judgment.

8. If the thing affect others, think what we would desire if we were in their case.

9. Consider whether the attaining of your object, though good, may not occasion more evil than the thing is worth: if it be not of present necessity, (non deliberandum de necessariis,) the rubs attending it may show it is not good at this time, or not thus, or not for me.

Obs. 4. Times of affliction make men ashamed of that which they would not be ashamed of before. "Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel;" and so also Jer. ii. 26; Zeph. iii. 11. Sir Walter Raleigh well saith, "When death comes, which hates men and destroys men, it is believed; but God, that makes and loves men, is not regarded. O eloquent, O mighty death! whom none could advise, thou art able to persuade." That is, men that would never be persuaded by any thing else to believe that they were not right, yet when death appears it can persuade them. Now afflictions are an evil; but how eloquent are afflictions! what power have they to persuade men that they were wrong, who would not be persuaded by all the arguments in the world before! In afflictions "Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel." O, I beseech you, let us take heed of this, let us not go on headily in our own counsels till God bring us into misery, and we be forced to cry out of our own counsels, and be ashamed of them.

Ver. 7. As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water.

"As for Samaria, her king is cut off." Before, God threatened that they should be ashamed of their counsels, and what that counsel was I told you. Ashamed of our counsel! we hope not, we shall maintain it; our king is for us, he will venture his life, his kingdom, that he may maintain us in our way.

Your king, saith the prophet, he shall be "as the foam upon the water," even the king of Samaria.

Yea, but our king is in a strong town, in Samaria, a great city, and so strong as to be able to sustain a siege for three years together. And yet the king of Samaria, though he had gotten the chief city in the kingdom to be fully for him, and so much victuals and strength as he could hold out for three years, yet (saith the Lord) he shall be "as the foam upon the water."

"As the foam upon the water." The word פֶּקֶק translated "foam," sometimes signifies the foam that is in a man who is extremely angry, as in Zech. i. 2. Your king that doth foam in anger when he is crossed "shall be as the foam upon the water," saith God. Now hence,

Obs. 1. Ungodly men in their greatest power and rage, are, if God comes upon them, nothing but "foam," poor weak creatures that vanish and come to nothing. The foam when the waters rage makes a great show above them, but stay a while, and it vanishes and comes to nothing. Your king that rages and is above others, and thinks he has a great deal of power, in a while comes to nothing. The Scripture compares men in their greatest power to things of the greatest vanity; there are, in scriptures that I will mention to you, nineteen or twenty different particulars, wherein men in their greatest power are compared to that which has nothing but vanity; yea, there are such expressions in Scripture, to set out the meanness, vileness, and baseness of men in the greatest power, that it would make Christians that understand Scripture, and that are of the same judgment with their Father, with God, as he has revealed himself in his word, never to be afraid of the power of men. I will name them distinctly to you thus:

The Scripture sometimes calls even kings and great ones a mere noise, nothing more; so in Jer. xli. 17, "Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise."

They are but as small dust: "The multitude of thy strangers shall be like small dust," Isa. xxix. 5.

They are but as chaff: "The terrible ones shall be as chaff that passeth away," Isa. xxix. 5. Who would be afraid of a noise, small dust, and chaff?

They are as nothing: "Behold, all they that were incensed against thee shall be as nothing," Isa. xli. 11.

They are "as tow;" Isa. i. 31; put a little fire to tow, and it quickly comes to nothing.

They are as dung: "As dung for the earth," Psal. lxxxiii. 10.

They are as straw that is trodden for dung: "As straw is trodden down for the dunghill," Isa. xxv. 10.

They are compared sometimes to a beast that has a hook in his nostrils; so Isa. xxxvii. 29, God will put a hook in his nose: now who would be afraid of a beast that has a hook put into his nostrils?

They are as stubble, and as "stubble fully dry," ready for the fire, Nah. i. 10.

They are as rottenness, and "their root shall be as rottenness," Isa. v. 24.

They are as scum: "Her scum shall be in the fire," Ezek. xxiv. 12.

They are as smoke: "As smoke is driven away, so drive them away," Psal. lxxviii. 2.

They are as grass: "As the grass on the housetops, and as corn blasted before it be grown up:" all these you have together in Isa. xxxvii. 27.

They are "as wax that melteth before the fire," Psal. lxxviii. 2.

They are "as the fat of lambs," Psal. xxxvii. 20.

They are "as a worm," Job xxv. 6.

They are vanity, lighter than vanity, their "best state is altogether vanity," Psal. xxxix. 5.

They are as snow melting before the sun, Job xxiv. 19.

They are as the light of a candle: "The candle of the wicked shall be put out," Prov. xxiv. 20.

And lastly, They are a lie; even great men and princes; for so saith Psal. lxxix. 9, "Men of high degree are a lie."

Thus, my brethren, we see how the Scripture heaps up expression upon expression. It might have been very profitable to have insisted upon all these particulars, and to have opened them, to show you how contemptibly the Holy Ghost speaks of men in their great power.

Now if we could gather these scriptures together, and put them all into one, and so present the power of great men to us, and by these things have the same judgment of them that God has, it would tend mightily to deliver us from the fear of man. "As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water."

Ver. 8. The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed: the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars; and they shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us.

I confess, from these words to the end of the 11th verse there appears, at the first reading, much obscurity; yet they are like to a mine, the outside barren, but within much and precious treasure.

Israel, the ten tribes, confided in two things, and so strengthened themselves against all that the prophet could say against them.

First, In the power of their king. Now that is gone. That is as foam, saith God: confide not in the power of the king, think not that will hear you out, for he shall be "as the foam upon the water."

Secondly, In their sacrifices. They were a religious people, and very costly in their devotions, and they confided much in that. Well, for this second confidence, thus saith the Lord; "The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed: the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars." Though never so pompous in their eyes, yet they are "the high places of Aven;" they were called before Beth-aven, the house of vanity; now Aven, vanity itself. That place was no other than Beth-el, whose name signified the house of God, where one of the calves was set up. Now the name of this place did a great deal of hurt among the people; Oh! to go up to Beth-el, the house of God! therefore God would take away that name, and calls it Beth-aven first, and then Aven, that is, instead of calling it the house of God, I will have it called the house of vanity. van signifies vanity, yea, iniquity itself.

Obs. 1. God stands much upon taking people off from specious names put upon any things made use of in false worship; he stands much upon it, for whereas before he had changed it from Beth-el to Beth-aven, he changes it now from Beth-aven to Aven: God would obliterate the name of Beth-el, and make it to be accounted by the people to be nothing but iniquity and vanity.

Obs. 2. The more of the nature of sin any thing has, the more vile and abominable it is. Therefore God speaks of it by an expression that conveys somewhat of its aggravated nature—"the sin of Israel," sin in the abstract; more than if he had said, the sinful things of Israel. "The sin of Israel," that is, their idolatrous worship.

Obs. 3. Their false worship is the great sin; and it was the greater sin in Israel, because that their holiness was typical, and did especially consist in instituted worship. It is true, God would have true holiness if ever they came to heaven, but that holiness upon which they were called a holy people, was in their instituted worship; and it was typical, to set forth the true holiness that should be in all the members of the church now; therefore God was much provoked with their pollutions in instituted worship, their holiness consisting so much in it.

Obs. 4. We may so abuse the creatures of God, as not only to make them sinful to us, but even to turn them into sin, as it were. Thus their idols, and the creatures that they abused to sin, are here called their sin, "the sin of Israel;" and many men abuse their bodies so that they may be called sin itself.

Well, that which they accounted holy, you see God accounts not only sinful, but "sin," and saith, it "shall be destroyed."

Obs. 5. When any ordinances of God's appointment are abused, they are cut but to be purged; but if they be inventions of men, they are to be destroyed. "The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed." We must learn for ever to take heed of meddling with, or putting any thing of our own in the place of God's worship. We may think in reason this may be good as well as that, we see no evil in it; why may not this form then be as good as that? Yea, but God looks upon things according as he himself requires them: and therefore Calvin, I remember, on this place saith, God often pronounces those things that may please us, sin and sacrilege, and would have them destroyed. Let us therefore rest in his judgment; it is not our part to dispute about matters of worship: we must not dispute and say, Why may not this be? this may be for a good use, and a great deal of good may be the result; we must not stand disputing with God, and debating the matter with him; for though it may be very specious in our eyes, yet it may be very odious and abominable to the eyes of God.

Obs. 6. Even all those things that evil men make use of for sin shall one day be taken from them. "The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed." You shall not always have the creatures of God to abuse to sin; there will be a time when God will deliver his creatures from this vanity to which they are now subject.

Obs. 7. Man's sin brings destruction upon the creatures. "The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed." Sin is as poison in a glass, that causes the glass to be broken and cast upon the dung-hill.

"The thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars." This expression denotes,

First, The great devastation that shall be made in those places where they had altars, which took place especially in Samaria, which was besieged for three years together. The enemies had Beth-el in their own hands, and they manifested their rage forthwith upon their altars, and upon all their religious things; they pulled them down and made them lie in heaps of rubbish, so that in the space of three years the very thistles and thorns grew up in their place. It is usual to express the devastation of a place by saying, that the grass shall grow where the houses were, where the city was there shall corn grow: so here, "the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars."

Secondly, It is an expression of indignation, as if God should have said, I will take more delight to see the thorns and thistles grow out of the very rubbish of the altars, than in all their images and brave pictures and gildings. Just as if it had been said about seven or eight years ago of the Service-book, Oh, now you honour it much, and it must be bound and gilt bravely, and strung curiously; but this that you so idolize now, within a while shall be but waste paper, it shall be thrown to the mice and rats to eat! this would have been an expression of like indignation against it, as is here uttered against the altars.

Obs. 8. If it be sad that places of false worship should not be frequented as formerly they were wont to be, how much more sad is it that places of true worship should be neglected! As thus, They were wont to go to Beth-el to worship at their altars: yea, but, saith God, they shall go no more thither, but those places shall be filled with nettles, thorns, and thistles: they accounted that sad. Yea, but we should account it sad that the paths to the true worship of God should not be beaten as in former times: where there was an altar, as it were, for the worship of God, those places then were frequented much; but had our adversaries had their wills, we should have had "the thorn and the thistle" grown up in them.

Obs. 9. If it be so sad to have such an ill succession here in false worship, sad to false worshippers, what sadness is there for the true worshippers of God to have an ill succession in the church! Truly much like, methinks, it is, when there has been in a place a godly and a powerful ministry, and afterwards, for the sins of the people, God takes it away, and instead thereof comes up a pricking thorn, a brier, a thistle, a nettle, an unworthy man, of no gifts or graces, who can only gall and prick, and do hurt and mischief; this is a succession like to that which God here threatened, that thistles and thorns should succeed their altars. Jerome on the place seems to hint some such kind of meditation, when he saith, Instead of true doctrine, there shall be a wilderness of very corrupt doctrine; where there was true doctrine taught, now it shall lie waste as a wilderness.

Obs. 10. God accounts the ruin of the most glorious things abused to sin, a more pleasing object than when those things were in the greatest pomp and glory. The buildings and the altars were splendid, but God looked upon them as more glorious when pulled down and grown over with thorns and briars. And so if a man have a very beautiful, comely body, and abuse it to sin, when God shall strike him, and he shall be covered with worms as a filthy carcass, God will look upon that as a more lovely sight than his body decked with all kind of ornaments. Better that the creature perish, though it be the most glorious creature in the world, than that it be abused to sin.

Obs. 11. Those things which men account highly of in the matters of worship, when God lets in their enemies they contemn. They accounted highly of their calves, but when the Assyrians came they contemned them, and pulled them down. It is not only so in respect of false worship, but of true; those things that we highly esteem and bless God for, and think what infinite pity it is that they should not be continued, yet if God should let our adversaries in they would scorn them. As now, such liberties as these are, what infinite pity were it that people should be deprived of them; but if God should let our adversaries in upon us they would scorn and contemn these things, as the Assyrians did those which the Israelites accounted to be as God.

“And they shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us.” This is an expression to show,

First, The dreadfulfulness of their misery. It should be a misery so great as to make them weary of their lives, should make them rather desire death than life.

Secondly, Their wonderful desperation. In the apprehension and sense of this their misery they would have no whither to go for help, but their hearts should despair, and all the relief that they should expect was, to have the mountains fall upon them, and the hills to cover them. Now this expression I find Christ afterwards makes use of in setting forth the misery of the destruction of the Jews by the Romans, Luke xxiii. 30; and the Holy Ghost, in speaking of the misery of the antichristian party, when the wrath of God should come out upon them, saith, their misery shall be so great, that their princes, and great men, and mighty men, and chief captains, shall call upon the mountains to fall upon them, and the hills to cover them, Rev. vi. 15, 16. The reverend Mr. Brightman, on that very scripture, saith, that it was fulfilled in the time of Constantine, when the heathen emperors were vanquished: and he applied it to Dioclesian, who was so terrified in apprehension of the wrath of the Lamb, that he drank poison and so killed himself; to Maximian, who hanged himself; and to Galerius, who died of a most noisome and filthy disease. Maximinus, too, that he might prevent his death, likewise murdered himself; and Maxentius ran into the Tiber to hide himself in its waters. And thus they sought by different violent deaths to hide themselves from the sight of the Lamb.

I suppose all of you understand clearly that it is meant as an expression of great anguish and desperation; but yet, that we may see why the Holy Ghost makes use of this expression rather than others, and discern clearly its appropriateness, you must know that the land of Canaan (the scene of the prophet's present predictions) was a land full of mountains and hills, and these mountains were, many of them, stony and rocky; and the Jews were wont therefore to dig places in them for safety in the time of great danger, constructing them so, that by the narrowness of the ingress they might be able easily to keep out an enemy. Josephus saith, that thieves and robbers too were wont to make use of such caves and dens in the mountains and hills. To such places this scripture alludes, and by this you may be helped to understand divers other passages; as Isa. ii. 19, “And they shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.” They should go then into the holes of the rocks and caves of the earth, for they were wont to use such things there much. And so Psal. xi. 1, “In the Lord put I my trust: how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain?” In times of danger they were wont to flee to those mountains. And Psal. cxxi. 1, “I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help:” not only to the temple, but to the hills, because in time of danger they were wont to think of the hills. But, saith David, I lift up my heart to God, and that shall be to me instead of a hundred refuges in hills. And Psal. xxxvi. 6, “Thy righteousness is like the great mountains.” This is said not only because the mountains stand steadily and strongly, but because they were places of refuge and shelter. The saints have refuge in the faithfulness of God; and as they used to run to the holes in the mountains, so God is called a strong rock for the righteous to run to. God is as a rock, not only because the faithfulness of God is steady as a rock, but because, as they had caves and holes in the rocks that they were wont to run to in time of danger, so his faithfulness affords a refuge to his people in every time of need: therefore is God called “a Rock.” And it is said, “The strength of the hills is his also,” Psal. xc. 4. And Psal. xciv. 22, “The Lord is my defence; and my God is the rock of my refuge.”

But yet further, that we may more fully understand the meaning of this expression; When in times of danger they ran to the caves in the mountains, and to the rocks, they considered when there, Oh, if the enemy should come upon us, how sad would our condition be! Oh that rather this mountain that is now over us would sink down and fall upon us, rather than that the enemy should take us! This I regard as the meaning and origin of this phrase; they despised the mountain of God, the going up to his mountain, but now they would be glad to have these mountains crush them in pieces.

Obs. 12. The alteration which God can make in cities and kingdoms. They who were proud and scornful erewhile, are now so distressed that they would think themselves happy to be crushed by mountains and hills.

Obs. 13. How great is the misery of falling into the hands of our enemies. Israel knew how cruelly the Assyrians had treated others, therefore, when they came against them, and besieged them for three years together, they desired to die under the mountains rather than to fall into their hands. Josephus, in one of the forenamed places, gives us a notable story of this, telling us of some that fled into the mountains and holes for safety, and Herod pursued them; among others there was an old man, who had seven children and his wife with him, and who, rather than fall into Herod's hands, called his children one by one to the mouth of the cave that he had made in the mountain, and with his own hands killed them in succession before the enemy, afterwards he put to death his wife, and when he had cast their dead bodies down the rock, he threw himself down headlong after them; so he slew himself, and all he had, rather than he would fall into the hands of his enemies. Certainly this is a wonderful exhibition of misery. Some of you perhaps have seen or felt somewhat, but all that has been nothing to what was like to happen, had the enemies gotten full power. Let us bless God then that we are delivered from that, that we have no such cause to cry out to the mountains to cover us, and to the hills to fall upon us.

Obs. 14. There is nothing so fearful as the wrath of God. One would think that which these poor people desired here dreadful enough, to have the mountains fall upon them, and the hills to cover them; but it is not so dreadful as God's wrath: take all the terrors in the world, they are nothing to the wrath of the Almighty when fully apprehended: sometimes the wrath of God lies more heavy on a man's conscience than a thousand mountains. And, my brethren, if it be so dreadful in outward judgments, how dreadful is it like to be when it shall come to be fully poured out upon the wicked and ungodly! "In those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them," saith Rev. ix. 6. Oh! when God's wrath appears against the ungodly, it will be dreadful, especially when the full vials of it come to be poured out.

Obs. 4. To live in lingering misery, is worse than present dreadful death even in this world. I remember Nondum lectum in gratiam redi. Sueton. l. 3. c. 6.

Suetonius tells of Tiberius Cæsar, that one whom he had condemned to death petitioned him that he might have his despatch; whereupon Tiberius replied, Sir, you and I are not friends yet, you must not die, you must be kept in misery. It is often worse than death to be kept in lingering misery; it is so, even in regard of the miseries of this world; oh how much worse than death is it then to be kept under the wrath of God to all eternity! How fearful is it to live in misery for ever, then, and never to die! Why it is better, certainly sense would apprehend it better, for a man to be despatched presently, than to live in lingering misery: yet, if we knew all, it were better for the wicked to live in the greatest misery in this world, than to die the fairest death; thou wert better to live as a dog, a toad, yea, as a stock-log at the back of the fire, (if it were possible,) than to die, if thou knewest all that hereafter in hell awaits thee, being wicked: then thou shalt not die, though it would be the greatest happiness to thee. If thou shouldst after a thousand years cry to God, O Lord, that mountains might fall upon me! the Lord would answer, You and I are not friends yet: and if after a thousand years more thou shouldst cry, O Lord, that I might be crushed to pieces! the Lord would answer you still, You and I are not yet friends. I tremble, Bernard, lib. 5. de Confid.

saith Bernard, to think of that, that I should fall into the hands of living death, and of dying life, where men do not die that they might for ever cease to exist, but die that they may for ever die; they are always dying, but never die, but are kept by the almighty power of God on purpose that they might be fuel for his wrath, and subjects for his revenging justice. O consider this, you that are so ready to desire death, because you are at any time in a lingering misery. Is a lingering misery so evil? Then what will be the lingering evil of eternity!

Obs. 15. The wonderful misery of wicked men in their affliction. They have no whither to go for help; they have not God, they have no refuge but the mountains and hills; and what is their refuge there, but that they may fall upon them? Oh the difference between a saint of God and a wicked man in times of affliction! When in times of affliction, thou (if thou art wicked) shalt rage and be mad, and know not whither to go, and the uttermost help that thou canst think to have is from the hills and mountains to fall upon thee; then the saints of God shall be able to look up to heaven, and cry, Heaven is open for us, open to receive my soul. Angels, come and guide it, and bear it in. O arms of mercy, bowels of mercy, spread open yourselves to embrace me! Here is a difference. And is not this better than to cry to mountains to fall upon thee, and hills to cover thee? And yet such a difference in men's estates do sin and godliness make.

Obs. 16. The wonderful evil of despair, what a dreadful thing is desperation. The greatest benefit it suggests is to be crushed in pieces: so the help that many have, is but a halter to strangle them, a knife to murder them, or the water to drown them. Desperation is truly a dreadful thing. Francis Spira, surrounded by its horrors, cried out, Verily, desperation is hell itself. Upon all this, Luther concludes with this exhortation: Let us stir up ourselves to the fear of God, let us flee idolatry, let us beautify the word by our holy lives, and pray to Christ that we may escape such things as these, which God inflicts upon the contemners of his word. If you would not come into this wonderful despairing condition, O learn to fall down before the word; fear God now, that you may not despair then. You that contemn, and slight, and scorn the word now, this may prove to be your portion ere long, this desperate cry may be the greatest ease that your forsaken souls can have.

Ver. 9. O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah: there they stood: the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them.

"O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah." "O Israel," I am speaking this to you, it merely concerns you, you have sinned from the days of Gibeah. You think your sin is not so heinous as to merit these dreadful threatenings, that you should come to this desperate condition; Why, say the men of Israel, what means the prophet in being so terrible in his threatenings? pray what is our sin? Yes, you have sinned as in "the days of Gibeah," or "from the days of Gibeah," as in your books; or it may be read, beyond, or more than in "the days of Gibeah." "From the days of Gibeah" from what time was that? You may read the story of Gibeah in Judg. xix., xx., and their sin. I shall not need to spend much time now in opening what Gibeah was, or the nature of its sin, because that in chap. ix. 9, of this prophecy, I met with those words, "They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah." But not only the 19th and 20th chapters, where we have the story of their horrible wickedness in abusing the Levite's concubine, but likewise the 18th, which speaks of Micah's idol, and the idolatry that was prevalent among the people, is here referred to.

Now, you have sinned, as "from the days of Gibeah;" that is, your forefathers of old have committed idolatry and sin against me, and you are grown rooted in your sin, and have taken it from your forefathers. For that sin of the Levite's concubine was very ancient. It seems to have been committed between the time of Joshua and the time of the Judges. For though events be set in Scripture so that one seems to follow another, yet they do not so always in point of time. But my reason why that sin of the Levite's concubine seems to have been then, is this: because you find in that story of the 19th of Judges, when the Levite was passing on, his servant would have had him go into Jebus, but "his master said unto him, We will not turn aside hither into the city of a stranger, that is not of the children of Israel; we will pass over to Gibeah," Judg. xix. 12. So that it seems Jerusalem was not then taken in by the children of Israel; but if you read the 1st chapter of Judges, you shall find that Jerusalem was taken, it was taken before you read of any particular judge; therefore this sin that was in the days of Gibeah was very ancient. You have sinned of old, saith he, and you have continued in the succession of sin of old. If you take it "from the days of Gibeah," we might thus interpret it.

But it is rather, I think, to be taken comparatively, Your sin is more than the days of Gibeah, it is greater, whatever you think of it. You think you worship and serve God, yet the truth is, was that sin horrible, that a whole city should come together to force a Levite's concubine till she was dead at the door? was that a horrible sin? yea, and was it horrible for them to stand to defend it? Your sin is greater. Why?

1. That was but one particular act, it was all done in one night; but you go on in a constant, settled way.

2. That was a sin but of some few of the people; your sin is more general.

3. That sin they had not so much means to resist, nor so much experience of the ways of God as you, and therefore your sin is greater than the sins that were in "the days of Gibeah."

4. Because that, continuing in the commission of sins which God made use of your forefathers to revenge, you greatly provoke God. That is the meaning; and for further opening of that sin I shall refer you to that which I delivered on chap. ix.

But understanding their sin as either "from the days of Gibeah," or "more than the days of Gibeah," the observations are,

Obs. 1. The sins of ancestors continued in are attended with aggravations. We are ready to excuse our sin, and say, Why, we do nothing but that which our forefathers did. Yea, but it may be that your sins are greater than the sins of your forefathers, because they had not such means. This would answer those that plead for old superstitious vanities, Why should we be wiser than our forefathers? But know, that if you continue in their sins, it is worse in you than in them.

Obs. 2. God takes it very ill that those men, or the posterity of those, whom he uses as instruments to punish sin in others, and to reform others, yet should be guilty themselves of the same, or greater, sins. Oh! (saith the prophet,) you may justly expect to have the mountains to fall upon you, and the hills to cover you, for you are more wicked than "in the days of Gibeah;" though I used your forefathers to punish that great sin, yet you continue to be more vile than they were that were punished by your forefathers. O my brethren, God cannot endure to see that wickedness continued in men, which they have been employed to punish in others. What! shall we, or any in this generation, be used to execute the anger of God on superstitious people; and shall we continue in the sin of superstition? shall we be used to cast out men's inventions, and shall we bring in men's inventions? Yea, shall we be used to punish oppression, and tyranny, and injustice; and shall we continue in oppression, tyranny, and injustice? Oh! this will cry to heaven, when it shall be said, God stirred you up to make you an instrument to cast out such oppressing courts, and tyranny, and certain men that were so cruel to godly people; you were employed to cast them out, and you now succeed them in like oppressions, and tyranny, and injustice, and you make my saints cry to heaven for the burdens that you lay upon them. Oh! this would be very heavy. Take we heed, that when God uses us, or our forefathers, to reform any evil, take heed that it be never said, that those evils continue in their children after them.

Our Reformation, as the punishment of the sin of Gibeah, cost much blood; much has been shed to punish oppressors, to bring in delinquents, to cast out those that have been burdens to the people of God. Therefore, as it was an aggravation of guilt in their posterity to continue in that sin, whose punishment had cost so much blood; so, the more it costs to cast out our oppressing courts, &c., the more fearful will our sin be if we continue in oppression ourselves. You complain sometimes of ministers, if they reprove sins, and be guilty of the same sins they reprove you of; you account that very evil, and so indeed it is. So it may be as well said of magistrates, for them to punish sins, and yet continue in them themselves, is very evil.

"There they stood." Either this must be meant,

I. Of the men of Gibeah, that they stood, and the battle did not overtake the children of iniquity. Or,

II. Of the men of Israel. There the men of Israel stood, and their battle did not overtake the children of iniquity.

I. If it be meant of the men of Gibeah, then the expression marks their stoutness, they would stand it out, "there they stood." Though they had committed such a horrible wickedness, and there was a desire only to have the real delinquents punished, yet they combine together, and would stand it out; they stood stoutly to maintain the wickedness that was committed, especially after their first success: they fought, and in both days they slew forty thousand; now, having conquered in the first battle, this did hearten them; yea, they had the day the second time, and that made them stout in their way. Success will imbolden men in their wickedness. God many times gives success designedly to harden the hearts of men, that they may stand it out to their ruin, for so it proved to the Benjamites. Be not troubled then at the success of adversaries, God gives them success but to lead them to ruin.

II. If you take these words, "there they stood," to refer to the men of Israel, it would cost one a great deal of time to lay before you the variety of interpretations given to them. I will, therefore, only give you what I think may be the scope of the Holy Ghost, or at least what may be fairly derived from the words.

"There they stood." That is, when the men of Israel saw, in their battle at Gibeah, that they did not prevail at first, and that their brethren stood out stoutly, and that they themselves had lost so many thousand men, upon this they were at a stand. "There they stood," they knew not what in the world to do, to think that in so good a cause, in a work in which they had warrant from God to engage, yet that they should have such ill success: "there they stood."

Obs. 3. Men had need be very well grounded in a good cause when they meet with much difficulty. I believe since this cause that we have been about in England has been begun, many, through unbelief and cowardice, have been at a stand; they stood, and knew not which way to go: Lord, is this the cause of God? is this the truth of God? What! can his cause have such ill success? Many men's spirits fluctuate with the success.

"There they stood;" that is, though they were at a stand, and somewhat troubled, yet they persisted in their work; notwithstanding the difficulties they met with, they would not fly off, but "there they stood" to it; they were resolved, whatever ill success they had, to go on in the work to which God had called them.

"The battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them." When they did fight against the children of iniquity, yet the battle did not overtake them, to wit, the Benjamites, not the first day, but they were foiled twice: though I know some interpret this otherwise, yet this seems to me the most genuine explication.

But why does the prophet introduce it here? The men of Israel, to whom Hosea prophesied, might say, You tell us, that our sin is as in "the days of Gibeah," yea, let us but have success the first day, and the second day, we hope we shall do well enough. Nay, saith the prophet, your sin is worse; you may not think that your case is so good as the Benjamites, the battle did not overtake them, but it shall overtake you: and upon this ground the prophet brings in this, that the battle did not overtake them, granting that which they would object, yet so as not to suffer it to make for them, but to take away their hopes of escape.

Obs. 4. The children of iniquity may escape once, and again: though men be children of iniquity, yet the battle may not overtake them. The account in Judges is a story as well calculated to take away the seeming success in an ill cause, and disappointment in a good cause, as any I know in all the book of God. It did not overtake them at first. God's wrath follows many men in this world, and yet for a long time overtakes them not, he oft calls it back: Psal. lxxviii. 38, "But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not : yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath." But at length God's wrath overtakes men. "My words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not take hold of your fathers?" Zech. i. 6. I sent on my threatening words, and they escaped a long time, but at length my words took hold of them. As the dog may follow the hare barking a great while, but at length overtaking, he springs upon it, and tears it; so, did not my words take hold upon your forefathers?

Calvin gives another interpretation of these words, and some other notes upon them, but I think that the foregoing is their main and genuine scope.

Ver. 10. It is in my desire that I should chastise them; and the people shall be gathered against them, when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows.

"It is in my desire." God speaks here as one that has forborne a length of time, and now longs to satisfy himself.

Tremelius upon the place notes, that the form of the word for chastising here is unusual, and adds, that perhaps God would express more than ordinary punishment. Luther renders כַּאֲפִי יִחַרְבֶנּוּ Valde cupide eos castigabo, Exceeding desirously will I chastise them. It is in my will to chastise them. O blessed God, do not we find in thy word, that the works of thy justice are said to be thy "strange works," and that thou art not willing to grieve the children of men, that mercy pleases thee? but where do we ever find that justice was so pleasing to thee?

It is true, though at first God seems to forbear the execution of justice as a thing he has no mind to, yet if sin be stubbornly continued in, now God desires it as a thing than which there is nothing more pleasing to him. He is burdened with men's sins, and desires to bring punishments upon them, as a man under a great burden desires to be eased; "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies," saith the Lord, Isa. i. 24: and in Ezek. v. 13, you find that God in threatening of wrath saith, that he would do thus and thus, and he would be comforted; and in Prov. i. 26, it is said that he "will laugh at the calamity of the wicked, and mock when their fear cometh;" and in Rev. xiv. 10, the wrath of God is called "the wine of his wrath," because he takes so much pleasure in the execution of it. The reasons for this are,

1. God's justice is God himself, as well as any other attribute.

2. God would vindicate his honour, therefore the word for chastisement signifies sometimes the vindication of a man's honour. The honour of God is dear to him. Your peace and comforts may be dear to you; yea, but my honour is more dear to me.

3. In chastisements God fulfils his word; the word of God would be slighted and contemned else. Now this pleases me therefore, to chastise them, to fulfil my word upon them.

Oh the fearful evil of sin, that brings the creature into such a condition, that God's heart is delighted in every evil that sinful creatures suffer! This must needs be a sad condition indeed, for the merciful God, that delights so much in doing mercy, yet now to look upon a sinner under his wrath, and to delight in it, and love it, and be well pleased to see the creature, even the work of his own hands, in such sufferings. Hereafter there will be pure justice, God will delight in the destruction of sinners in hell, in the execution of his justice upon them; he will there do nothing else but rejoice in it, there shall be nothing but joy in God's heart to see the execution of his justice upon sinners to all eternity; yea, and God will call all the angels and saints to come to rejoice with him: Come, ye angels and saints, and rejoice with me; here is a wretched sinner that was stubborn and rebellious against me in the time of his life, and see how my power has overtaken him, see the dreadfulfulness of my wrath, come and rejoice with me for ever in this my wrath. This will be the condition of sinners eternally in hell.

Consider this, you that have a desire to sin, a mind to sin, you that derive delight and comfort from sin. Is it in your will to sin? It is God's will to punish. Can you rejoice in sin? God can rejoice in the execution of his wrath. Are you resolute upon your sin? God can be resolute in the ways of his wrath. When God chastises his servants for their infirmities, he does it as a thing to which he has no mind at all, and therefore saith the apostle, "If need be," we fall into many temptations, 1 Pet. i. 6; and they are but seeming grievous; even he himself is afflicted in all their afflictions, Isa. lxiii. 9. David would have Joab go against Absalom, but saith he, "Deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with Absalom," 2 Sam. xviii. 5; so, when God chastises his servants, he sends an affliction; Go, saith he, and scourge such a one; yea, but deal gently with him for my sake. The bowels of David did yearn towards Absalom, even when he sent Joab to fight against him; so the bowels of God do yearn towards his people, even when he sends afflictions upon them. But when he comes to deal with the wicked and ungodly, I will do it to purpose, saith God, I will delight in it, yea, I will be comforted in it.

"And the people shall be gathered against them." That is, I will chastise them thus, by gathering people against them. The Assyrians, when they gathered against them, did it merely to serve their own ends; yea, but saith God, I have a hand in it, I will gather them against them. And certainly God had a mind to chastise them, when he would gather enemies against them. The Assyrians, perhaps, would never have dared to presume to come against Israel, if God had not had a hand in it: and certainly we could never have imagined it possible, that so many should be gathered together thus publicly, in this land, to maintain wickedness, and to fight to make themselves slaves, except that God had a mind to chastise England.

But I find that others read it thus:

I will chastise them according to my mind: and so the word will bear.

The Septuagint read it, κατὰ τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν μου, Justa desiderium meum. Vulg. According to my desire.

Ecclampadius on the place saith, God prescribed a certain time to this people to come in and repent, but saith God, You shall not prescribe me how long I shall stay, but I will do it when I please, both as regards the time and the degree of the chastisement.

Obs. 1. When God has a mind to bring about a thing, he will in his own time gather the people. I remember, in the life of Pompey, when some asked him, what they should do when the enemies came against them? that he replied, Let me but stamp upon the ground of Italy, and I shall have men enough. That, in him, was an idle vaunt, but it is a true one in God; let him but stamp with his feet, and he can gather people enough together.

Obs. 2. God will choose with what rod he will scourge us, according to his own mind, both as regards the degree and the kind. Under many afflictions we mourn and repine, and these discontented expressions come from us, Oh, I could bear any thing but that! But is it fit for thee to choose thine own rod? God might have said also, I had rather you had committed some other sin. It may be, because that is the affliction most cross to thy spirit, that therefore God will have it; God sees that that is more for his honour, and perhaps for thy good. Therefore let us learn to see mit to the will of God. Is it fit that thou shouldst choose thy sin and thy rod too? No, stay there; if thou wilt choose thy sin, God will have liberty to choose thy rod.

“When they shall bind themselves in their two furrows.” באסרם לרשי עינתם These words appear very obscure at first, and I find a mighty deal of puzzling among interpreters about them. The difficulty is in the word עינתם here translated “furrows;” the same letters, omitting the points, may be rendered, their two sins; or, by substituting for one of the letters another much like it in form, their two eyes: in all these three acceptations the sense may go reasonably well. As thus:

First, And they shall bind themselves in their two sins. Or you may take it of God’s threatening what he would do; I will bind them for their two sins; so I find Arias Montanus and others translate it.

The Septuagint render it ἐν τῷ παιδεύεσθαι αὐτοῖς ἐν ραῖς ἐνοῖν ἀδικίας αὐτῶν, I will chastise them for their two sins; and so it may be, chastise as well as bind, for the words that signify binding and chastising are very cognate. I will chastise them for their two sins. When he binds them he will chastise them. And so I find Luther understands it.

And then they think it refers to the two calves of Dan and Beth-el; or the two sins of bodily and spiritual adultery: or otherwise it has the same sense with that in Jer. ii. 13, “My people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.”

Secondly, As it is in your books, “they shall bind themselves in their two furrows;” that is, I will bring their enemies upon them, and they shall yoke them like oxen that are yoked to plough, they shall bring them into servitude, and into bondage, they shall make them plough in their two furrows, that is, do double work. So Polanus, who saith, they shall put double tasks upon them, and make them work in a servile way. And I the rather think this is the meaning of it, because the Holy Ghost pursues this metaphor in the following verse, thus, “And Ephraim is as an heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn.”

Thirdly, Adopting the alteration in letters proposed, the sense would be, they shall yoke them as oxen are yoked, eye to eye. They yoke the oxen even, and set eye to eye; so the enemies shall come and yoke them, so that they shall be like beasts to do their work; and this shall be the condition of Ephraim that has this fair neck.

“They shall bind themselves in their two furrows.” Some others, among whom is Calvin, understand by this, they shall covenant together. When the enemy comes upon them, then they shall join together in covenant, as oxen that are yoked together; Judah and Israel shall join together, and they shall be in their furrows, in their trenches, as England and Scotland in the late war. So when the people are gathered together, they shall bind themselves together, and lie together in their several trenches. So I find some interpret it, but this appears foreign to the chief and genuine scope of the passage.

I understand it thus; they shall be brought into miserable bondage, they shall be like oxen: and so saith one interpreter upon the place, When you see oxen yoked together, then be reminded of the yoke of the enemy; you live daintily and bravely now, but when God shall let out the enemy upon you, you shall serve as slaves, yea, as beasts.

Ver. 11. And Ephraim is an heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn; but I passed over upon her fair neck: I will make Ephraim to ride; Judah shall plough, and Jacob shall break his clods.

In the 2nd verse you heard much of the divisions of Ephraim, and of the ten tribes; but in the latter end of the 10th verse you heard how God would join them together. But how should they be joined? It should be in their bondage, they should be bound together in their furrows. Now, though it be in your books, “they shall bind themselves,” which has likewise a sense which we spake to then; yet you may as well read the words, they shall bind them together, and so carry the sense, that they should be bound in their furrows, like oxen yoked in the plough; they would not come in together under God’s yoke, but they shall come in together under the yoke of the adversaries: and that I think is the principal scope of the words, “they shall bind them in their two furrows.” They that were so divided in their prosperity, when they come into bondage, shall, by their enemies, be bound together. It was said of Ridley and Hooper, they could not agree together till they were in prison, but then they harmonized well. And so when we were heretofore in our bondage we could agree better together than now. Oh it were just with God to bring us again under the bondage of our enemies, and bind us in our furrows together!

But Ephraim thought herself far from this. No, Ephraim is not for ploughing work, Ephraim loves to tread out the corn, but not to plough. They were wont in those times, instead of thrashing out the seed from the chaff, to have beasts to tread it out, or to draw instruments whereby the seed was separated from the husk. Now there are some things to be remembered here.

First, There was no yoke upon them while they were treading out the corn.

Secondly, They were then not to be muzzled, but to feed as they pleased, and this by the command of God, Deut. xxv. 4.

Now this was a very easy work for them, to be without yoke, to run up and down in the corn, and so fatten themselves; they had enough to feed on, certain food, and present food; whereas those heifers that went to plough were fain to be abroad in the storms, and cold, and wind, and work all day long, and perhaps had no food till night; this was a hard work, and Ephraim did not love such. This seems to have reference to some of the ten tribes, who would stay in their country, and worship at Dan and Beth-el, and would not go up to Jerusalem. Oh, that was hard; and it was better for them to stay in the land, where they might enjoy their possessions, their shops, their tradings, their friends; that was easy, but to go to Jerusalem might cost them their estates, it would excite opposition against them, and they must leave all and go for the worship of God, to worship God according to his own way, they must for a time leave all: this was a ploughing work in respect of the other. Now Ephraim, those that live among the ten tribes, loved no such hard work. From whence there are many excellent points to be observed.

Obs. 1. It is a sign of a carnal heart, to be set upon easy, to the avoidance of difficult, work in God’s service. “Ephraim loveth to tread out the corn.” It is a dangerous thing to desire more ease in God’s work than God would allow.

Obs. 2. The carnal and hypocrites can be well content with those services which bring with them present comfort and encouragement. When they did tread out the corn, there was present supply. So it is with men, when they can have present maintenance. Ter- novius, a learned man, upon this very scripture observes, Where men see not present gain coming in, they despise Christ; but where they may have to eat for the present, there they may be easily brought to believe any service or worship that is, for the present, countenanced by the state. From Numb.

vii. 9, we see that God allowed no cart to the children of Kohath to carry the ark, and they sinned in putting it upon one, 2 Sam. vi. So, where men may enjoy certain revenues, whether they work or not, or whether they work negligently or not, it is a great temptation; much greater than in a man's enjoying encouragement on uncertainties, and on the assurance that he shall have it no longer than he labours, and labours to purpose; but when men have certain revenues coming in, though they labour by themselves or by others, though negligently or industriously, it is a great temptation.

Obs. 3. To labour for present accommodation only to themselves, is a sign of carnal hearts. A generous spirit will labour for posterity. If none should plough, how would there be corn to tread out? We must be willing to plough though we have not present food, though we should have nothing till night, yea, though we should have nothing till the night of death; yea, throughout all our lives we should be willing to plough in hope. Ephraim loved not that work. That is a generous spirit, that is willing to endure difficulty here, though he finds no present returns, yea, though none reap the benefit but posterity.

This may be also applied to soul work, in our seeking to God. Many are content to pray, and follow God and his ordinances, so long as they may have present comfort, but if that fails they have no heart to the duty. Now we should be willing to plough, that is, to endure difficulty, though we have no present returns.

This is that which causes so many to perish in the world, they must have present content; whereas the saints of God are willing to trust God though they have nothing in this world, to trust him to have their wages in the world to come.

"But I passed over upon her fair neck." By her easy work in treading out the corn, and not having the yoke upon her neck to plough, she became very delicate, her skin was white and tender. "Her fair neck," or, the goodness of her neck, מִיבַת צִיָּוִר Her neck, through her prosperity, had become delicate, nothing must trouble her; let others, if they will, engage in works attended with trouble and difficulty, for her part, she was tender and delicate, and must endure no burdens, no difficulty at all.

Obs. 4. The evil of outward adornings. "Her fair neck."

Many are proud of their fair necks and skins, so proud that they grow in consequence extremely wanton; they must lay open their fair necks, that others may see them, see how white they are, what fair skins they have; and put black patches likewise, to set off their beauty and the whiteness of their skins; and if that suffice not, they will even lay over them a paint, to make them fair if they be not otherwise so: nothing but ease, and delicacy, and pleasure is for them, as if they came into the world for no other end but to live bravely and be looked upon; as if mankind and all creatures must work and suffer to provide for these nice and delicate wantons, who yet are of no use at all in the world. Certainly God never gave any great estates for no other use, but only to be brave withal, and to keep their skin white. Whatsoever estates we have, yet except we endeavour to be useful in the world in proportion to those estates, we can have little true comfort in what we enjoy: the comfort of the lives of rational creatures certainly lies not in a fair white skin; their comfort is in being useful in the places where God has set them, their good consists in that.

 Man is born to labour, and there must be labour one way or other, every one is bound to labour. These fair white skins, and fair necks, oh what foul souls many of them have! their beauty is but skin deep.
 Filthy and abominable are many of them in the eyes of God, and in the eyes of those who know the corruptions of their hearts. How would these fair necks be able to bear iron chains for Christ? to be nailed to the stake, to have such a neckerchief put upon them as Alice Driver had? The story is in the Book of Mar- tyrs. When they put the chain about her neck to nail her to the stake, she gloried in it, and blessed God for it. Yes, but this Alice Driver was wont to plough, (for so it is said a little before,) her father brought her up to plough, and not so delicately; she could endure then an iron chain upon her neck for Christ. Hard breeding is fittest for Christian suffering.

"But I passed over upon her fair neck." Some interpret the words as expressing God's indulgence, as if he was content to let Ephraim prosper and thrive in their way, and not to bring any hard bondage upon them; but the interpretation which I find others give is more probable: I came upon her fair neck, and made the yoke to pass over. So Jerome upon the place saith, When this phrase, "I passed over," is applied to God, not only here, but always in Scripture, it is in a way of threatening; and it may very well be here a threatening expression following the similitude taken from husbandry.

In the same allegorical manner Ephraim is compared to "an heifer that is taught," as if he should say, he would not willingly work. Whence,

Obs. 5. God looks upon dainty, tender, delicate people, who mind nothing but their own ease and convenience, with indignation. What! Ephraim must be so tender and delicate, that nothing must come upon "her fair neck?" I will make the yoke to come upon it, saith God. When people through their delicacy must be altogether tended, and have all things serviceable to them, and they of no use at all, God cannot bear it. And as for the eminency of any of you, either in estates or honours in the world, above others, it ought not to be the cause of envy, for it is God that puts the difference between one and the other. We do not envy that some should go finer than others; but this neither God nor man can endure, that any should have so much in the world, and yet be of so little use to the world, should be through their delicacy as if they were born for nothing else but, like babies, to play withal. I will make the yoke to pass over them, saith God. Though you do not put your hands to servile labour, there are other manner of works; but then, through your delicacy, if you meet with any difficulty, you will do nothing for God: the Lord looks upon such dispositions with indignation, as sinful, and has his time to bring them to hardness. How many delicate and fair necks, that could not endure any difficulty, has God brought the yoke upon in these days! persons that were so nice and tender, and complaining of every little difficulty in any work that God would have them to do. God has made the yoke to pass over their heads, and to lie heavy upon their necks. God threatens this to the daughters of Babylon, to the anti-christian party especially, in Isa. xlvii. 1, 2, "Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Baby- lon, sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. Take the millstones, and grind meal: uncover thy locks, make bare the leg, uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers." And then in the 3rd verse, "Thy nakedness shall be uncovered, yea, thy shame shall be seen: I will take vengeance, and I will not meet thee as a man." That which you cannot endure so much as to hear of now, (your very ears are so delicate, as well as your necks,) that I will bring upon you. O my brethren, how much better is it to be willing to endure hardships for God, than to be brought to hardships by our adversaries; and rather to put our necks under the yoke of Jesus Christ, than to have God put our necks under the yoke of his wrath and displeasure! But God has his time to bring upon them hard things; and therefore, though God spares your bodies, that you need not put them to the servile tasks that others do, yet be so much the more willing to do service for God otherwise. Venture yourselves among your kindred; that is the work to which God calls ladies. You meet with carnal friends that are honourable and of great rank in the world, now, to espouse in the midst of them the cause of God, is as hard a work as to labour with one's hands, and may do a great deal more service. When you come into carnal company, be willing to put forth yourselves to endure hardships in that way which God calls thee to, and God will accept of it; but if, through thy delicacy and niceness of mind, thy spirit comes to be as delicate as thy skin is, and thou must not displease any, nor suffer any thing for God, it is just with God to bring thee to suffer in spite of thy heart.

"I will make Ephraim to ride." We regard this as a further threatening; in Scripture it is applied both to mercy and judgment: thus to mercy, in Isa. lviii. 14, "Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth." And to judgment, in Job xxx. 21, 22, "With thy strong hand thou opposeth thyself against me. Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance." Other scriptures might be shown where this expression is in a way of judgment. And so it is thought by interpreters here to refer to the speedy captivity of the ten tribes. As if God should say, By his ease, and by his much feeding in treading out the corn, he is grown so fat and lusty that there is no ruling of him; yea, but, saith God, I will ride him; though he kicks and spurns and is so unruly with his fat feeding, yet I will put such a curb into his mouth, that I will order him and rule him as I please. Ephraim was like a pampered horse that is kept at full feeding, none could ride him; yea, but, "I will make Ephraim to ride," saith God.

Obs. 6. God has ways to curb those who through their prosperity are delicate and unruly; though they may champ upon the bit, and foam at the mouth, and stamp again, yet God will rule them: "I will make Ephraim to ride."

"Judah shall plough;" that is, Judah shall for a long time take pains and go through many difficulties in the ways of my worship, and shall suffer much while Ephraim lives delicately. Judah did indeed suffer much more difficulty and hardship than the ten tribes. But I think this scripture refers especially to those two passages that we find, the first in 2 Kings xviii. 4—8, and the other in 2 Chron. xxviii. 6. 2 Kings xviii. records the great reformation that Hezekiah made in the worship of God in Judah and Jerusalem. And then Judah's suffering you have in 2 Chron. xxviii. 6, where it is said, that "Pekah the son of Remaliah slew in Judah an hundred and twenty thousand in one day, which were all valiant men." It is a very strange scripture. Israel, the ten tribes, were worse than Judah: Israel forsook the true worship of God; Judah kept themselves to the true worship; and yet God let Israel so prosper that they so prevailed against Judah and the tribe of Benjamin, as to slay in one day a hundred and twenty thousand valiant men. Oh what lamentation and wailing must have been in the country then, that of two tribes a hundred and twenty thousand valiant men should be slain in one day! We think it is a dreadful battle when three thousand are slain in the field, but here is a battle in which a hundred and twenty thousand are slain in one day, and that out of two tribes. And in 2 Kings xiv. 13, "And Jehoash king of Israel took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Jehoash the son of Ahaziah, at Beth-shemesh, and came to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem," &c. Thus Judah and Benjamin, those two tribes that kept to the worship of God, were sorely afflicted by Ephraim, the ten tribes which had forsaken the worship of God. Strange are the counsels of God concerning men.

"Judah shall plough;" that is, they shall endure a great deal of trouble in the reforming what is amiss among them. Whence,

Obs. 7. It is an honour for men to labour and go through difficulties for God while others are labouring for their ease. Be not troubled that you see other people can take liberty to themselves to provide incomes to live bravely. Does God give you a heart in the mean time to be willing to go through hard work for him? Envy them not, thou art in the better condition, thou art ploughing for God; while they are providing for their own ease, thou art doing God service; oh! thou art far the happier.

"Judah shall plough." Take the ploughing for the hard things they suffered, as well as the hard things they did for God, and thence,

Obs. 8. Let none boast that they live more at ease than others. Others suffer more hardship than thou; do not think that God loves thee more than others. God loved Judah at this time more than Ephraim, and yet Ephraim lived bravely, and prevailed over Judah. Judah was God's true church, and Israel had apostatized from God, and yet one had more outward prosperity than the other. Thus many times those upon whom God's heart is more set, suffer hard afflictions; and those on whom God's heart is not so much fixed, enjoy their prosperity.

O, I beseech you, consider this well; for at this day, how many of our brethren are there in the western parts, on whose backs the ploughers have ploughed deep furrows, while we have been here as it were treading out the corn! Let not us think that God loves us more than them; they may be more dear to God than we: Judah was far more dear to God than Israel, and yet Israel must live jocundly and bravely.

O consider this, you that are of greater rank. All your life is treading out the corn: you see your poor neighbours endure much hardship, O think not that you are higher in God's thoughts than they; they may be more dear to God than you, and yet they may be put to difficulties, and you may live bravely all your lives.

But it may seem to weaken the foregoing observation, that the ploughing is spoken of as future, "Judah shall plough." The Hebrews, however, ordinarily make use of the future and preter tense promiscuously. But if you take it in the future sense, that they shall plough hereafter, it may signify the captivity of Judah, that they shall be carried into captivity, and so be brought under by the Babylonians.

"And Jacob shall break his clods." By "Jacob" we must understand the ten tribes. As if God should say here, that Judah shall be put to some difficulties, yet Jacob, the ten tribes, must be put to more. Judah shall be carried into captivity; yea, but Jacob shall break the clods. Though Judah shall plough, yet the breaking of the clods is worse than the ploughing, for it is more servile; for the ploughman is the chief, he goes on in ploughing, but it is his servant or boy whom he sets to break the clods after him. So, though Judah shall be brought to difficulties, yet Jacob shall be put to more difficulties; for the captivity of Judah was great, yet it was not so great as Jacob's.

"Judah shall plough, and Jacob shall break his clods;" that is, Judah's clods. The expression we have here, with the reference it has to Judah, intimates, according to some, That there shall be a time, though now you that are the ten tribes are so delicate and proud above Judah, and Judah so much lower than you, that you despise him; yet the time shall come that you shall be glad to join with Judah, and be as a servant to Judah, to break his clods, when God shall restore his people again: Judah shall return from his captivity, and shall be taking pains in the service of God; and it shall be well for you if you can but come and be as his servant.

Obs. 9. Though God may have mercy upon those afterwards who forsake his true worship, and join them with his people, yet, if this mercy place them in the meanest condition among God's people, they should be willing to submit to it. Those that have dishonoured God and shamed themselves in times of trial, by forsaking his truths, it is a mercy if ever God unite them to his church again; but if he does bring them to join it, they should think it a great mercy, and be willing to be in the meanest condition. What! must those think to be masters and lords, who have forsaken God and his truth, and have been very false for their own ends in times of trial, shall they think in times of reformation to bear all before them? Oh! it is a mercy if they be but admitted to break the clods, to join with those servants of God that have been faithful, and willing to serve him through difficulties.

Ver. 12. Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you.

The Holy Ghost still goes on in this allegory of husbandry, continuing in the exhortation the metaphor that he had used in the threatening. In the midst of his threats he falls to exhorting.

Obs. 1. Though the sins of a people be great, and judgments near, yet exhortations are to be used. Who knows what an exhortation may effect, even with the worst people in the world? There were many things spoken concerning Israel, which one would have thought should have discouraged the prophet to meddle with exhortation; but God would have him yet exhort. One cannot tell what an exhortation may do, in the most desperate hardness of men's hearts, and pride and stoutness of men's spirits; therefore the prophet exhorts them, as if he should say, Well, if you would not plough, if you would not come under the yoke and be put into the furrows, as you were threatened before, why then, sow to yourselves. O, be willing to break up the fallow ground of your hearts, and sow to yourselves in righteousness, and so you shall reap in mercy.

"Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy." I find some of the ancients interpret this somewhat wildly.

"Sow in righteousness;" that is, (saith Jerome upon the place,) Sow in the law, in obedience to the law, and reap in the grace of the gospel; that is, you shall sow in the works of the law, and reap in the gospel: but this seems far-fetched.

As Jerome is somewhat too legal, so Luther (because his heart was much in the gospel, and he was wont to view all scriptures, as far as possible, as expressing the grace of the gospel) inclines somewhat too much to the other extreme.

"Sow in righteousness." What are the seeds of righteousness? That is, saith Luther, the doctrine of the gospel tending the righteousness of Jesus Christ: the attending to, and embracing, this doctrine of the gospel, that there is righteousness in Jesus Christ alone, this is sowing in righteousness; for what other righteousness is there but this? When reason would ascend to the highest degree of righteousness, what does it? Only this, to conclude righteousness to be, to depart from evil and do things that are good. But what righteousness is this? But the Scripture righteousness teaches a man to know that he has no good at all in himself, that all his evil is pardoned in Jesus Christ; this is the righteousness of the gospel, and this is the seed of all good works. I name this, though I can hardly conceive it to be the scope of the prophet here; yet a very good meditation arises from it, which I see noticed by that useful man in the church of God, Luther, who goes on to say, What madness and blindness in the adversary is there, that will urge people to sow, and yet reject and cast off this seed that they should sow, that is, the doctrine of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ by faith! Why, saith he, in all pulpits they cry out to men for good works, that they should sow in righteousness; but where have they their seed? Certainly the truth which he inculcates here is excellent. How vain is it for men to be taught to sow good works till they have got the seed! and the seed of all good works is, the righteousness that we have by Jesus Christ: and thereupon he rebukes those who blame the doctrine of the gospel as the means of licentiousness. A great many, when we preach, saith he, of the righteousness of Jesus Christ, think that we preach licentiousness, and that men may live as they list, but it is quite the contrary; when we preach the righteousness of Jesus Christ, we preach the seed of all good works; and from those who have this seed, good works will issue. But, saith he, further, they would have righteousness; but what righteousness? They slight the righteousness of God's making, the righteousness of his Son, but they must have righteousness of their own to tender up to God; and then, when they come to good works, they will slight God's good works, and they will be giving to God of their good works. The world doth neglect those works enjoined by him as light things, that is, the works of mercy, kindness to the saints, &c. No, they will have none of these, they will have other brave works, to build churches, and temples, and monasteries, and to lavish out gold about them, they are their chiefest good works: they will not deign to do the work as it were of a servant, but aim rather to be a benefactor to God; for, in relieving thy poor brother when none but thyself and God know it, thou dost the work of a servant, but to build brave temples and monasteries, and lavish out gold upon them, this is for you to be a benefactor to God. Thus much for Luther's speech.

"Sow to yourselves in righteousness." We know of the prophet, though he would lead the people to Christ, yet his preaching was chiefly legal. "Sow righteousness;" that is, Go on in the works of righteousness, those works that are right, and just, and equal, such as you may give a good account of before God and man: as if he should say, Do not you think to put me off merely with outward services, with offering sacrifices, and the pomp of ceremonial, perhaps, superstitious, worship, I will never accept of these things; but let me have righteousness, let there be the works of righteousness; according to the rules of righteousness, so work. And the Jews, if they did but perform generally the external works of righteousness, might have external mercies. If indeed they did some works of righteousness, and not others, then they could not expect mercy from God; but though there were no saving grace in them, yet if they did but perform the external works of righteousness, and there was a proportion between one and another, there seems to have been an external covenant that they were under for outward mercies for their outward righteousness: not but that I think for heaven they must have had true grace and godliness, as the saints must have now; but external mercies were more annexed to external duties than now amongst us.

You will say, We have external promises too.

Yea, but they are attached to godliness in Christ Jesus.

Now from the words we may

Obs. 2. The actions of men are seeds, such seeds as will certainly come up. Other seeds may die in the ground, and rot, and never come up; but there is never an action which thou performest, but will come up one way or other, it will come up to something.

Obs. 3. The seed sown will come up after its kind. The seeds of tares will not come up to wheat, but will continue tares, and so the wheat, wheat: all our actions will come up after their kind. Men neglect their actions, and think that when they have done, it is over, they forget what they did yesterday or the day before; but though you may forget it, yet it will come up in the same kind, though you think not of it. I remember Pliny reports of some parts in Africa, that when they sow their seed, they go away, and never look after it for many months together: so it is with many men, they sow, but they never mind what they have done, and quite forget what their seed has been, till they must come to reap. But certainly thine actions lie there, and will grow up to something.

Obs. 4. As the seed lies in the ground rotting awhile, but afterwards comes up, so it is with our actions; they seem as if they were quite forgotten, but they will come up; yea, and good actions seem as if they were wholly lost many times: well, though the seed doth rot, rot in the ground for a time, yet it will come up afterwards.

Obs. 5. The seed, when sown, comes up through the blessing of God upon it. No endeavour of the husbandman can make the seed come up, but he must leave it to the blessing of God; so the seeds of our actions must be left to God. God's justice will make the seeds of the wicked come up, and his goodness and mercy will make the seeds of the saints come up; leave thine actions to the blessing of God.

Obs. 6. The better the seed is, for the most part the longer it lies under ground. When you sow wheat and rye, you sow them in the autumn of the year; but when you sow barley and oats, you sow them in the spring, and they do not, as the wheat, endure frost and snow. Even so the best of our actions lie longest under ground.

Obs. 7. The ministers of God are sowers of the seed of the word; and the hearers should be sowers too. The minister sows the word in thine ears, and then thou shouldst take it from thence and sow it in thy heart, thy life and conversation.

Obs. 8. If our actions be seeds that we sow, then large opportunities of doing much service for God should be our riches; like a large field, that is sown with good grain; if thou hast a heart to improve those opportunities.

Oh that we would but consider of this, that when the Lord gives any a large opportunity for service, God lets them out so much land; Go, (saith God,) you must husband so much land, and sow it for mine advantage. Many of you that are poor, have not a foot of land in the world, and you think that landed men are happy men: does God give you opportunity of service to honour him? Oh! thou hast got a great deal of land, the meanest of you that have opportunities of service; God lets you out his land, you have abundance of land and ground given to you by God: and a man should account himself rich according to the opportunity of his service; as men in the country account themselves rich according to the land that they have to plough and sow. In Lev. xxvii. 16, it is said, "If a man shall sanctify unto the Lord some part of a field of his possession, then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof." The meaning is, that if a man will sanctify a piece of land to God, you shall prize it not according to its extent, but according to the seed it is fit to receive. So the opportunities that are fit to receive much seed, should be accounted rich opportunities. And we should esteem the price of our lives to be according to the seed thereof: Thou livest such a year, what is thy life worth? It is according to the seed thereof. And so for these four or five last years, oh what opportunities have we had for service for God! now they are to be prized according to the seed thereof, that is, as our service and work were in those years. Then certainly, if we must estimate our lives according to the opportunity of service for God, then these last five years we may reckon as fifty. It is a great blessing to have a good seed time; the Lord has blest us with this good seed time. Oh now, what a folly were it for a man out of base penuriousness to refrain from sowing his ground, because he is loth to venture his seed! or through love of his ease loth to go abroad; it is somewhat cold, and he will keep by the fire-side, and will not go abroad to sow his seed. Oh! thus it is with us, through our base unbelief we will venture nothing for God, we are loth to put ourselves upon any difficulty; this is our folly.

Obs. 9. It is not every seed that will serve. Be sowers, but sow "in righteousness;" let it be righteousness, let it be precious seed. Thus, in Psal. cxxvi. 6, they are spoken of as "bearing precious seed" with them. Oh! there are many who sow venomous seed, that will bring forth poisonous fruit; all their days they have been sowing nothing but seed of unrighteousness. Yea, in this field that God has given to us, of opportunity of service for him, what have many done? what have they sown? They have sown salt in it; that is, they have sown their passions, they have sown contention and the seeds of discord, and that has been the cause why that our field, those opportunities which we have enjoyed for God, has been so unproductive: there has been so much salt, the salt spirits of men and women have been so manifested in their passions and frowardness, and their contentions one against another, that it has made us barren. Thus, Prov. vi. 14, "Frowardness is in his heart; he deviseth mischief continually, he soweth discord." And ver. 19, it is made one of the things which the soul of God abhors, that a man should "sow discord." And so in Prov. xvi. 28, "A froward man soweth strife." Oh! how many are there amongst us that go from one place to another, and tell you such a tale, and such a report, and sow nothing but strife and discord! such the Lord hates. What! in such a time as this is to sow discord! there could never have been a time more unfit to sow the tares thereof. Oh! let men take heed of sowing discord now; God calls for the seed of righteousness.

"And reap in mercy." I find many interpret this, mercy to men: that is, sow the seeds of righteousness, and let the fruits of mercy be abundant amongst you. But to carry it according to that which is more like to be the scope of the Holy Ghost, we are to understand by "mercy," the mercy of God. Now two things are to be observed in this phrase:

First, That it is in the imperative mood, "reap in mercy," not, ye shall reap in mercy.

Secondly, In the original it is, לפי-חסד ad os misericordie, in the mouth of mercy.

Now to explain these words accordingly.

First, That it is in the imperative mood, "reap in mercy;" not, ye shall reap in mercy. This signifies these two things:

1. The certainty of the mercy they shall have.

2. The readiness of the mercy, that it is ready at hand for them to possess; just as if one should say to you in your shops, Let me have this commodity, and here take your money, that is, here is your money ready and certain.

Secondly, In the mouth of mercy. Now if the translators had rendered it thus, Sow in righteousness, and reap in the mouth of mercy, it would have been obscure; but those who understand the original, know that the mouth of a thing is often used for the proportion and measure of a thing. As thus in Lev. xxvii. 16, "Thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof." Now the Hebrew is, Thy estimation shall be to the mouth of the seed, that is, according to the proportion of the seed so shall the estimation be. And so you have it in Exod. xvi. 16, "Gather of it every man according to his eating;" that is, to the mouth of every man, in a proportion according to what is fit for every man.

"Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy." Thus, "Sow in righteousness;" it is a poor seed that we shall sow: now God saith not, you shall reap "in righteousness," but "in mercy," from the mouth of mercy. You take out of the mouth of the sack, and sow your poor proportion, but when you come to reap, you shall reap, if you be faithful, according to the proportion of mercy; what is fit for a merciful God to do, what is suitable to the infiniteness of my mercy, that shall you reap. It was so with the Jews, if their obedience was but external, yet they should have mercy beyond that outward obedience: but if it be applied to those who live in the times of the gospel, indeed that which comes from you, being so mixed as it is, is but poor, yet you may expect to reap, not according to what you do, but according to what may manifest the infinite mercy of an infinite God. Every one, let them be never so weak, and employed in never such poor and mean services, yet, if their hearts be upright, they shall not reap according to the meanness of the work, nor the poverty of the service, but look, what glory and happiness is suitable for an infinite God in way of infinite mercy to bestow, that they shall have in the mouth of mercy, suitable to mercy. Thus you have the meaning of the word.

Obs. 10. As a man sows, so shall he reap. Though he shall reap more than he sows, yet he shall reap in the same kind. If he sow wickedness he shall not reap mercy; but he that sows righteousness shall reap mercy. It is a mocking of God, for men to think that though they sow wickedness yet they shall reap mercy; therefore saith the apostle, in Gal. vi. 7, " whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. God is not mocked." If thou thinkest to reap mercy when thou sowest wickedness, thou mockest God to his very face. If a man should sow tares and say, I shall have a good crop of wheat, would you not think that man mad? or he should think you a fool to believe him, were he to tell you so. So for you to think that either God or man should believe that you should have mercy when you sow not righteousness, it is, I say, to mock God; and know, "God is not mocked; for what a man soweth, that shall he also reap;" and thy fruit shall be another manner of fruit, thou shalt rent that which shall be bound in bundles, and thou bound together with it, and cast into unquenchable fire. But of those that sow righteousness, not a seed shall be lost, they shall be recompensed for all their pains, and labour, and sufferings. For so saith the Lord, Psal. cxxvi. 5, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." There shall be an assuring fruit to those that sow in righteousness, for true gospel-righteousness is the most precious thing in the world, more worth in one of its righteous acts than heaven and earth. God will not lose that seed, it is precious seed; there is more of God in one righteous act of a godly man, than there is in all the works of creation and providence, (angels and saints excepted,) yea, than in all the whole frame of creation.

The reason is this, Because in all the creation God's glory is manifested but passively; God works there and holds forth his glory passively; but in the righteous acts of the saints, there is an active glorifying of God; there is an act of the very image of God, and the life of God: the Divine nature is there, and therefore there is more of God in the working of righteousness than in any thing else besides.

Oh, let the saints rightly estimate the actions of righteousness; though there be much evil mingled, yet there is a great deal of the glory of God in every action. If we were but grounded in this principle it would make us abound in the work of the Lord. So in the morning and in the evening let not thy hand rest, trust God with thy seed, do not be terrified with this difficulty and the other: "He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap," Eccl. xi. 4. Is it a duty that God requires of thee; do not think, Oh, but it is windy, and ill weather: no, but sow thy seed, "sow it in righteousness," and commit it to God, and thou shalt reap. Blessed are those who have sown much for God in their life-time! Oh the glorious harvest that these shall have! the very angels shall help them to take in their harvest at the great day; and they need not take thought for barns, the very heavens shall be their barns. And oh the joy that there shall be in that harvest! the angels will help to sing the harvest song that they shall sing who have been sowers in righteousness: but oh the confusion of face which will be upon those who were not willing to endure difficulty in ploughing and sowing! "The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing," Prov. xx. 4. In harvest he will be crying for mercy, Lord, mercy now. But what fruits of righteousness? No fruits of righteousness, no mercy. "Reap in mercy!" an expression as remarkable as we have in the whole book of God; not reap in righteousness, but "reap in mercy."

Obs. 11. After all we do, yet we have need of mercy. Let us be the most plentiful in sowing the seeds of righteousness, yet we are unprofitable servants after we have done all, and must "reap in mercy."

But surely an act of righteousness has much in it.

Yea, but all the good of it is God's, so much as there is in it of evil is ours; and after we have done all, we had need come to God as beggars to cry for mercy. Those who have lived the most holy lives, yet woe to them if they have not mercy, if they have not righteousness beyond their own, if mercy come not in to plead for them! Woe to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, if mercy plead not for them! if at the great day they have nothing to tender up to God but their own righteousness, they are certainly lost and undone for ever. All that we can do is infinitely unworthy of the majesty of God. In 1 Chron. xxix. 14, when the people offered so much to God for the building of his tabernacle, mark how David was affected with it: "Who am I, and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? for all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee." And in 1 Chron. xxii. 14, when David had provided "an hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver," for the building of the temple of God, besides "brass and iron without weight," yet after all he exclaims, Out of my poverty have I offered this. So Arias Montanus renders בניני In your books it is, "in my trouble I have prepared" this, but the word signifies poverty as well as trouble and affliction. And so saith David, after all this, Yet in my poverty have I done this; whereas this was a mighty thing that was offered. I remember Sir Walter Raleigh, in his History of the World, part 2, chap. 17. sect. 9, reckons up the sum of what David there prepared for the temple of the Lord, and makes it more than any king in the world is worth ; he makes it to come to three thousand three hundred and thirty-three cart loads of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver, or six thousand pounds sterling, to every cart load, besides threescore and seventeen millions of French crowns : and yet when he had done all, Out of my poverty have I done this. As if he should say, Lord, what is this in respect of thee who art the great God ? If thou wilt but accept of this, I shall be infinitely bound to thee.

O my brethren, let us ever learn after all our duties not to be proud, but keep your hearts low and humble before God. Has God enabled us to sow in righteousness ? our hearts are puffed up presently : oh no, thou must keep thy heart still under. Alas ! such is the pride of our spirits, if we be but enlarged a little in prayer we are ready to be puffed up presently. Oh ! what is this to the service which a creature owes to the blessed and eternal God ! Hadst thou spent all thy time since thou hadst any understanding, night and day, in the work and service of God, hadst thou been the greatest instrument of God's service that ever was in the world, yet thou hast cause to lie down at God's mercy-seat and cry, Mercy, Lord, mercy for a poor wretched, vile creature, after thou hast done all ; we are so unable to do any thing ourselves. Luther saith,

The very act of thanksgiving is from God.

And therefore be humbled, and cry,

Grace, grace to all that has been : and let all public instruments not take too much upon them, but lie low before the Lord. Oh ! did we but know God we would indeed be low after our duties.

To lay down one's life for God you will say was a great service. Cyprian's prayer at his martyrdom contained those two remarkable expressions ; Lord, I am prepared to pour forth the very sacrifice of my blood for thy name's sake ; yea, Lord, I am prepared here to suffer any torment whatsoever. These two expressions he used. You will say, Now surely this man might stand upon his terms with God. But he goes on : But when thou dost lift up thyself to shake the earth, Lord, under what cleft of the rock shall I hide myself, to what mountain or hill shall I call to fall upon me and cover me ? As if he should say, Lord, though I be here ready to give up my body to be massacred for thee, to give up my blood to be an offering, and to suffer any torment, yet when I consider what a God I have to do withal, if thou shouldst deal with me as I am in myself, oh I must cry to the rocks to cover me, and the hills to fall upon me. This should teach us to keep our hearts low and humble after we have done the greatest work whatsoever. One of the German divines when at the point of death was full of fears and doubts, and some said to him, You have been so employed, and have been so faithful, why should you fear ? He replied, The judgments of man and the judgments of God are different ; I am to go before the great and all-seeing God. Though it is true, God would not have us daunted with any terrible apprehensions of him, yet he would have us be possessed with reverence, so as to be humbled when we think what a God it is we have to do withal : you must "reap in mercy." Oh ! this shall be the song of the saints to all eternity, Mercy, mercy : "Not unto us, Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory," Psal. cxv. 1.

Obs. 12. God will give abundantly above our works. Oh, it is a point that has very much encouragement to poor troubled sinners that are low. Raise up thy faith : it is not what thy work is ; though it be low and mean, and though there be many failings in thy work, yet is there uprightness in it ; and if thou hast sown the seeds of righteousness, thou shalt reap according to what shall honour the mercy of an infinite God at last. When Alexander was giving a gift to a poor man, he dared not receive it, it was too great. Yea, but, said Alexander, though that be too great for thee to receive, yet it is not too great for me to give. So I may say to poor souls, when they hear of these glorious promises. Their hearts are ready to think, This is too good news to be true, too great a mercy for me to receive. So it is as thou art in thyself, but if God will give according to the proportion of his mercy, it is not too great for him to give.

Now thus it is that God will deal with those that are in covenant with him, that have all their fruit from the seed of righteousness, Christ in the heart. I say, the Lord will deal with them according to the proportion of infinite grace.

Take this one meditation, That where there is any uprightness, when thou shalt come to reap from God, thou shalt reap so much as must manifest to all angels and saints to all eternity, what the infinite mercy of an infinite God can do ; and that is enough, one would think : the poorest Christian, who does but the least for God, when he comes to reap shall have a harvest that must manifest the infinite riches of the infinite mercy of God, and what he is able to do for the exaltation of a creature to glory. Comfort thyself in this, in thy poor, low condition, and in the performing of thy poor services.

"Break up your fallow ground : for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you."

"Break up your fallow ground," &c. : the prophet exhorted them in the words before, to sow in righteousness, that they might reap mercy.

But you must not sow without ploughing, that were a preposterous way ; therefore, though the words come after, yet the thing is to be done before. Look that you plough up the fallow ground : you have been sinful and ungodly in your way, it will not be enough for you now to set upon some good actions, We will do better, we will do such and such good things that God requires of us : no, that is not the first work you must fall upon, but it must be to plough, to "break up your fallow ground."

Obs. 13. The hearts of men naturally are as fallow grounds, nothing but thorns and briars grow upon them, they are unfit for the seed of the word.

When he bids them plough up their fallow grounds, these three things are implied :

First, The work of humiliation. The truths of God, both of the law and of the gospel, must get into their hearts, and rend them up, even as the plough rends up the ground.

Secondly, That weeds, thorns, and briars must be turned up by the roots, the heart must be cleared of them. It is not enough to pluck out a weed or a thorn here and there, but we must plough up the ground, turn all upside down, and get rid of all the beggarly stuff and thorns that were in our hearts heretofore.

Thirdly, Get a softness in your hearts : as when the ground is ploughed, that which was before hard on the outside, and baked by the heat of the sun, being now turned up presents a soft mould, prepared to receive seed.

There are many evils in us that we would reform, but we have not been humbled for them, for our ceremonies, and subjection to false government of the church. Who has been humbled for these things, as sin ? We reform them as things inconvenient, but not being humbled for them as sin, the very roots of these things are in the hearts of many, so as, if times should change, a distinction would serve their turn to come and submit to them again ; so that we sow before we plough. In Jer. iv. 3, you have this exhortation carried a little further ; "Break up your fallow ground, and sow not among thorns." They must not think to mingle that which is good with that which is evil : it may be a few good seeds are brought into a business ; yea, but there is a great deal of evil. My brethren, take heed of being so deceived ; many, though they do not intend to deceive you, yet they may deceive you by mixing some good things with a great many evil ; and therefore examine things. But I note this place in Jeremiah the rather from the consideration of the time of its delivery, which was about the time of Josiah. Now that was a time of great reformation ; but saith Jeremiah, What though you do many things ? you sow among thorns, you do not plough up the ground, you are not humbled, your sins are not taken up by the roots ; and therefore, though a great deal of ill stuff seems to be cast out, and many good things are set up in the worship of God, which were not formerly, yet you must plough, plough up your fallow grounds. The Holy Ghost joining them together, "Sow in righteousness," and "break up your fallow ground," I would have you observe, That there are some that do sow and not plough, and there are others that do plough and not sow, but we must join both together.

There are that do plough and not sow ; that is, they (it may be) are troubled for their sins, much humbled perhaps on account of them, but they do not reform, after their humiliation there does not follow reformation. Now as reformation, where humiliation has not gone before, usually comes to little purpose, so humiliation, where reformation follows not after, comes likewise to little purpose.

In Isa. xxviii. 24, a similar image is applied to God ; "Doth the ploughman plough all day to sow ?" to note that God observes his times, and that we must not be offended because that he does not things as we would have him always, that is, he lets wicked men prosper sometimes, and the godly suffer afflictions : as if the Holy Ghost should say here, Let God alone with his work, God observes his times and seasons : as the ploughman does, he does not always plough ; so God has his times and seasons, and knows when to relieve, and when to afflict, his church, and when the wicked shall prosper, and when they shall be brought into adversity : God instructs the ploughman to know his season, and he knows his own, therefore be not offended. And so should we know our seasons, and observe our times for humiliation and reformation. But this for the reformation of a state.

But the ploughing of the heart is the thing that is here especially intended, and I desire to apply it particularly to every individual. Those who have such sore necks that they cannot bear the yoke, yet must all hold the plough here spoken of. Now for this ploughing of your hearts, it is to get in truths into your spirits, that may rend up your hearts. I will name some few truths that are as it were the ploughshare ; you should not only know them, but labour to get them into your hearts.

1. Such is the vilness of every sin, that it separates the soul from God, and puts it under an eternal curse. This one truth you must get deep into your hearts, it will help to loosen the roots of the thorns and briars that are there, the settled apprehension of this truth.

2. There is such a breach between God and the soul by sin, that all the power in all the creatures in heaven and earth is not able to make up this breach : here is a sharp ploughshare to get into the heart.

3. By nature I am fully engaged in this controversy with God, my heart is full of it, all the faculties of my soul are filled with that heinous sin.

4. Every action throughout my whole life, in my unregenerate estate, was nothing else but sin, nothing else but sin, and that too of a vile nature.

5. If any sin be pardoned to me it is by virtue of a price paid that is more worth than ten thousand worlds.

Now here is the gospel as well as the law, for the ploughing is but the spiritual using of the law ; for you must take notice that the law, as law, accepts of no humiliation for sin, but viewed in the light of the gospel it does tend to humiliation : the law in the gospel humbles the soul so as to do it good. Now therefore get the truths that the law, having reference to the gospel, requires, and see what they will do in thy soul : you must work them in. And let conscience be put on to draw this plough : these are the ploughshare, and the working of conscience is the drawing of this plough ; when the plough stops, (as when it meets with a thorn and brier,) a strong conscience will draw it on, and will rend up by the roots the thorns and briars. Though these truths put you to pain, yet you must be content to draw them on in the soul ; and if these and the like truths be got into thy soul, and thou be at plough, and thy conscience be drawing, I shall say unto thee, God speed the plough ; yea, God speed these truths which conscience is drawing on in the soul, for they may tend to a great deal of good, to prepare thee for the seed that may bring forth righteousness and mercy to thy soul for ever. I confess it is a hard work to plough thus ; indeed only to hear sermons, and talk and confer of good things, these things are pretty easy ; but to go to plough, to plough with such truths as these are, to get up the thorns and briars by the roots, this is a very hard task : but we must be willing to do it, and to continue ploughing ; as the fallow ground must not only be ploughed once, but it may stand in need of ploughing the second and third time before it be fit for the seed to be cast in ; and so with our hearts. It may be some of you have been ploughing, and have got in some truths ; yea, but many weeds and thorns have grown up since, and you must to ploughing again : it may be many years ago since you have been thus ploughing, and your hearts have lain fallow ever since ; do not think it enough that once you have been humbled, but be often ploughing up this fallow ground ; it is far better to have the plough get into your hearts, though it be sharp, than to have the sword of God's justice upon you. We have in these times a wanton generation, that cannot endure to go to plough, they would be doing nothing but taking in the sweet, treading out the corn. But this ploughing they ery out of merely through wantonness, and sinful self-indulgence ; they would have nothing but jollity and licentiousness in their hearts and ways ; yet the Scripture, in Luke ix. 62, compares the ministers of the gospel to ploughmen ; "No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God," not fit to be employed in the administration of the gospel. These men talk of humiliation for sin, but they reject that, than which nothing more humbles for sin, the price that was paid for sin in the blood of Jesus Christ : there is no such sharp ploughshare as that. If I were to preach one sermon in all my life for the humbling of men for sin, I would take a text that might show the great price that was paid for it, and therein open the breach which sin has made between God and man's soul ; but they will not make use even of the gospel as a plough to plough the heart for the work of humiliation.

Well, God has prospered this work heretofore, and notwithstanding all the wantonness of men's spirits this way, yet, I say still, God speed the plough ; God speed this way of ploughing the hearts of men, and getting in those truths calculated to humble the hearts of men for their sins. These were the truths which God blessed in former times, and none ever lived so much to the honour of the gospel. For this generation that is come up, they talk of the gospel, but they live not to the honour of it, the gospel has not honour by them, nor has Jesus Christ. But the former generation of men, though in some things they might fail, yet certainly God blessed them in their way, so far as it was according to truth.

No marvel though these men bring forth such little fruit of righteousness, it is because they sow among thorns; presently they are blown at the top, and full of confidence, but their seed is among thorns, and therefore it doth not prosper. And thus much for this expression about the ploughing up of fallow grounds, both in reference to general reformation and humiliation, and concerning men's souls in particular.

"For it is time to seek the Lord." Here we may

Obs. 14. It is a mercy that there is yet time for you to seek the Lord. It might have been past time with you for seeking the Lord, God might have forced his honour from you in another way, have fetched out his glory from you in your eternal ruin. Oh! it is a mercy that God will be sought of you; and therefore "break up your fallow ground," and "sow in righteousness;" "for it is time to seek the Lord." Oh! you that yet live loaded with years and guilt, remember this scripture; yet you have "time to seek the Lord," and it is a wondrous mercy; if you but understood the extent of it, you would fall down with your faces upon the ground, and bless the Lord that you have yet time to seek him. What do you think those damned creatures in hell would now give, if it might be said of them, that they have time to seek the Lord? if they might have but one hour more to seek the Lord with any hope of obtaining mercy from him? What you are now, they were not long since. Oh! do you fear and tremble, lest, if not seeking the Lord, you ere long be as now they are; so that it shall be said of you, Time is gone, time to seek the Lord is past; God will not now be sought of us. Oh "seek the Lord while he may be found, and call upon him while he is near." When divers ministers and others were attempting once to comfort a woman of Cambridge under great terror of conscience, she regarded them with a ghastly look, and gave them only this answer, Call time back again. If you can call time back again, then there may be hope for me: but time is gone.

Oh that we had hearts to prize our time, to seek the Lord therefore "while he may be found." When thou goest home, fall down upon thy face before the Lord, and bless him that yet "it is time to seek the Lord." It is time for the public, through God's mercy, yet to seek the Lord. It might have been past time; and who almost that desired to know any thing of God's mind for these last seven or eight years or more, but did think that England's time of seeking God was even "clean gone for ever?" But the Lord has been pleased to lengthen out our time to seek him; and this we should prize and make use of.

Obs. 15. It is high time now to seek the Lord. For,

First, God has shown much patience and long-suffering toward you, and there is a time in the which the Lord saith he will be weary with forbearing; therefore the Lord having suffered thus long with you, it is high time for you to seek him, lest he should say, that he was weary in forbearing, and would forbear no more. It is fit you should seek the Lord at all times, but now it is high time, when God hath been so long-suffering towards you; how do you know but that the time for the end of patience is at an end?

2. Mercy is even going, and judgments are threatened: as if the prophet should say, If ever you will seek him, seek him now; God is going, and judgments are at hand, and therefore it is high time for you to seek the Lord. As a prisoner pleads whilst the judge is on the bench, but if he sees the judge ready to rise, then, knowing that if he depart he is undone for ever, he lifts up his voice, and cries out, Mercy, mercy. So it is now high time for you to seek the Lord; high time, mercy is going, judgment is at hand; God, as the Judge, is going off the bench; now cry, cry out for your lives, or you are undone for ever.

This may well be applied to us, both in general, and in the particular. It is high time for us; God has shown himself about to depart from us, yet still he lingers; a company of his saints have been crying, and as the Lord has been going from us, they have lifted up their voice, and so he yet grants us time.

Obs. 16. This time is an acceptable time. God now calls upon you, and holds forth the sceptre of his grace towards you, therefore it is now an acceptable time to seek God; seek him now, and he will be found. 2 Cor. vi. 2, "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation;" while you enjoy the means of grace, while God is offering mercy in the gospel, it is the accepted time, it is the time to seek the Lord. The misery of man is therefore great, because he knows not his time. In Eccl. viii. 6, 7, the wise man saith, "Because to every purpose there is time and judgment, therefore the misery of man is great upon him; for he knoweth not that which shall be." Oh! this is true of us, we know not our time, and therefore is our misery great upon us. "And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things that belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes," Luke xix. 41, 42. Missing of time is a dangerous thing; that may at one time be done with ease, which cannot with all possible labour be effected at another. Thou canst not tell what may depend on one day, on one minute; perhaps even eternity may depend upon this moment, upon this day. A man goes abroad from his family and gets into company, perhaps into an alehouse or tavern to drink, and there spends the day in wickedness; thou dost not know but on that time the day of thy eternity may depend, it may be cast upon that day: as Saul was cast upon that sacrificial act of his; "For now" (saith Samuel) "would the Lord have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever. But now thy kingdom shall not continue," 1 Sam. xiii. 13, 14; so God may say to thee, Well, notwithstanding all thy former sins, I would have been content to have passed by them, if thou hadst sought me this day. The consideration of this would make us take heed how we spend even a single day. A mariner may do that at one time which he cannot possibly do at another. He has now a gale of wind, and may quickly get over sea; but if he stay till another time, though he would give his heart's blood to get on, he cannot. And so sometimes thou hast such gales of the Spirit of God, as may do good to thy soul for ever; take heed thou lose them not, if thou losest them thou mayst be undone for ever. Oh! it is fit to wait upon God for our time; and if God give us time, let us take heed we do not trifle and say, We shall have time hereafter. Therefore in Phil. ii. 12, the apostle saith, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling;" and there follows, ver. 13, "For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." What connexion is there? If God work the will and the deed, why need I work at all? Nay, the connexion is thus, Do you work out your salvation with fear and trembling, take all opportunities you can, let the fear of God be upon you so as to omit no opportunity; for you do absolutely depend upon God, so that if he withdraw himself from you, you are undone for ever, for you can do nothing of yourselves, it is God that worketh the will and the deed. As if we should say to a mariner, Be careful, take advantage of your wind and sail, for all your voyage depends upon God; if you neglect your opportunity, you are gone. It is time for the youngest of all to seek the Lord; as soon as ever you begin to have the dawning of reason, it is time for you to seek the Lord; oh that you did but know your time! But what time is it for the old, for those who have neglected seeking the Lord the most part of their lives? is it not high time for you to seek the Lord, who have spent so much of your lives in vanity and folly? The time you have is uncertain; and yet suppose you should live so long a period as in the course of nature you might, yet many of you cannot have as much time to seek the Lord as you have had in departing from God, you cannot have so much time to honour God as you have had to dishonour him; and therefore is it not time for you to seek the Lord? I remember it is said of Themistocles, that when about to die, at the age of a hundred and seven, he was grieved on this account, Now I am to die, when I begin to be wise. And certainly it cannot but be a grief to any to think, Through God's mercy, the Lord has begun to work grace (I hope) in my heart, yea, but as soon as I begin to know God, and have any heart to serve him in this world, I must be taken out of it. It was a proverbial speech once, (you find it in Plutarch's Lives,) Weighty things to-morrow. Oh! take heed this proverb be not fulfilled concerning you, Weighty things to-morrow. Take weighty things, things of infinite consequence, while you have time. Let weighty things be regarded now.

But further, certainly it is time now for England to seek the Lord, for many reasons.

1. Never any nation in the world had a greater opportunity for seeking and honouring God than we have had. We were like to have been befooled of our opportunity of getting mercy from God; but the Lord has trusted us with it again after it was got even out of our hands; oh! let us then catch hold of it now, and bless God that we have it even restored to us again, and let it be a strong argument upon us now to seek the Lord.

2. Certainly it is time in a more special manner now for us, because that things are in so great a confusion, that all are at their wits' end almost. Alas! our wise counsellors at the stern, are fain to depend upon mere providences and casualties, and the truth is, there is such a confusion of things, that if God should say to the wisest man in the land, Well, do you contrive which way you think things should be best, and I will carry out your suggestions, they could scarce tell what to say, or on what to determine, such confusion prevails.

3. We thought it was time to seek the Lord, when we were in great danger from the adversaries, when we apprehended that they would come to our very gates: surely it is as great time to seek the Lord now, when he has delivered us from our enemies, that we may not devour one another. And when God has given us some rest from them, and said, Well, all that before you were afraid of, was, that the enemies would prevail, and then you could do nothing, but I have quelled their power in a great measure, and commenced the work of reformation, oh! we are now at a stand, and know not what to do, and we go on in such crafty ways one against another, that every one is at a stand. Oh then, it is time for us to fall down upon our faces, to seek God to direct us, to regard the great opportunity that God has put into our hands.

4. We now want only light to know what to do; and therefore whereas heretofore we have sought to God for power that we might be able, now we are to seek to him for light, that we may know how to improve our ability. There are these two things in seeking God; praying to him, and labouring to put ourselves into that way and disposition wherein God is wont to meet with his people, and communicate himself to his people.

"Till he come and rain righteousness upon you." The word רָיַן here translated "rain" sometimes signifies to teach; and the Scripture makes use of that similitude of rain, for doctrine, because of the likeness of doctrines distilling as the rain. Accordingly some interpret it, Ply the work until he teaches righteousness; and so regard it as a prophecy of the Messias: "Sow righteousness," and "break up your fallow ground, for it is time to seek the Lord," till the Messias come and teach you the righteousness of God. So they paraphrase it. But take it as it is here,

"And rain righteousness." And then there are these things in it:

I. The signification of the word "righteousness."

II. What is meant by "raining righteousness."

I. By "righteousness" is meant,

1. That God will deliver them from oppression; that though they have unrighteous dealing with men, yet they shall have righteous dealing with him. And this is a great mercy to a people, for God to undertake that there shall be nothing but righteous dealings betwixt them and himself.

2. The fruit of God's faithfulness in the fulfilling of all those promises of his for good unto them, wherein the Lord does style himself righteous. If you will now break up, saith he, your fallow ground, and seek the Lord, the Lord will deliver you from oppression; and the Lord will make good all his faithfulness to you, according to all that good word that he has promised.

II. By "raining righteousness" is meant,

1. That all their good and help must come from heaven as the rain doth; as if the prophet should say, If you look to men, yea, to men in public place, you have little hopes that there should be such righteous dealings, or to expect that the good word of God in all his promises to his people should be fulfilled; yea, but look to heaven, saith God, "I will rain," it shall come down from heaven by ways that are above nature, and beyond the power of man, "I will rain righteousness." Seek him therefore till he rain righteousness; be not discouraged though you should see public men carry things never so unrighteously, yet seek the Lord till he rain righteousness.

2. The plenty of righteousness, that righteousness shall come in abundance. It may be now, some men may meet with some righteous dealings, and be encouraged when things are at the best among men, but this righteousness comes but by drops; yea, but seek the Lord till he "rain righteousness." What is it to have a few drops of water? You may go into your garden, and with a little pot of water water the herbs; yea, but when it rains down water, then the earth is refreshed. And so saith the Lord here, Seek me till I come with a shower of righteousness, and rain it down upon you.

3. The working so graciously in the works of my righteousness to you, as shall make the seeds that you have sown to be fruitful, to grow up to the honour of my name, and to your good. Now there are many godly amongst you, and they sow righteousness, they do many good actions; but, alas! kept down still by the scorching heat of the oppressors. In places where oppression prevails, many godly, truly godly, persons sow much seed of righteousness, but little good comes of it, all is kept down: yea, but saith the Lord, Seek me till I rain righteousness; I will rain from heaven such showers that shall be the fulfilling of my promises to you, that shall make all your righteous actions grow up to the praise of my name, and the good of your brethren. Oh what a blessed time, when there shall be nothing but righteous dealings, and all the faithfulness of God shall be fulfilled, and there shall be plenty!

Obs. 17. God will come to sow righteousness in time. Those that plough and sow in righteousness, God will come in his grace and goodness to them: "To him that soweth righteousness shall be a sure reward,"

Prov. xi. 18. Be not discouraged, you that sow righteous seed; for it is not with the seed of righteousness as with the seed that is sown in the earth, for if that do not come up within a certain time, it will never come up; but you cannot say so of the seed of righteousness, it will come up.

Obs. 18. God sometimes comes not presently in raining righteousness upon his people that do sow righteousness. "Seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness:" as if the prophet should say, You have hearts to seek the Lord, to be humbled, and reform, to sow in righteousness; well, be not discouraged, continue seeking, stay till he doth rain righteousness. After the seed is sown, you would fain have a shower the next morning, but, may be, it will not fall so soon, stay till God's time: God does not always hear the prayers of his people so as to answer them when they would. It is very observable concerning Elijah, at one time when he cried for fire to come down upon the sacrifice, it came down presently; but when he cried for rain, he was fain to send his servant seven times: Elijah did not get rain from heaven so soon as fire from heaven.

Obs. 19. Those that seek aright will continue seeking God "till he come and rain righteousness." There is an excellent scripture in Psal. ci. 2; saith David, "I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way. O when wilt thou come unto me? I will walk within my house with a perfect heart." As if he should say, Why, Lord, it is thy presence I desire more than a thousand worlds, and I will endeavour to behave myself "within my house," in my family, not only in the presence of others, but in my family, in the most "perfect way;" Lord, "when wilt thou come unto me?" It seems God did not come and manifest himself presently: though David did behave himself in a perfect way in his house, yet David professes he would wait still. Many scriptures may be given for this, and many arguments why a gracious heart will not leave over seeking till the Lord comes.

It is the Lord I seek, and he is a great God, and fit to be waited on, though he come not presently. We think it is a matter of state, because of the distance that there is between one and another, to make them stay; why should we think much that we should wait upon the great and infinite God? And, perhaps, you pray and find no benefit; it is fit for you to wait upon God. There is an infinite distance between God and you; seek and wait till he comes.

There are many motives to continue seeking God.

1. That in so continuing to seek, we are doing our duty. This is a very great evil among many; they are praying and seeking God, but they only have their eyes upon what they shall get by seeking God, and if nothing comes of it, then they are discontented; whereas the mere consideration that in patient seeking thou art doing thy duty, should be enough to quiet thy heart.

2. Thou certainly canst not be better engaged than in seeking God. Whither wilt thou go? If thou leavest seeking God thou turnest from thine own mercy to vanity. And hast thou a temptation to leave off seeking God? shalt thou get any thing by it? Certainly thou canst not do better, and therefore seek the Lord, "seek the Lord till he come." Isa. xxx. 18, is a most excellent scripture to uphold the heart in seeking God, though God do not seem to come: "The Lord is a God of judgment; blessed are they that wait for him." You have not judgment, you know not when it is a fit time that things should be done; but "the Lord is a God of judgment," he knows how to do things in judgment, and therefore "blessed are they that wait for him." Think of this, and deny your own judgments and your own thoughts, and know that you are waiting upon the Lord, who is "a God of judgment," infinitely wise, to come to his people in a fit season, and to come so that at last you would not wish that he had come sooner.

3. All the while you are waiting, God is working good. We are waiting at men's doors, and they take no notice of it; but if we knew, all the time we are waiting, that our petition were reading and they in consultation about it, and we were only detained for the issue of the consultation, it would satisfy us. And so a gracious heart may be assured of this. Hast thou sought the Lord in the truth of thy heart? The thing is not come yet, but ever since thou hast sought the Lord, the heart of God has been thinking of that thing which thou soughtest him for, and wilt not thou go on to seek God still, till he doth come?

4. While thou art seeking God, thou art not altogether without some dews. Indeed God does not come and rain in showers that righteousness which he will hereafter, but surely thou hast dews, thou hast some encouragements; do not slight those dews of God's grace which thou art receiving, for then thou mayst stay the longer before the showers of righteousness come; rather prize the dews, and the showers of righteousness will come the sooner. Many Christians, though they have many dews of God's grace upon their hearts to refresh them, yet, because they have not showers, think they have nothing. What! hast thou no dews of grace? what is it that keeps thy heart so tender as it is? thou wouldst not for a thousand worlds wilfully sin against God: certainly, if thy heart were hardened the truths of God would not so affect it. Indeed the rain comes in a visible manner; yea, but there are dews of grace that come in a secret way: thou dost not, indeed, see the comings in of those dews of grace upon thy heart, yea, but others may see their effect.

5. When the Lord does come, he will come more fully a great deal. It is recorded of Glover, the martyr, that when he had been seeking God for the raining of righteousness, and become willing to give his life for God, and yet God had absented himself from him, he complained to his fellow, Austin, that God was not come. Well, but, saith his friend, he will come; and give me a sign before you die, if you feel the Spirit of God come to your heart. The poor man was to be burnt the next day, and continued all night in seeking God, and yet he came not; yea, the sheriff came to carry him to the stake, and his heart still remained dead. But he went on till he came within view of the stake, and then the Holy Ghost came into his heart, and filled him with joy, so that he lifted up his hands and voice, and cried, He is come, he is come. Now there came a shower of righteousness upon his heart; he was content to seek the Lord till he came.

Obs. 20. Those who are content to seek God till he come, his coming will be to them with plentiful showers in raining righteousness. Oh how many cursed apostates are there that will curse themselves one day for not continuing to seek God till he came! Perhaps some here have had some convictions of conscience, and because they have not had encouragement, presently they have become discouraged; and so thou hast basely gone back, and now God has left thee, and thou art become a base, useless hypocrite, a dishonour and a disgrace to religion, and all because thou wouldst not stay till God came. Oh! but others have staid God's time, and God came at length so fully that now they bless his name that they did stay. I remember I have read of Columbus, who first discovered the West Indies, that his men were even weary, he was so long in sailing, and so they resolved they would return back again; so all their labour had been lost. But Columbus came to them with all entreaties to go on a little time, and at length prevailed with them to continue the voyage but three days longer. So they were content to venture three days, and within those three days they began to see land, and so discovered those parts of the world of which before we knew nothing. Now, what a miserable thing had it been if they had come back and lost all their voyage! Thus it is with many a soul sailing towards heaven and eternal life. Thou hast been a long time tossed up and down in the waves of the sea, the waves of temptation and of trouble, and thou thinkest it is best to return: oh! stay a while, do not limit thy pursuit to three days, but go on; it might haply be said of some, that had they proceeded in their voyage but three days more, they might have come and seen, whereas now they have lost all. Oh, "seek the Lord" then, "till he come and rain righteousness upon you."

Obs. 21. The help of those who seek God is from heaven. "Till he come and rain." They do not so much expect help from the creature as from heaven, to it they look up for their help. When all comforts in creatures fail, they look upwards and there see their help.

Obs. 22. The effect of God's coming to his people after seeking, is to make them fruitful; "till he come and rain righteousness;" that is the end of the mercy of God in coming to people. It may be you would have God come; but wherefore? to bring comfort unto you? No, the end of God's coming to his saints is to make them fruitful. And this would be an argument of the sincerity of your hearts in seeking God; when you are seeking him, what do you seek him for? only for comfort, and peace, and to ease you from troubles? Yea, but do you seek God that you may be fruitful? The hypocrites seek to have grace that they may have comfort, but the godly seek comfort that they may have grace: so it is, that God may "rain righteousness." I am as a dry ground, oh that God would come with the influence of his grace to make me fruitful in the works of holiness! Many of you would have comfort, (as now in these days men's ears are altogether set upon comfort,) but is your comfort the showers of God? does it make the seeds of righteousness fructify in your hearts? Certainly you can have little comfort in that which is not, as rain from heaven, to bring up the fruits of righteousness in your hearts and in your lives.

Obs. 23. God's coming with blessings upon those who seek him, is righteousness; that is, the good that they have as a fruit of seeking of him, is the fulfilling of God's word, for which God's faithfulness was engaged. Jesus Christ had purchased it by his blood, and they had before a bond for whatever good they received from God.

This consideration should much help us, both in our seeking God, and in the enjoyment of our comforts. When we are seeking God we are not seeking him merely as for a gratuity. Though in reference to us it is only free grace, but to Christ it is righteousness, it is that which Christ has purchased. Therefore saith St. John, "If we confess our sins," he does not say, God is merciful to forgive them, but "God is faithful and just to forgive our sins," 1 John i. 9. And so, when you receive a mercy from God, you are not to look upon it as a mere alms, though in reference to yourselves indeed it is so; but in reference to Christ, your Head, it is righteousness, it is that which Christ has purchased, that which God gives you as a fruit of his faithfulness, as well as of his own free grace: when thou art seeking of God let not the eye of thy faith be only upon the grace and mercy, but upon the very righteousness, of God.

Obs. 24. Though the good we do results in our own benefit, yet God rewards it as if he gained by it. God makes promises to us, that if we do thus and thus we shall enjoy such and such mercies. "Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy." When we sow, God gives us leave to aim at ourselves; but yet when God comes to reward us, he rewards us as if it were only for him and not for ourselves, he rewards us in ways of righteousness.

And thus much for these words, raining righteousness. God has rain of another kind for the wicked and ungodly: "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest," Psal. xl. 6.

Ver. 13. Ye have ploughed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity; ye have eaten the fruit of lies: because thou didst trust in thy way, in the multitude of thy mighty men.

Notwithstanding all exhortations, and all offers of mercy, yet you have gone quite contrary, saith the prophet. Instead of breaking from your iniquities, you have ploughed them.

"Ye have ploughed wickedness;" that is, you have taken pains to propagate that which is evil, both in yourselves and others. That is the ploughing of wickedness. "The ploughing of the wicked is sin," Prov. xxi. 4; that is, their endeavours, their labour is especially for the furtherance of sin, the very strength of their spirits is let out for the promotion of their wickedness. So Job i. 8, "Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same;" to plough means to endeavour and labour for iniquity, for so the word פָּרַח here translated "to plough," signifies, to frame, work, or endeavour anything with all our might. You have set your hearts altogether upon this work of furthering wickedness, in thinking of it, in plotting about it, in stirring up of one another, and doing all you can in your endeavours for the furtherance of wickedness.

Yea, you have been willing to go through all difficulties to accomplish your wicked intentions; as we read in Micah vii. 3, a scripture which shows remarkably the strong endeavours of wicked men after their sin, they "do evil with both hands earnestly." It is a very strange text; they are willing to take pains and to put forth all their energies in their sins.

Oh how many are there who take more pains to go to hell, than others do that go to heaven! they will so struggle and suffer for their sins, be willing to break with their friends, to venture their estates, to hazard their healths, to accomplish their sinful lusts; yea, to do any thing in the world, to compass their wickedness. Yet will they not plough for God, but complain of any little difficulty in his ways; whilst no difficulty in the ways of sin can deter them. Oh what a wicked and wretched heart is this, to be offended with every difficulty in God's ways, and yet be content to endure all bitterness in the ways of sin! Oh that we were but as instrumental for God, and willing to plough as hard for him, as others do for sin! When you shall come to die, and to reap the fruit of your labour, what terror do you think will this be, when your consciences tell you that you have taken more pains in the ways of wickedness than ever you did in the ways of God! As Cardinal Wolsey exclaimed when he was about to die, Oh! had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have deserted me in my grey hairs. So when you come to die, and your consciences say, Oh that I had but broken as much sleep for prayer and seeking of God; oh that I had but ventured my estate, and name, as much in the ways of God as in the ways of sin! it had been happy for me; is it possible that any of you can die in peace, when your consciences shall tell you that you never took those pains for God which you have done for sin? In a good motion for God, if others engage you will join, but you will not plough hard for it; but in things that are suitable to your own lusts, you will not only join with others, but move it yourself, and plough hard for it. Oh what a pity is it, that men's parts and strength should be so expended on that which is evil! How instrumental might men of active spirits be for God if their necks were but in God's yoke! but they, all the days of their lives, have their necks in the devil's yoke, and are ploughing continually for him, and they will reap accordingly.

Now this ploughing wickedness referred especially to their false worship; there they endeavoured strenuously, they ploughed hard to get up their false worship, their worship at Dan and Beth-el, and not to go to Jerusalem to worship.

"Ye have ploughed wickedness." You do not hear of any sowing; for the truth is, there needs no sowing for wickedness, there needs but the preparation; do but plough, that is, do but prepare the ground, and wickedness will come up of itself. When you plough righteousness you must sow the seeds of righteousness.

"Ye have reaped iniquity." That is, you have your heart's desire, you have brought about your own ends, you have what you ploughed for. Sometimes men plough and take a great deal of pains in that which is evil, and God crosses them; but at other times God lets them reap: that is, You labour to promote such a thing, though it be not according to God's mind, and it may be God will let you have it; well, you plough for it, and you shall have it: and dost thou bless thyself in that? Oh, woe to thee! it is a woeful harvest that thou hast. It is a fearful curse for any to have their heart's desires in their sin satisfied. It were a thousand times better that thy ploughing were to no purpose at all, than all thy labours and endeavours were quite lost: thou art loth to lose thy endeavours in the ways of sin, but it were a thousand times better that thy endeavours were all lost than that thou shouldst attain that which thou ploughest for.

But I find the word עוֹלָה here rendered "iniquity," is used also in Scripture to signify, the punishment of iniquity; the Hebrews having the same word to signify sin, and the punishment of sin.

Or thus, which I think the Holy Ghost somewhat aims at, You plough wickedness, and reap iniquity. The ploughing was for their false worship, and their reaping was iniquity. I beseech you here

Obs. 1. The fruit of false worship is the increase of sin in a nation. "Ye have ploughed wickedness," for so afterwards it is called, the "great wickedness," and the fruit of that is the increase of much sin, it brings forth a harvest for sin. When men have striven to set up any false worship, and succeeded, what is the fruit? There grows presently a formality in religion, men have a religion, and yet they enjoy their lusts; for the true worship of God alone will not stand with men's lusts, therefore when men set up any kind of false worship, this will be the fruit, there will be a formality in religion, and this will please men exceeding well, for they can live in worldliness and licentiousness. And verily, my brethren, one main thing that makes carnal, loose hearts contend so much for a loose kind of worship, is that they may have so much the more liberty to sin. Endeavouring for this kind of evil will result in the reaping of iniquity.

"Ye have eaten the fruit of lies." What are those lies of the which they eat the fruit?

1. Those arguments by which they justified themselves in their iniquity. Yea, but they are but the fruit of lies. They would set up a way of false worship, but they would have some reasons for it, they would have some arguments to defend it, and those, oh, how they hugged and closed with them; and let any one bring and show them that such a thing may be proved thus and thus by such an argument, now, because they had a mind to the thing, their hearts closed upon those arguments; and they fed upon it, it did them good at their hearts.

2. The comforts which they had from their false worship. In the way that you set up you have a great deal of comfort, and you are very glad that it thrives. It is but a lie, saith God.

3. The hopes they entertained when their false worship was established. They had such hopes that all should be so well, and that there should be no more trouble between them and Jerusalem. But you feed upon lies, saith God.

4. The interpretation of God's dealings, in blessing them in their false worship. All kind of outward blessings which they had they interpreted as the goodness of God to them for that which they had done: as that is usual in places where there is any thing in matters of religion altered, though it be not right, yet you shall have men that are for that way, whatever blessing comes upon a nation, they will interpret it as the fruit of that. Yea, but this will come to nothing.

5. The false reports that they raised against those who opposed their false worship. There were many that would not yield to their modes of false worship, and upon that reports were raised concerning them, what kind of men they were, and what they had done; and when these reports were brought to them of the other way, they did them good at their hearts. Yea, but "ye have eaten the fruit of lies:" many men's breakfasts, and dinners, and suppers, are nothing else but "lies." Surely, now, this will breed no good nourishment. And why is it that we have such a deal of ill blood amongst us? Simply because that men have such coarse food.

"Because thou didst trust in thy way, in the multitude of thy mighty men." Israel, the ten tribes, had two great confidences, that are expressed in this latter part of the verse.

I. In their way; that is, in the way of religion that they had chosen for themselves, and which was distinct from the way of Judah, from the true worship of God.

II. In their mighty men; that is, the power they had in their state.

These are two great confidences of people.

I. Confidence in their way. "Thou didst trust in thy way." They were confident that was right, and were not willing to hear any thing to the contrary: and if they did, yet their hearts were so biased by their false worship, that any thing that was said to the contrary was nothing to them; they were very confident that no one could say any thing to purpose against them; No, we have so many understanding, learned men for, this way, no question it is right, none but a company of silly, weak men, follow any other course.

Thus they trusted and pleased themselves in their way, and sought to harden themselves and one another in it. They have got the day, they have, doubtless, laid all upon their backs who have opposed them; there is a great deal more reason for this than for any other procedure; there is no way of peace to the state, to the kingdom, but this; that which others would have, namely, to go to Jerusalem to worship, is most unreasonable. Yea, they think that God is well pleased with their devices, and that they do good service in opposing and persecuting those who are not of their way. Thus they trust in their way.

Obs. 2. That which is a man's own way he is very ready to trust in, and to esteem highly. We have for this a notable scripture in the book of Judges, chap. ii. 19, expressing well the strength of spirit that is in men when their way is of their own devising; "They ceased not from their own doings, nor from their stubborn way." I beseech you observe this, it is but a different expression, own doings, and own way; the doings were their own, such things as they had contrived to themselves, their own way; and then they ceased not from them, they were stubborn in them because they were their own. "The way of a fool is right in his own eyes; but he that hearkeneth unto counsel is wise," Prov. xii. 15. "A fool," one that understands a little, yet if the way be his own, he will not hearken to counsel, he thinks he needs not counsel with any; he is so strong in it because it is his own way. It is a hard thing to get men out of their own contrivances in matters of religion: and therefore what God saith of all the heathen, in Jer. ii. 10, 11, is observable; "Pass over the isles of Chittim, and see; and send unto Kedar, and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing. Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit." No nation but God's own people would change their gods; why? because the gods of the nations were of their own making. Men adhere strongly to their own inventions. "Thou didst trust in thy way." As when an object is too near the eye, the eye is not able to see it, so as to discern the evil that may be in it; so the evil that is near oneself, very near, that is one's own, it is very hard to see. If a man's heart be engaged in a way of his own, he will be ready to father it upon God himself, and say, It is God's way; and he will be ready to think that all other ways, different from his, are men's own.

None are more ready to charge others with pride than the proud; and none more ready to charge others of adhering to their own way, than those who most stick to their own conceits: it is one mark of such a man's heart, to think that whosoever differs from him, is perversely stubborn in his own conceits and his own ways.

It is difficult to make such will-worshippers acknowledge that their ways are of their own devising; but however men may attempt to deceive themselves or others, and even ascribe to God their own inventions, yet the Lord will one day discover all their ways, and show how much of their own is in them. We have a notable text for that in Prov. xxi. 2, "Every way of a man is right in his own eyes: but the Lord pondereth" or weigheth "the hearts." Mark, "Every way of a man is right in his own eyes: but the Lord pondereth the hearts:" that is, Though we choose ways to ourselves, and think they are right, and are ready to declare that our ways are God's ways, that we may justify ourselves so much the more; but saith the text, "the Lord pondereth the hearts;" that is, God weighs exactly how much there is of his own, and how much there is of our own in it. Oh! it were a happy thing if we were able to do so; it is a great part of the skill of a Christian to be able so to ponder his own ways, as to know how much of God and how much of himself is in a thing. Very few in the world know this; there is scarce any action that the best of us do, but there is somewhat of self in it, somewhat of God it may be, and somewhat of self; but now here is the skill, to be able to weigh how much of God and how much of ourselves is in an action. Your goldsmiths can presently tell you how much gold and silver is in a vessel, but an unskilful man looks upon it and thinks it all gold. Oh! it were an excellent skill to be able in all our actions thus to ponder all our ways, to know how much of God and how much of ourselves is in them; it is for want of this spiritual discernment that we miscarry so often. "Every way of a man is right in his own eyes: but the Lord pondereth," God weighs men's actions, to see how much of himself and how much of us there is in them.

But now, then, is it so, that it is in the hearts of men to trust so much in their own way, because it is their own? Oh what a shame is it, then, that we should not have our hearts close with, and trust in, God's way! Let a way be never so base and vile, yet if it be a man's own, his heart closes with it, and trusts, and is strong in it: oh, then, when the way is apparently God's, why should we be so fickle and unsteady as we are almost always in it? Make but the way of religion to be thine own, and then thou wilt be strong enough in it; but till that time comes, till we have given up our wills to the will of God, and we have made God's will to be our own will, we are never likely to be strong in the ways of God. When there is but one will between God and us, when God's interest is our interest, when God's glory is our glory, then shall we become strong. Oh! happy are they who have so given up themselves to God, that they look upon their own good to be more in God than in themselves: to look upon one's own good, and will, and the comforts of our hearts, and the happiness of our lives, to be more in God than in ourselves, is the work of grace that leads to perseverance in godliness. Thus it is between man and wife; when the wife comes to make the will of her husband her own, then she loves him strongly, and constantly: so when God's will is made to be our own, then we will follow God's will strongly, and shall persevere in it.

II. Confidence in their mighty men; "in the multitude of thy mighty men." This made them very confident in their way: why, they had an army to back them, they had an army to fight for them, to maintain that way of theirs, they had countenance from men of power, they had strength enough to crush any that should oppose them.

Obs. 3. When the outward strength of a kingdom goes along with a way of religion, men think it must needs be right, and that all its opponents are but weak men. Mark the connexion: "Thou didst trust in thy way;" that is, (as I find it generally interpreted,) thy way of religion; and then "in the multitude of thy mighty men;" these two are put together: and generally men will trust in, and incline thus to, the strongest side, and the scale would turn were the strength of the mighty men to go another way; as now, suppose that the strength of the kingdom of the ten tribes had resolved to go up to Jerusalem to worship, and not to worship at Dan and Beth-el, do you think there would have been almost any considerable party that would not have gone up to Jerusalem, but worshipped at Dan and Beth-el? but when the strength of the kingdom held the other way, when the mighty men and the way of religion countenanced each other, the generality of the people went that way that the mighty men went. This is the vanity and the exceeding evil of men's hearts, that which way soever the mighty men go, that way they will trust in. There are very few who will deliberately say, I will go that way in which I see the mighty men; but there is a secret bias which inclines the minds of men to hearken to what may be said for that way, and not willingly to listen to what may be said for another. It is such a bias as makes them willing and ready to let in any probability; if there be but the least probability for the way in which the mighty men go, they take in that, and that makes way for another and another likelihood; and so, imbibing more and more, they become so confirmed for that way, as to put off the strength of any thing that can be said against it, except it be so apparent, as that they must be forced to sin against their consciences directly if they listen not to it. I say, when the spirits of men are biased by seeing the strength of the kingdom go in a way, though (perhaps) they may lay some good at their hearts, yet there is that corruption in man's heart, that except we can make the other way so clear, that, notwithstanding all possible shifts and every kind of reasoning, they shall be so self-condemned, that their own consciences shall tell them they go directly against their light. I say, except we can come thus, we cannot prevail with men's hearts, when the sway of a kingdom goes another way. And there are many truths of God that concern his worship, which cannot be made so clear but that a man may have such a diversion to satisfy his conscience in this. That I in going another way do not go against my conscience: God would have us adopt that which is most likely to be his mind, without any consideration of any outward respects. Oh how will outward respects turn the balance! In Rev. xiii. 3, when power and authority were given to antichrist, "all the world wondered after the beast." So it is ordinarily, that way which the mighty men go men's hearts will generally follow. Oh the little honour that Jesus Christ has by us! Our hearts are swayed for the most part by carnal arguments and carnal motives.

Obs. 4. Great armies are the confidence of carnal hearts. "In the multitude of thy mighty men." When they can get together a great army of a multitude of mighty men, let there be never such threats in the word, yet if they think they have strength enough to bear them out, they bless themselves therein. Oh! let us take heed of this carnal confidence. Through God's mercy the Lord has given us now, that we have the multitude of mighty men on our side; let us take heed that our faith do not ebb and flow with our armies. I will give you one scripture that shows how far a gracious heart should be from making flesh his arm; "Cursed be the man," saith Jer. xvii. 5, "that maketh flesh his arm." And how far a godly man was from trusting in an army of mighty men, we have in 2 Chron. xiv. 11; "It is nothing" (saith Asa) "with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power." Why, Lord, though we have no power, yet thou canst help us. Why did Asa speak thus? Had he no power? You shall find in the chapter a little before, that Asa had five hundred and fourscore thousand valiant fighting men, almost six hundred thousand, at the very time when he is pleading with God, "Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power." We account it a great army if we have twenty, or thirty, or forty thousand men; he has almost six hundred thousand men, and yet goes to God and prays, Lord, thou canst help where there is no power.

But yet further, from the connexion of these two, their trust in their way, and in the multitude of their mighty men: from thence,

Obs. 5. Those who trust to any way of their own, had need of creature strengths to uphold them. They had indeed need of bladders under their arm-holes, if they trust in a way of their own. But now, if the way in which a man confides be the way of God, why then, though all outward helps and all worldly encouragements should fail him, though we should see the creatures at never so great a distance, yet the heart that puts its trust in God has enough to uphold it; here is the difference between men trusting in their own way, and in God's. Indeed when men trust in their own way, so long as the sun shines upon their path, and they have external helps, they can go on confidently; but let outward helps fail, and their hearts sink within them.

But now, when the heart is upright with God, and trusts in the word and promises, then it is able to say with Habakkuk, chap. iii. 17, "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls; yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." Whatsoever becomes of armies, and of the policy of men, of friends, and all outward things, yet I will bless myself in the Lord, and bless the time that ever I knew God and his ways; my heart yet is confident it is the way of God, and upon this his way I can venture my state, my liberty, my life, yea, and my soul; let all things seem to be under a cloud, and never so dismal, yet my heart is steady, and is fixed in this way of God into which the Lord God graciously has drawn my heart.

Oh, this is an excellent thing. Examine your hearts in this respect, whether, when at any time you have seen things go very cross, your hearts have not shaken.

I remember an observation which some make about John the Baptist. After he was cast into prison, he sends two of his disciples to know whether Christ were the Messias, or no: they think that though before he was cast into prison he did know that he was so; "Behold the Lamb of God!" but when once he came to sufferings, there was some shaking of his spirit. So it is oftentimes with men, when things do somewhat shine upon them, and they have some outward encouragements, they go on, and are persuaded that their way is right; but when things fall cross, and the hearts of men are opposed, and they are like to meet with more evils than ever they made account of, then they begin to call things into question, and ask, Is this the right way? Oh! it is a sign that there was much failing in thy heart at first, when in the time of outward afflictions thou comest to call in question whether it be the way of God or not.

Ver. 14. Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people, and all thy fortresses shall be spoiled, as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle: the mother was dashed in pieces upon her children.

As if the prophet should say, You have the militia on your side, and you think you shall be able to drive on your design, as having all the strength with you: but what if there should be seditious tumults within you? what though the power of the enemy without come not upon you, cannot God work your ruin in a way that you think not of? Oh how suddenly may God suffer the discontentments of people to break forth into rage and fury, so that intestine tumults shall arise, and bring all into the most miserable confusion!

Obs. 1. Tumults are a token of the great wrath of God on a city or country. "Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people;" a threatening of God's severe wrath against these people, who were so confident in their way. A man may avoid external dangers to his body, but a distemper within may be his death. Fearful miseries come upon cities and countries when tumults arise: these two things have been their main cause:

1. Great oppressions.

2. Engaging numerous parties in matters controversial.

These conjoined are very dangerous, for men will carry on what they have begun, if once they be engaged in it. To engage a rude multitude in a business, especially if it be controversial, is a very dangerous thing; for we know not what they may do to pursue and follow their engagements. When the multitude is in a rage, they are like a tiled house on fire, which you cannot approach when once the flames have reached the tiles, as they fly so about your face: so in tumults, there is no coming near to talk to them, to convince them, but they are ready to fly presently upon you. And none are so cruel as the vilest of people when they are got together in a head: men of no blood care not what blood they shed. "A poor man that oppresseth the poor is like a sweeping rain which leaveth no food," Prov. xxviii. 3. Oppressions are great, the evil of tyranny is very great; but the evil of tumults is still greater. We see it many times in men of mean rank, sometimes in those committees which some of you complain of. Now men could bear oppression a great deal more easily from those who are much above them, but the oppression of our equals, or of abjects, is intolerable; if they come to get power any way, they are likely to be more oppressive than others. We have cause to bless God for delivering of us from tumults in this respect.

I might show you most dreadful examples of tumults in history. Josephus speaks of many, for when God was at last about to destroy the Jews by the Romans, their utter ruin was prepared by tumults and seditions among themselves. In his second Book of the Jewish Wars, chap. 11, he speaks of one Eleazar and Alexander that raised a tumult, and murdered as they went men, women, and children, and so made havoc of the country, that the nobles of Jerusalem were fain to come out clothed with sackcloth and ashes upon their heads, to beseech them that they would have pity upon their country, and upon their wives and children, and upon the temple; the nobles, with sackcloth and ashes upon their heads, came to assuage the rage of this tumult, so grievous was it. And in his sixth Book, chap. 11, he saith, that being in some straits for food, if any places in the city had their doors shut up, they suspected that there was meat in them, and would presently break in, and seize whosoever they found by the throat, so as to force the meat half chewed out of their very mouths; and if any of them should let it go down before they could lay hold on their throats, they would use them most cruelly for doing so. And in another place he saith, that the citizens suffered so much by them, that when the enemies took the city they thought it rather a relief than an increase to their misery. My brethren, we should rather bear much than foment tumults; take heed of that, you know not what the end of such things will be. In Amos ii. 2, it is said, "Moab shall die with tumult;" and here, "A tumult shall arise among thy people."

"Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people." When God intends utterly to destroy a people, he suffers tumults to arise among them, as one of his sorest scourges. I find some take the word "tumult" to refer primarily, if not altogether, to the confusion of the hearts of people, when the enemies should come upon them, that they should be all in a confusion, not knowing what to do through fear and terror. As suppose on a sudden an army should come against a city, people would be wringing their hands, and running up and down from place to place, pale and terror-stricken, and confounded in their minds. Thus God threatens it should be with them. As if he should say, You are jolly and brave now, but when the Assyrians come upon you, then shall your hearts fail, and terror and perplexity shall possess you, your women and your children shall cry out for fear, and you shall be unable to aid them. This is the sense which some give it, but the former is not to be rejected.

It is a mercy that God has not tried us thus: we live in our houses, and follow our tradings, and lie down and sleep in quietness, and rise again; but we cannot imagine what woeful distractions there would be in the spirits of people in the city, if there were a considerable army encamped round about it. Perhaps some of you here have been in places where the enemies have come suddenly, so that you know what this tumult in the spirits of men and women means. Bless God (I say) that the Lord has delivered us from such tumults as these. The power and providence of God in the government of the world by a few, so keeping the people from tumults, and from bringing all to confusion, are to be acknowledged, and his name to be sanctified.

The word תַּחֲלוּל translated "tumult," seems indeed to import this, signifying, the crying of fearful creatures, of those that are terrified and seared. Oh! it is a great mercy for men to be so established that, in the apprehension of dangers, they can find their hearts unperplexed, being stayed upon God. Of a righteous man it is said in Psal. cxii. 7, "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord;" but it is a still greater blessing, when we see the armies before us, and hear the neighings of horses and clattering of the spears, then to be fixed. Oh! we should labour in the time of peace to make our calling and election sure. In Psal. lvii. 7—9, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise. Awake up, my glory; awake, psaltery and harp: I myself will awake early. I will praise thee, O Lord," &c. When does David thus cry to awake, and to give glory to God, and sing praise, and declare that his heart was fixed? When Saul persecuted him, and he was in danger of his life: Saul pursued him to take away his life, yet, even then, saith David, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise." So in Psal. xvi. 2, 3, "We will not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah." This Psalm was wont to be called Luther's Psalm, for in times of trouble he would say, Come and let us sing the 46th Psalm. Many scriptures we might cite to this purpose. Of Archimedes the mathematician it is recorded, that when the city of Syracuse was taken, he continued, in the midst of the sack and carnage, intent upon the drawing of his lines, so that when the soldiers burst in on him with their naked swords he was drawing his mathematical figures. Which of you, if at prayer, or any serious duty, you should hear of the breaking in of adversaries, could have your hearts at such a time fixed in a settled, constant way upon God.

As outward tumults in cities and countries are very great evils, so are likewise spiritual tumults in the heart, when God seems to come against the soul as an enemy, or the apprehension of his absence causes trouble and distraction of the heart. Thus in Psal. xl. 2, "He brought me up also" (saith the psalmist) "out of an horrible pit." Now the word is in the original the very same that we have פִּיט חַיִּים here, from the pit of tumultuousness. It is as if he should say, My heart was sometimes fixed indeed, but at other times it was in a tumultuous condition, when I apprehended God not coming in according as I expected; yea, but the Lord did bring me up out of the pit of tumultuousness. Oh! has not this been the condition of some of you in time of trouble of your spirit, when you have apprehended the absence of God from you? Your hearts have been all in a tumult; has the Lord delivered you? Remember the Psalm, "The Lord has brought me up also out of the pit of tumultuousness;" I was in a tumultuous condition, my heart was even overwhelmed, but the Lord has delivered me out of the pit of tumultuousness. And then in Psal. lxi. 2, "From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the rock that is higher than I." Remember that scripture likewise.

"And all thy fortresses shall be spoiled." What are strong holds for the safeguard of a people, when the strong God is against them? You have made lines and fortifications, yea, but the strong God is against you. "All thy strong holds shall be like fig trees with the first-ripe figs: if they be shaken, they shall even fall into the mouth of the eater," Nah. iii. 12.

And now, my brethren, blessed be God we know this scripture to be true in a way of mercy, God has made our enemies so to us; and not in a way of judgment: God might have made our strong holds so to them, this scripture might have been fulfilled thus, "All thy fortresses shall be spoiled," that is, though we have made fortresses, we might have heard, first of this and then of the other strong hold in such a place having been spoiled, this castle and the other castle taken, and we might have even been amazed with the news, and have said, How does God fight against us, that though we had such strong holds, and men enough to man them, yet for all that they have been but as "the first-ripe figs," which, "if they be shaken, even fall into the mouth of the eater!" How were our hearts dejected when we heard but of one strong hold (Bristol) being taken from us. But I say, through God's mercy, this summer the Lord has made this text good unto us; all thy strong holds, not all ours, but all the enemies', how have they been spoiled generally! Oh! the Lord has appeared glorious this way, and has made this last summer to be a continual miracle of mercy to us in this very respect. "All thy fortresses shall be spoiled."

Jerome reads it, As Salmanna was destroyed by the house of him that vindicated Baal in the day of battle. And so all that follow the Vulgate refer this to the story that we have in Judg. viii., where Gideon slew Zalmunna the prince of Midian; and so they take Arbel as an abbreviation for Jerubbaal. The Holy Ghost seems to make that great judgment of God upon Zalmunna to be exemplary, as in Psal. lxxxiii. 11, "Make all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna;" but ארבל ירבעל the letters in the Hebrew here are different, and we do not read of Gideon, though he did use very much severity upon Zebah and Zalmunna, that he dashed the mother upon the children.

Luther thinks it is meant of some notable act of cruelty upon some place very near to them, the particulars whereof we have not recorded in Scripture. Indeed the name Beth-arbel we find not in the canonical Scripture; but in 1 Macc. ix. 2, such a place is mentioned, which afterwards became very famous for the great overthrow which Alexander the Great gave to Darius: so that it is as if the Holy Ghost should say, Did you not hear of that horrid, savage slaughter, which Shalman caused in Beth-arbel, when the mother was dashed in pieces upon her children? they regarded not sex nor condition, the tender-hearted mother, embracing her children, was dashed in pieces upon them: such dreadful wrath of God your Beth-el may expect.

Beth-arbel signifies the house of the <sup>דומים</sup> insnaring god, the god of policy and subtlety. It seems the people that called this city by this name, had a god which they honoured as the god of subtlety; and they trusted in it, expecting that thereby all their enemies would be insnared. Therefore called they their city Beth-arbel, the house of the insnaring god. But now this would not do, the more they sought by subtlety to undermine their enemies, the more were their enemies enraged; and therefore when they came upon them they spoiled them, and dashed the mother upon her own children. We might from this very word, Obs. 2. We should not think by our plots and policies to prevail, if God be against us. Do not think to put off God by plots and policies, and to avoid dangers that way; this people did so, because they had a Beth-arbel, a god of policy, they thought to prevail, but their misery was so much the greater. Mothers and children were dashed in pieces one against another. If you make Arbel, policy, to be your god, you may expect so much the more the rage of God, and of the instruments of his wrath against you.

And let men take heed how they seek to deceive and cozen other men, for there is no such way to encourage one man against another, as to attempt to undermine him by policy: deal not so with your friends, acquaintance, and neighbours, you will encourage them so much the more.

Obs. 3. When God lets out the fury and rage of war, the cruelty is great. "The mother was dashed in pieces upon her children." We read in Psal. cxxxvii., concerning idolaters, that when the Lord lets out his wrath upon the parents, he will let it out upon the children too; "Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." It is a very strange phrase. And in Isa. xlii. 16, "Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes." I remember, Ursine, in his comment on that place of Isaiah, quotes this 137th Psalm; and he has first this note, That though God does thus execute his wrath, yet usually, because it is so dreadful, and there is so much savageness in the thing in man's eye, therefore God is wont to do it by wicked men, and we never read that he made use of his own saints to execute that wrath. And then to that doubt, Is it not said in the Psalm, "Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones?" which words seem to approve of the deed; he, and Calvin, and others, answer thus, That it means not that they are blessed in their persons, or heirs of eternal blessings of mercy; but it is a prophetic wish that they might have the blessing of success in the work, as an execution of God's wrath and God's justice: though the instruments did it to execute their savage cruelty, and so sinned in it; yet the prophet looks upon the justice of God in it, and, speaking in the spirit of prophecy, wishes success to them in such a work, that the justice of God may go on and have its course.

Obs. 4. The sins of parents oftentimes come upon their children. What has the poor infant done? Oh! you tender-hearted mothers, consider of this, how far your sin may reflect upon your children. If ever you should see bloody soldiers to come in in a terrible way, (as sometimes you have apprehended,) and they should dash you upon your children, consider it is your sin that has done it.

But you will say, Shall the children suffer for the fathers' sin?

Do not we read that God will visit the sins of idolaters unto the third and fourth generation? Indeed were your children innocent, had they no original sin, then it were another matter; but now, considering they have enough in them to make them subjects of God's wrath, God may take advantage the rather because of thy sin; and therefore take heed, and especially take heed to God's worship, for we do not find in Scripture where any children are so threatened as the children of idolaters are.

Obs. 5. The judgments of God near to us should awaken us; we should think, Why may it not be upon ourselves? This was a heavy judgment of God upon some city near, and God would awaken them. Oh, what we have heard has been upon our brethren in other parts, and we have been sottish, and not sensible of it, because it has not just come upon our gates: the Lord expects when we hear of any dreadful evil upon others, that we should tremble and fear before him. And then one thing further note from hence:

"Shalman was dashed in pieces upon her children." שאלמן שלחן signifies, one that is peaceable; one that is peaceable, and yet he shall exercise his cruelty so as to dash the mother upon her children: this is not one that bears cruelty in his name, not a tiger, but a Shalman, a peaceable man, as his name signifies, and yet thus cruel when he comes to have power!

Obs. 6. Men who have peace in their names, and peace in their mouths, and peace in show, yet when they come to have power oftentimes are very cruel. We were like to have found it so; if our adversaries had prevailed, this city especially might have been made a

Beth-arbel, and mothers dashed upon their children. It is true, when the adversaries did prevail in any place they did not do so, but it was not through any pity, but out of fear; but had they gotten the day, then we might have expected even dashing of the mother against the children.

Ver. 15. So shall Beth-el do unto you because of your great wickedness: in a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off.

“So shall Beth-el do unto you.” What! shall Beth-el rise up against the rest of the ten tribes, and come and destroy mother and children together? That is not the meaning.

But Beth-el shall do it; that is, Beth-el is the cause of this, that dreadful slaughter that is like to be among you, it shall come from Beth-el. Who would ever have thought that?

Obs. 1. Miserable judgments oftentimes arise from causes we little think of. From Beth-el should come this slaughter and dreadful bloodshed. And as that more generally, so more particularly this:

Obs. 2. From places of idolatry come the greatest evils to kingdoms. As it is very observable, on the contrary, from the places of God’s worship come the greatest good. So Psal. lxxvi. 2, 3, “In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion. There brake he the arrows of the bow, the shield, and the sword, and the battle.” Did God break them there? Was there a fight in Zion, and in Salem? No, that is not the meaning, but in Zion and Salem, where God’s tabernacle was, those servants of God who were there worshipping and praying to God, got the victory. So we may say, that in such a place, that was fasting and praying in the time of our battles, there God brake the arrow and the bow. Where the true worship of God is, from thence comes the good of a kingdom. And so in Isa. xxxi. 9, “Whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.” The Lord is there threatening the enemies of his people, and he saith, that “his fire is in Zion, and his furnace is in Jerusalem;” there God has his furnace, and from thence it shall go to destroy the adversaries. And so, on the contrary, where idolatry is set up, and false worship maintained, from thence come evils and miseries upon us.

The words are, בפני רעת רעתכם, because of the wickedness of your wickedness; so the Hebrews express the superlative degree, by a genitive case, the evil of the evil, the wickedness of the wickedness.

Obs. 3. False worship is the great sin by which especially God is provoked against a people. Whence, let us not make light account of the worship of God, for how little soever God’s worship is in our eyes, yet in his sight it is a great matter; and though you think that the sins against God in the matter of his worship be but small, yet God saith, it is the “great wickedness,” it is the wickedness of wickedness. And great wickedness it may be called, not only in respect of its nature, but from its many attendant aggravations.

Obs. 4. God takes notice not only of men’s sins, but of the aggravation of their sins. Oh! let us do thus; not only look upon your sins and acknowledge yourselves to be sinners, but look upon the aggravations of your sins; This sin committed against so many mercies, so many prayers, and resolutions, and vows, and covenants, and so many deliverances that I have had: labour to lay the aggravations of your sins upon your hearts; this is the way to humble them before the Lord. Indeed the saints of God need not seek to excuse their sins, they need not be afraid to lay them in all their aggravations on their hearts, in all their aggravations. Greaten your wickedness before the Lord; do not, as ordinarily people do, extenuate your sins, for if there be any possible extenuation, Jesus Christ will find out that in his pleading. Christ is your advocate who sits at the right hand of the Father, and it is his work to plead your cause, and therefore if there can be any thing to extenuate a sin he will do it. You know that, in his sojourn in this world, when his disciples did offend very much in that sleepiness of theirs, so that when their Master was to suffer they could not watch with him one hour, that sin might have been aggravated with abundance of circumstances, but saith Christ, “The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak,” Matt. xxvi. 41; he extenuates and excuses. Now that which Christ did there, he will be ready to do in heaven, for thou that art a saint.

Obs. 5. Wrath is proportioned to the greatness of the sin. Great wickedness and great wrath go together, and therefore according to the greatness of our sins should be the greatness of our humiliation. For so it is said of Manasses, that he humbled himself “greatly:” and in Lam. i. 20, where the church is humbling itself before God for the great wickedness and the great wrath that was upon them; “Behold, O Lord; for I am in distress: my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me; for I have grievously rebelled.” Mark, here you have these two points together; the church aggravates her sin, “I have grievously rebelled;” and what then? “O Lord; I am in distress: my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me.” Oh! remember this text, you whose consciences tell you of grievous rebellions.

Now, to understand this, we must consider to what it refers, what king of Israel this was, and when this was fulfilled. It refers to the account in 2 Kings xvii., and the king of Israel here spoken of is Hoshea, Israel’s last king, therefore it is said that he shall “utterly be cut off;” for he and all his family were utterly cut off, there was an end of the kingdom of Israel, that had continued so long provoking God. I have forborne, saith God, the kings of Israel a long time, but now they shall “utterly be cut off” in Hoshea.

This king of Israel’s spirit was stont enough against God and his prophets. My brethren, it is not the stoutness of the greatest men upon earth to say, they will, and they will; yea, they will venture their lives and kingdoms. Why, if they will, God will too, he has a will as well as they; at length God’s will grows as strong as theirs, and proceeds against them, and against their very families: “the king of Israel shall be utterly cut off.”

Kings of the earth suffer little from men. What a brave thing is it for a man to be able to go up and down in countries, and rend, and tear, and oppress, and bring thousands into woeful miseries and extremities, and yet be afraid to suffer nothing at all himself! Therefore it is fit for God to take in hand those men that are above the power of their fellow men; when men cannot deal with them, the Lord himself takes them in hand, and they are so much the more under the immediate justice of the infinite God.

“Shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off.”

But when shall this be? “In a morning.” There is a sad morning coming.

Cyril interprets it thus: God in his patience is compared to a man asleep, and in the execution of judgment he is said to awake; God brings his righteous judgments to light every morning. But that is a little too forced.

Secondly, “In a morning;” that is, early, betimes. So in Jer. xii. 12, “O house of David, thus saith the Lord; Execute judgment in the morning.” So the king of Israel shall be early cut off; and indeed this king of Israel was early cut off, he did not reign above eight or nine years at most. God takes some in the morning of their time, in their youth, when their day is but as it were dawning; some sinners he apprehends sooner than others. "In a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off."

Thirdly, "In a morning;" that is, even when the light comes, when they have hopes of further good, then he shall "utterly be cut off;" which comes yet nearer and more full to the sense and scope of the Spirit of God here. And so if you read the story in the book of Kings, you find, when Hoshea was about to be cut off, he had entered into a league with the king of Egypt, and thought that now "a morning" would arise, and he should have a brave day, and live many merry days now; and when he thought the light of this morning was beginning to dawn, God came to cut him off.

Obs. 6. When people think that now light is breaking out, after a long night of darkness, then God's displeasure breaks forth upon them. We cannot but acknowledge that the Lord has granted us a morning light, but let us fear and tremble, for the time of God's displeasure is sometimes in the morning. When we think we have light breaking forth, God may have other ways to bring darkness upon us than we are aware of; we know how dreadful a day it was with Sodom after a sunshine morning. It is very observable, the difference of God's dealing with his own people, and with those that are carnal and of the world. Compare this scripture with Zech. xiv. 7. Here, "In a morning shall he be utterly cut off." But in Zech. xiv. 7, where God is speaking of mercy to his people, he speaks of a day that should be known to God, and saith, "At evening time it shall be light:" he comforts his people thus; but when he threatens the wicked he saith, When the morning comes it shall be darkness. The Lord is wont to turn the darkness of the saints into light, and to turn the light of the wicked and ungodly into darkness. Oh, let us learn to fear that God then who is able to turn light into darkness, and darkness into light. "Seek him," saith Amos v. 8, "that turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night." He can "turn the shadow of death into morning." Suppose there be the greatest darkness upon you, God can make that a morning of light; and suppose there be a morning of light, God can turn that into darkness. Many, because they have a morning, bless themselves, and think all must needs go on according to their desires; it is very customary for men, especially when compassing some notable design of their own, if it prosper in the beginning, they think all will go on. Oh, thou mayst be utterly deceived; thy designs may have a morning, and then God may cut off thee and thy designs, and all thy thoughts may even then perish. We read that Saul had many victories after that God had pronounced that he should be rejected. And therefore we had need fear that God, who can turn the morning into darkness, and darkness into light.

Obs. 7. God loves to draw forth great sinners to the light; not to come upon them in the dark, but to bring forth his judgments in the morning, openly and clearly. God discomfited the host of Egypt "when the morning appeared," Exod. xiv. 27.

Obs. 8. God will be quick in his work. "In a morning he shall be cut off;" that is, suddenly. They thought by their power to hold it out; No, saith God, I will not make a day's work of it, it shall be in the morning; so the Vulgate turns it, It shall pass as the morning, as the light of the morning quickly passes over. As the king of Israel is compared to the "foam," so he is here compared to the "morning." Now, my brethren, to close this chapter, Oh what alteration of things God is able to make in a morning! They (it may be) the day before, and over-night, were jolly and merry, and blessed themselves in their way; they had confidence in their "way, and in the multitude of their mighty men;" but "in a morning" all is spoiled. God can "in a morning" make mighty alterations in a kingdom, and in cities, and families, and individuals. My brethren, who knows what a day may bring forth? who knows what a morning may bring forth? "Thus saith the Lord God, n evil, Aan only evil, behold, is come. An end is come, the end is come: it watcheth for thee; behold, it is come. The morning is come unto thee, O thou that dwellest in the land: the time is come, the day of trouble is near," Ezek. vii. 5—7. As if God should say, All this while that thou hast been in the act of the pride of thy heart and vanity of thy spirit, I did determine, that such a morning such an evil should come; and it is come, it is come, saith God; the morning is come. O think, when you lie down at night, what thou hast done this day; do not dare to lie down, but first make thy peace with God; thou knowest not what may be in the morning: and when thou risest up in the morning, look up to God, and seek blessing and mercy from the Lord, for though thine eyes be opened, and thou come to see the morning light, yet, before it be quite gone, thou knowest not what may befall thee. Seek, therefore, to make thy peace with God, both in the night and in the morning, for great changes may come to thee both in the night and in the morning, that thou never thoughtest of in all thy life.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1. When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt.

THIS chapter is made by some the sixth sermon of Hosea's prophecy. The scope of it is this: To clear God from severity, and to upbraid Israel for ungrateful and stubborn carriage, against mercies and means; and yet to promise mercy to the remnant, to his elect ones. This extends to the end of the 11th verse. As for the 12th verse, though made a part of this chapter, yet it were more aptly a great deal joined to chap. xii.; and so it is by some.

At the close of the preceding chapter there were dreadful threatenings against Israel, that the mothers should be dashed in pieces upon their children, and the king utterly cut off. But now, does not this argue God to be a God of rigid severity? Where is the mercy, goodness, and clemency of God towards his people? What! to have the mother dashed in pieces against her children; to cut off the king of Israel utterly? Yes, saith God, for all this I am a God of mercy and goodness, for I have manifested abundance of mercy already, and am ready still to manifest more; but you have been a stubborn and a stout-hearted people against me. And from this general scope,

Obs. 1. God stands much upon the clearing of himself to be a God of love and mercy. Whatsoever becomes of the wicked, yet God will make it clear before all the world, that he is a God of much mercy. God takes it very ill that we should have any hard thoughts of him; let us not be ready to entertain such thoughts of God, as if he were a hard master. I remember Luther saith, That the general scope of the Scripture is, to declare the Lord to be a God of mercy and goodness; the whole Scriptures, saith he, aim especially at this, that we should believe and be confident that God is a gracious and merciful God. And this is the scope of this chapter. Let us rather charge ourselves of wickedness, and ungrateful dealings with God, and let us for ever justify God, and acknowledge him to be not only a righteous, but a gracious God: though thou and thousands such as thou art shall perish to all eternity, yet the Lord shall be acknowledged a God of mercy before his angels and saints for evermore. But thus much for the scope.

“When Israel was a child.”

That is, at his first beginning to be a people, in his young time my heart was towards him. Indeed, the heart of God was to Israel, that is, Jacob, the father of the tribes, before he was born, before he had “done any good or evil,” Rom. ix. 11, 12. But here it is spoken not of the father, but of the tribes.

“When Israel was a child.” That is,

I. When he knew little of me.

II. When he could do little for me.

III. When there was much vanity and folly in him, as there are generally in children.

IV. When he was helpless and succourless, and knew not how to provide for himself.

But further, Ternovius, a learned commentator on this prophecy, thinks that כִּנְיָ here translated “a child,” intimates the stubbornness of Israel against God, one that has often shaken off the yoke of parents, or of a master; and so יָעַר here translated “when,” sometimes signifies although; Although Israel was a child, a froward and perverse child, that shook off the yoke, yet then I loved him. And what a child Israel was when God loved him, you may find in Ezek. xvi. 4, 5, “And as for thy nativity, in the day thou wast born thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all. None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the lothing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born.” Then in the 6th verse, “And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live.” Again and again is the command of mercy given. And then in the 8th verse, “Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I swore unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine.”

Well, but wherein did God manifest that he did love Israel when he was a child?

Mark that 8th verse, “Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I swore unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine.”

The love of God to Israel is expressed in these three particulars.

First, God “entered into a covenant” with him. Oh, it is a great mercy of God, and a fruit of great love, that such an infinite God would be pleased to make a covenant with his people, to bring them into covenant relation with him: all mankind was in covenant with God at first, but falling from that first covenant, God took into covenant with himself only a peculiar people, and made this distinguishing grace a fruit of his great love.

Secondly, “Thou becamest mine;” that is, I had separated thee for myself, and took thee for a peculiar one to me, and intended special mercy and goodness to thee; “thou becamest mine,” so as that I should have a special propriety in thee, and thou shouldst have a Thirdly, I confirmed all this by an oath, “I swore unto thee.” Was not here love, for God to covenant, to take in to such propriety, and to swear that we should be his? Thus “when Israel was a child, then I loved him.”

Now the observations are these:

Obs. 2. It is the privilege of the church and of the saints, to be beloved of God. God loves his people, this is their privilege, he loves them with a special love. In Jer. xii. 7, they are called, the “dearly beloved of my” (God’s) “soul;” see how God loves his people. God delights in his saints, and there is nothing in the world that should sanctify a gracious heart more than this, that God loves him; and as God’s love is extraordinary to them, more than to other people, so their love again should be reflected upon God in a more than ordinary way. Nothing can be a recompence to love, but love: that is certain, love is never satisfied but with love; and therefore, seeing God professes love to his people, he expects love from them; therefore he will not be satisfied with any duties you perform, unless they flow from love. Love must have love; and know, that you cannot prize God’s love more than God prizes yours; there is nothing in heaven and earth that God prizes more than the love of his saints, and therefore, if ever God’s love, or God’s prizing of your love, may gain love, O you saints, love the Lord.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation to sin, to sin against love. For to that end God here shows that he loved them, that he might aggravate their sin so much the more, and clear himself. Often in the days of your humiliation, and at other times, you regard your sin as aggravated, as it is against knowledge, and does a great deal of hurt, and brings you under dreadful threatenings, provoking the wrath of an infinite God against you; these are things calculated to humble your hearts for sin; but this still more, that your sin is against love, that though God has shown much love to you, yet you sin against a loving and a gracious God. God begins with this aggravation, it being his scope here to clear himself, and to convict his people of ungratefulness: “When Israel was a child, then I loved him.” Sins against love are great sins indeed.

Obs. 4. It is very useful to call to mind God’s old love. “When Israel was a child, then I loved him.” His love to us when we were children; yea, his love to our forefathers. For a nation, too, to consider the ancient love of God to it at its first beginning, is of very great use; nay, brethren, it would be of very great use to us to consider God’s ancient love to England. And I will give you one remarkable proof of it, that it was the first nation which ever God set his heart upon to bring into the fold of the gospel, the first nation in the world that by public authority submitted to the gospel; and certainly God remembers that love of England. So we find it recorded. True, indeed, we cannot give Scripture proof for this, because it was since the time of any Scripture; but so far as we may credit early records, we find it, of all nations upon the face of the earth, the first that received the gospel with the countenance of public authority. And this is not a little matter; certainly the Lord remembers “the kindness of our” “youth,” and the old love of England, its “first love,” in receiving the gospel. Indeed God caused the gospel to be preached to other places before it was to England; but no place by the countenance of public authority received it so soon as England did, and therefore, in that respect, England may be said to have been the very first-fruits of the gospel. Oh, it is good for us to consider of that, and many good uses we may make of God’s ancient love: when we see any further expressions of it, the thoughts of his former love may encourage us to believe that surely God intends its continuance.

And then for ourselves individually, it is very good for us to look back to his ancient love. Some of you (I suppose) in this place may say, that God loved you when you were children: When I was a child, I had such and such expressions of God's love toward me; it was love that I was born of Christian parents, and educated in Christian doctrine, that I was delivered from such and such dangers, yea, (it may be.) God began to reveal himself to me betimes. And if you would call to mind all the loving passages of God's providence since you were children, you might have matter of meditation sufficient. Many of you complain that you cannot find matter for meditation: I will give you a rule to help you in meditation at any time, it is this: when you cannot meditate of other things, but you are presently bewildered and know not whither to go, then turn yourselves to this; to think of all the gracious passages of God's providence towards you ever since you were children; and this theme the weakest may be able to pursue with profit.

Obs. 5. All God's old mercies remain engagements to duty, and aggravations to sin. "When Israel was a child, then I loved him." It is spoken of to aggravate their sin, and further to engage them to duty. Remember that the love and mercies of God to you when you were children, are engagements to duty when you are old, and aggravations of your sin: sins against old mercies are the greatest sins. Oh that you should sin against that love of God to you when you were children! God began with you then, and has continued his love and mercy to you ever since; oh then make this an aggravation of your sin in the day of your humiliation, charge it upon your own souls, These and these sins have I committed; though God loved me, though his mercy and goodness were toward me when I was a child, and have followed me ever since, yet I have walked unworthy of all that love and mercy. Know, that though you may forget the old love of God, yet the Lord remembers it; he remembers his old mercies, and he remembers your old sins.

Obs. 6. Let not our hearts sink in despairing thoughts, though we see that we are able to do but little for God, and though we are unworthy of his love. Though there be much vanity and folly in our hearts and in our lives, yea, though there has been much stubbornness, yet still let not our hearts sink in despairing thoughts. "When Israel was a child, then I loved him." They could do little for me, and they knew little of me, and they were vain, and foolish, and stubborn, and yet "I loved them." Certainly, the dealings of God toward Israel are as a type of his dealings toward his saints, as the afflictions of Israel are typical with respect to the church: and as we gather an argument for patience in afflictions, when we read how God dealt with the people of Israel in the wilderness; so also should our faith be strengthened by the long-suffering and tender mercy shown them: though they were unworthy, and poor, and weak, yet God loved them. Therefore you, poor people, that find yourselves weak in understanding, alas! you know little, and can remember little, of that which is good, and you can do little for God; Yea, I find (perhaps saith one) much frowardness and stubbornness in my heart against God; but do you bewail it? if so, let not your hearts be discouraged, do not think that these are things that will hinder the love of God; God's heart may be towards you notwithstanding all this; God's love does not find, but makes the object lovely; therefore God can love though thou knowest little, and canst do but little.

But you will say, He can love, but will he love? If I did but know that, my heart would find peace.

To that I answer,

First. When you hear that God loved Israel when he was such a child that "none eye pitied him," this is enough to help you against any concluding thoughts against God's love, for God loved his people Israel when they were as unworthy as you are.

Secondly, The readiest way for you to know with certainty whether God will love you or not, is, 1. To raise up your faith, if you are able, upon such grounds as this, The consideration of his love to his people when they were unworthy.

2. In quietness and meekness of spirit to lay thyself before the Lord as an object of his pity. Thou dost not think thyself worthy to be an object of love, yet lay thy heart before God as an object of pity, and then resolve to wait till the time of love shall come, till God shall make known that his heart is toward thee for good. It is not the way for thee to be toward and vexing, because of thy unworthiness, meanness, poverty, and baseness, and so to determine that on account of these he will not love thee; no, I say, the way for thee to have the sense of God's love, is this, when thou seest there is no worthiness in thee why he should love thee, yet to remember that there is enough in thee to make thyself an object of his pity.

Obs. 7. God's love begins betimes to his people, let not his people's love be deferred too long. God is beforehand with you in love, and whenever we begin to love him it is upon this ground, "because he first loved us." You who are young, love God betimes, for if you be such as ever shall be saved, God did not only love you when a child, but he loved you before you were born, before the foundations of the world were laid. Oh! it is a pity that the first springing of your love should not be bestowed upon God. Certainly old love is the best love; as old love in God is sweet, so old love in the saints: it is a sweet thing to think that God loved me from a child; but then, if I can say this too, I loved God from a child, this will make it sweeter: put but these two together, and what is wanting to the comfort of one's life? God loves that love which is from a child; "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth," Jer. ii. 2: God loves the love of young ones, the love of children. How sweet will old age be to thee if thou canst say, Lord, through thy mercy I have loved thee from a child, and that is an evidence that thou didst love me when I was a child! How many are there now old, whom God loved when they were young, that would give ten thousand worlds, if they had them, that they had known and loved God sooner than they did! I say, those whose eyes God enlightens, and hearts God converts to himself, would give ten thousand thousand worlds that they could but say this, Oh that I had but loved God from a child! You who are children and young ones, do you begin betimes to love God, that, if you live to be old, you may say, that God loved you from a child. It was an excellent speech of Austin, when it pleased God to work upon his heart, Lord, I loved thee too late. Nimis sero te amavi. Aug. And so it will be with any that begin to love God, they will say that they loved God too late; this tardy affection will be the great burden to their souls.

"And called my son out of Egypt."

"And called;" that is, by Moses and Aaron, I sent them to call them out of Egypt and to bring them from thence. This seems to refer to Exod. iv. 22, where the Lord directs Moses to go to Pharaoh, and to speak on this wise, "Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my first-born." So in Jer. xxxi. 9, "I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born."

"My son;" the Seventy render it in the plural, τὰ τέκνα αὐτοῦ, his sons; but in the original it is לבי my son; thus, although the Holy Ghost speaks of all the people in general, yet he puts them in the singular number, and in their very community calls them the son of God.

Obs. 8. The church is related to God as a son to the father, yea, the very first-born. What God speaks of the people of Israel is especially intended towards his saints, which are the true Israel of God; they have the privilege to be sons unto God, to be children. "Seemeth it to you," saith David, "a light thing to be a king's son-in-law?" What then do you think it is to be son to the King of heaven and earth, and heir of heaven and earth? "Is Ephraim my dear son?" Jer. xxxi. 20. This is the privilege therefore of the saints, that God deals with them as sons; "I will spare them," saith the Lord in the prophet Malachi, chap. iii. 17, "as a man spareth his own son that serveth him." And the special privilege that they have from this is, that they are not under the law as slaves, in reference to God; those that are in the state of slavery are under this law, Do, or die; if thou dost offend but in the least thou shalt perish for ever, the curse of the law is upon thee. But the sons of God are brought into another condition, not to be under that law; they indeed, if they do offend, may be corrected and chastised, Psal. lxxxix. 30—32; but they are never under the law of the sentence of eternal death for their offences. There is a great deal of difference between the administration of God towards slaves, and towards sons: this is the great privilege of sonship, that thou art not under the law, but art brought under another law, even the law of Jesus Christ; that though thy sin indeed, of its own nature, if God should deal with thee in justice, would be enough to put thee under an eternal curse, yet being a son, God puts thee under another law, and deals not with thee by that which pronounces a curse against every sin.

Obs. 9. Let wicked men take heed how they use the saints, for they are God's sons; they are not slaves, they are the sons of the eternal God. "Is Israel a servant? is he a home-born slave? why is he spoiled?" Jer. ii. 14. How comes it to pass that Israel is so dealt with? What! is not Israel a son, and "Ephraim my dear son?" Jer. xxxi. 20.

When any of the people of God are under the power of any men, God looks upon them as sons; and if they deal hardly with them, God will inquire and say thus, Is such a one a slave? had he been a slave I would not so much have cared for your dealing thus with him, but he is a son. You find in the Acts that they were afraid when they heard that Paul was a Roman. When thou knowest thou hast to deal with a son of God, know that though thou hast not liberty to misuse any, yet when thou misuseth him, thou dost it at thy special peril.

Obs. 10. The saints are not only sons in their particular relation, but in their community. The whole community of the church, as members, are but as one son: "I called my son out of Egypt;" he speaks of the whole body of Israel. Now the Lord looks upon the community of his church as one son, in the singular number; one, not in outward incorporation and visible government, but in spiritual union and communion with their common Head. Many privileges belong to the church of God in their community, as well as in their particular relation. And they should labour to unite themselves much together, seeing God joins them together in the singular number. Oh! the Lord loves unity in his church.

Obs. 11. God's sons are not exempt from sore and grievous evils in this world; though they be sons, yet they may be in Egypt: "And called my son out of Egypt." So in Jer. xii. 7, "I have forsaken mine house, I have left mine heritage; I have given the dearly beloved of my soul into the hand of her enemies." Though "the dearly beloved of God's soul," yet "given into the hand of her enemies." Though God's son, yet in Egypt. So with the church under antichrist; for above twelve hundred years God gave up his sons into that spiritual Egypt.

We must not think therefore, as soon as we come under grievous afflictions, that God has cast us off from being sons; though they were in Egypt, yet still they were "my son." Now we are ready to think, that if God bring us into sore afflictions then we are no more sons; no, thou mayst be delivered up to the power of the enemy, and yet no slave, no enemy, but a son of God still. Deut. xxxii. 10, is much to be observed, where it is said of the people of Israel, that they were "in the waste howling wilderness," and yet they were "as the apple of God's eye." So thou mayst be delivered up to suffer sore things, to be banished from thy house and home, and to wander up and down "in the waste howling wilderness," and yet remain "as the apple of God's eye." It is a strange sight indeed to see a child of God, an heir of heaven, a co-heir with Jesus Christ, one dearer to God than heaven and earth, subject to the power, the caprice, and lusts of wicked, base, ungodly men; yea, it may be, for a time slaves to Satan; I say, even those whom God has an eternal love to are oftentimes for a season slaves to Satan; but then they have not the comfort of this sonship, nor do they know it: but now they may know themselves to be sons, and yet slaves to the humours of wicked and ungodly men, and than this there is not a stranger sight in the world; I believe the angels in heaven do not see a stranger sight, nor one at which they more admire, than a godly man under the lusts of wicked men. This is God's permissive work for the present, but he intends to manifest himself in another way hereafter: for the present he fetches about the glory of his own ends this way, he lets even his own dear sons be in Egypt; but God has his time to deliver his people and call them out of Egypt: it is but a call, and it is done; it is as easily done as a man that gives a call for such a one out of such a place. Let our bondage be never so great, it requires but a word from God to deliver us.

Obs. 12. It is a great mercy to be called out of Egypt. This the Lord here brings as a great testimony of his love to them, that he called them out of Egypt. In Exod. xii. 42, "It is a night to be much observed unto the Lord for bringing them out from the land of Egypt;" to be called from that Egypt was a fruit of love; and so to be called from spiritual Egypt, (for man's natural estate is a spiritual Egypt,) to be called from antichristian Egypt, is a great fruit of love; and as it is a fruit of love, so it is an aggravation of sin, for so it is brought, "I called my son out of Egypt," and yet they did thus.

If God remembered this mercy, of calling them out of Egypt so many years before, as an aggravation of their sin, how much more may the Lord make that an aggravation of our sin, that he called us so lately out of our Egypt! In many ways I might show you that we were under as great, if not a greater bondage than the Israelites were under in Egypt. And there has been as outstretched an arm (though not so obvious to sense) in calling us, as in calling them out of Egypt. Now let not this be an aggravation of our sin, that the sound of our cries under the yoke of our bondage is not yet out of our ears, and the very sores of our shoulders through their yokes not yet thoroughly healed, and yet we grow to be wanton, foolish, vain, proud, cruel, oppressing one another, and abusing our liberty. Oh! our sin must needs be accounted exceeding great before God.

Well, but yet we see not all, nor even the chief part, of the mind of God in this expression, for we find that, in Matt. ii. 15, the Holy Ghost cites this scripture which now I am opening to you, and interprets it of Jesus Christ. When Jesus Christ was fain to fly into Egypt to save his life, the Holy Ghost saith, that it was to fulfil that "which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son."

It is a very strange interpretation, of which, however, we have other similar in the New Testament; and Jerome on the place saith, that Julian and some of the Jews, with others who hated the Christian religion, took much advantage of this quotation of Matthew in their arguments against the authority of the gospel, saying, Surely it proves Matthew very unskilful in Scripture, that he should make such a quotation as this, when it is apparent that it is spoken of the calling of the people of Israel out of Egypt. And truly we should never have thought that there had been such a meaning in this place of Hosea, had we not found it so interpreted by the Holy Ghost. But before we open this, and show how this scripture is rightly quoted by the evangelist, I would observe, that we may see by this interpretation, both of Matthew, and divers other places in the New Testament, that there is much more of the mind of God in the Old Testament than was generally known to them who lived in those times. Which of the Jews could have so interpreted "I have called my son out of Egypt?" that is, Jesus Christ, after his birth, shall be persecuted and forced to fly for his life, and that into Egypt, and he shall come again out of Egypt; who could have thought this to be the intention of the Holy Ghost? Things were not understood till they came to be fulfilled, and then their accomplishment interpreted the prediction. And the truth is, as in the Old Testament so in the New, there are a great many scriptures of which we understand yet but little; the time of our ascertaining their full meaning, is reserved to the period of their fulfilment. Many such prophecies we have in the Revelation and other places, that are (I am confident) as dark to us as this place of Hosea was to the Jews; and there is as excellent a spiritual meaning in many places of the New Testament hidden from us, that will hereafter be revealed clearly to the church of God, as there were in the Old Testament; I know not whether I may say as many as those, but certainly as much hidden from us. Jesus Christ, the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world, is he who shall open the book that is sealed, Rev. v., as a fruit of his death; it is the Lamb, as he is a Lamb slain from the beginning of the world, that shall open the book that is sealed. There are many things in the book of God that are sealed to us this day, and it is the purchase of the blood of Jesus Christ to open it; and when his time comes, it shall be opened to us.

xxviii, p. 197.

"And have called my son out of Egypt."

Interpreters, I find, do much weary and tire themselves and their readers about the aptness of this as quoted in Matthew: their manifold opinions may, perhaps, be reduced to these three heads:

First, Some think that Matthew quotes this but only by way of allusion or similitude; that there is a similitude between Christ's going to Egypt and returning, and the people of Israel's going to Egypt and returning; but that is a frigid and a poor interpretation, and against what is said in Matthew, that Christ was taken down into Egypt, that the Scripture "might be fulfilled."

Secondly, Junius, that learned man, thinks that the very literal sense of the place, is rather a prophecy of Christ's going into Egypt and returning again, than of the people of Israel doing the same: and so, in his sixth parallel, (Paral. lib. l.) he saith, It is as if God should say, I have threatened that I will utterly destroy the king of Israel, but shall I therefore wholly destroy Israel? No, no, I will not do that for my Son's sake; for though Israel is unworthy and receive not my Son, and by my Son's going into Egypt it is declared that they are so unworthy of him that they should never have my Son come among them again, yet he shall come among them again, and that shall be an evidence to them, that I will not cast off my people Israel. This is a very spiritual and good interpretation; and we find often that, when the Lord did promise mercy to his people, and would give an evidence that he would not destroy them, he was wont to give a promise of Jesus Christ; as in Isa. ix. 6, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given;" he seals the promise that he will not cast off his people by promising the Messias. So Junius thinks that the Lord here seals this promise of mercy to the people of Israel, that he will not utterly cut off his own people; why? because he will call his Son out of Egypt. But yet I cannot think this altogether satisfactory, and will give you that which may more clearly appear to be the mind of God.

Thirdly, This scripture in Hosea was intended not only to show what was past, that God did indeed call his people out of Egypt, but to typify God's future intentions. Other instances occur in which many things spoken in the Old Testament literally of other matters, yet, apparently, are meant typically of Jesus Christ; as Exod. xii. 46, compared with John xix. 36: in Exodus, in the institution of the passover, God saith, "Not a bone of it shall be broken;" now in John xix. 36, it is said, when the soldiers came to break the bones of the two thieves that were upon the cross, through the ordering of Providence they found that Christ was dead, and so they brake not his bones. One would think now that this were a mere accidental thing; but yet the Holy Ghost saith, "These things were done that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken." Thus you see in things apparently very accidental, God has a special work, and often intends great things by what seem in our eyes to be of little moment. What more light thing than that, that they should not break the bones of Christ? though clearly meant at first literally concerning the paschal lamb, yet it had an ultimate typical reference to Jesus Christ. Compare two other scriptures together, 2 Sam. vii. 14, with Heb. i. 5: the words in Samuel apparently concern Solomon, "I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son;" but now the apostle, in Heb. i. 5, applies them to Christ, and saith, "To which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee? And again," saith he, "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son?" These refer primarily to Solomon, and typically to Jesus Christ. So the words of the prophet here refer literally to Israel going into Egypt and returning back again, but yet have a further typical bearing on what would be done with Christ, that he should go to Egypt and return back again.

Obs. 13. God has an eye to Christ in all he does, all his works some way or other have reference to Jesus Christ: indeed God's carrying his people to Egypt and bringing them back again, was one of his greatest works, but still in that he had an eye to Jesus Christ.

Obs. 14. It will be one great part of the glory of the saints hereafter, to see how God had reference to Jesus Christ in all his great works in the world. Now we look upon things and witness their influence, but we do not discern their reference to Jesus Christ; hereafter it will be a special part of the glory of the saints, that they shall see how in all the works of God he had regard to Jesus Christ. In the work of creation; God would not have created the world but for his Son: in the fall, and in every thing, he purposed the magnifying of the great work of his Son; and those who had a special work of the Spirit of God in those times did understand God's meaning, though ordinarily they did not. I remember one learned interpreter, to show how they might understand God's mind by his types, thus expresses himself: As it was with Jonathan, when he carried his bow and arrows into the field to notify to David whether he should fly away for fear of Saul, or return back again. Now when Jonathan shot his arrows, he said to his lad, "Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them;" or, "Behold, the arrows are beyond thee." Now the youth knew no more but that he was to look for the arrow, but David knew more, that when he said it was beyond him, then he should do thus, and when it was on this side, then he should do thus. It expresses very well the difference of the types and the letter of things: those who knew but merely the letter, were like Jonathan's lad, that did but only according to what Jonathan said; but David knew the intention of the mind of Jonathan, and so was able to make use of it. Oh! it is an excellent thing to be able to understand the mind of God in his word; it is a fruit of the love of Jesus Christ to his saints. And certainly if the people of Israel had but known this, when they first went into Egypt, and returned back again, that the Lord aimed at Jesus Christ in it, would it not have been a comfort to them? If they had known that God intended to make them conformable to his Son, would not this knowledge have supported them? Then certainly it must needs be a comfort to the saints to know now, that in all their sufferings they have a conformity to Jesus Christ; we know it now, and that the reason why we suffer is to make us conformable to Jesus Christ: the Jews did not know that this was the reason why God would have them suffer, but we know it, and therefore in all our sufferings we should exercise our faith in the sufferings of Jesus Christ. Do we suffer thus and thus? he did so, to take away the sting of our sufferings. And in a special manner, you that have been driven from house and home, and compelled, perhaps, to fly for your lives, and to go among strangers; still your suffering is not so great as was the suffering of Jesus Christ; he fled for his life when he was but an infant, and did not only fly to strangers, but to his enemies, to the Egyptians: you are driven but from one part of England to another. O, exercise your faith in this. It was a very strange work of God's providence, that presently after he was born he must fly for his life. You that are obliged to carry your children with you, O remember how Joseph and Mary were obliged to do it; and their flight was a great deal worse than yours, for they had no resource but to fly to Egypt. Now supposing it was by land, for which many reasons may be given, they were compelled to fly almost a hundred miles through the desert wilderness where there were no habitations: you fly from one town to another, and find relief; they were fain to fly above a hundred miles through the very desert between the land of Canaan and Egypt. Now, though it is true the people of Israel were forty years in the wilderness; but not through the length of the place, as three days' journey might have carried them into the land of Canaan, had not God delayed them, and suffered them to entangle themselves on account of their stubbornness and rebellions; yet, although we have no reason to conclude that Joseph's flight into Egypt was as tedious, certainly it must needs have been sad and miserable: it cannot be conceived that any of your flights should be so sad and miserable as that was, for they could not carry any provision with them, but were fain to fly in a private way to save the life of Jesus Christ. Oh, how often do you think did Joseph and Mary look upon this babe when they were flying through the desert wilderness, and think, What! is this the Son of God; is this the Saviour of the world; is this he that should be the Redeemer of Israel; is this he that is God and man; is this he that is the Second Person in Trinity, that presently after he is born we must fly for his life through a desert wilderness? Oh the strange work of God in the very work of man's redemption! Things were so low and poor, and seemed to go on in such a contrary way, as would have staggered any one's faith, that Jesus Christ should do such great things as he afterwards did. O my brethren, this is the way of God, to task the faith of men, especially at first. So it was with Christ's flight into Egypt.

Ver. 2. As they called them, so they went from them: they sacrificed unto Baalim, and burned incense to graven images.

"As they called them." That is, Moses and Aaron, and other prophets and ministers of God sent unto them, called them to serve the Lord, and to worship him according to his own way. And especially they called them from idolaters and false worship.

As I called them, καθὼς μετέκλισα αὐτούς, Sept. That is, though they were so called, I called them, yet they went from them. When the means of God are so powerful, to resist then is a very great evil. "If our gospel," that is, our gospel preached with so much plainness and power, "be hid, it is hid to them that are lost," 2 Cor. iv. 3. But take it here,

"As they called them." That is, look what earnestness there was in Moses and Aaron, and other ministers of God, to call them from their evil ways, so much stubbornness and stoutness was it for them to resist. Calvin thinks it is, Because they called them, therefore they went from them. That is, they went from them for the very nonee, as we are wont to say. Because Moses would have us do thus and thus, we will for that very reason do just the contrary.

"So they went from them." That is, turned their backs upon them: like stubborn children and servants, when they are called they will not hear, but turn their backs upon you; so did they to Moses. From whence,

Obs. 1. It is a mercy of God to have God's ministers calling us to obedience. Who are we that God should send his messengers after us? What need has God of us? Suppose we go on in the ways of death, and perish, what shall God lose by it? But this is God's mercy, that he will call after us. God might say, If you will go, go on and perish everlastingly. Oh, but he doth not so.

Obs. 2. It is as great a mercy of God to call us out of sin to duty, as to bring us out of affliction, and we should account one as great as another. We think it a great mercy if the Lord will call us out of an affliction; but when God calls us out of sin to duty, do you think that that is as great a mercy? If you do, it is a sign of a sanctified heart indeed. You are in sickness and under great extremity; if God should say, I will give out my word to deliver you, that would be a sweet word, you would say; yes, but when God gives forth his word to call thee out of thy sin to a duty, thou shouldst as joyfully take a hint of that word of God too. O, prize God's call to you from sin to duty, as much as from misery to prosperity.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation of men's sins, if they be called to duty after God has called them out of misery, and they obey not. After thou comest out of an affliction, whether bodily or spiritual, God expects thou shouldst as diligently hearken to his call that calls thee to duty, as thou didst take hold of his mercy when he held it to thee to deliver thee out of thine affliction. Charge thy soul thus, Oh wretched heart that I have! I called to God, and he has heard my call, and delivered me; and now he calls me to duty, and shall I stop mine ears against God's call? Oh how just were it for God to leave me in misery, when I turn my back to him when he calls me to duty!

Obs. 4. For men not only to disobey God's call, but to turn away themselves from it, and from those who speak to them in his name, betokens a high degree of sinfulness. In Jer. ii. 27, "They have turned their back unto me, and not their face;" and so Jer. xxxii. 33, "They have turned unto me the back, and not the face:" that is more than not to obey, it signifies to refuse to obey, to resolve not to obey. In Jer. xviii. 17, God threatens them that, "in the day of their calamity," he would show them his back too. As, when a traitor is petitioning his prince, so long as the prince is but willing to parley with him, and to read his petition, there is hope; but if the prince turn his back and will not look upon his petition, then hope is gone: so there is hope that we may bring persons to obedience so long as they will hearken to the word, but if once they turn their backs, then there is little hope: and when God turns his back upon sinners, woe unto them! Remember, you that turn your back upon calls to obedience, O remember that scripture in Jer. xviii. 17, that God threatens in the day of your calamity he will turn his back on you. Men do not attain to this wickedness at once; at first they are loth to be convinced that such a thing is a truth, but at length, when the evidence of truth comes clear, they in a desperate way turn their backs upon it, and resolve not to hearken to it. A striking instance you have of this in Jeremiah. At first they said that Jeremiah did not speak the word of the Lord, but afterward, "As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the Lord, we will not hearken unto thee," Jer. xliii. 2; xlv. 16.

Obs. 5. It is yet a higher wickedness to have our corruptions irritated and provoked by the word. "As they called them, so they went from them." When men's hearts are as lime, that the showers of the word serve only to inflame them, their condition is sad indeed; when the clearer evidence they have of the word, and the more power with which it is preached, the more desperately wicked they become. We find it so in some places, and you wonder at it; but wonder not, for where the word does not convert, it hardens.

Obs. 6. God's free grace is very great and very strong. The Lord was merciful to his people that were thus stubborn and stout, but the more they were called to obedience the more wicked they grew, and yet God's mercy continued towards them for a long time together; and indeed, in that God should set his heart and love upon such a people as this, is almost one of the greatest helps against despair that we know of. Do but look into the book of God, and read of the people of the Jews, what a wretched, froward, perverse, stubborn, stout-hearted nation they were, and yet that the God of all the people of the earth should choose them to be his peculiar people; oh the free grace of God! nothing God has more at heart than to honour free grace. I confess I had thought to have spent some time in showing you the extreme stubbornness of the Jews, with the special view of magnifying the free grace of God towards such an unworthy people: you find that God does so himself; when he speaks of his mercy to that people, he gives them this notice, that he would have them to know, that what he did for them was not for their own righteousness: thus Deut. ix. 6, "Understand therefore, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiff-necked people:" as if God should say, I magnify free grace: whereas I might have chosen some other people that might have been more yieldable to my hand. I chose you, that it might appear that all that I did was out of free grace. In Psal. lxxviii. 8, "their fathers" are called "a stubborn and rebellious generation;" they seemed to be of strong spirits, but their strength was against the truth; and though stubbornness has a seeming glory in it, yet the truth is, its strength is but very weakness. Thus Ezek. xvi. 30, "How weak is thine heart, saith the Lord God, seeing thou doest all these things, the work of an imperious whorish woman!" They are said to be strong-hearted, "imperious," but saith the Holy Ghost, "How weak is thine heart!" And you shall find in Scripture that they are called stiff-necked, and iron-sinewed, impudent and rebellious children, that walked contrary to God, and had hardened their hearts and made them like an adamant; so Stephen saith, Acts vii. 51, "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost:" moreover it is very observable, if you examine the Scriptures, that presently after they came out of the land of Egypt, within three days after God had shown them such a miraculous work they fell to murmuring; nay, they did not stay so long, for it is said in Psal. cvi. 7, "They provoked the Lord at the sea, even at the Red sea." In Exod. xvi. 2; xvii. 2, the people chide with Moses. So throughout Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Judges, and the Kings, you find them continually rebelling, a people with an iron sinew against God; and yet for all that the Lord makes choice of this people, and loves them: oh! free grace, the free grace of God! When your children are stubborn and stout against you, and you think it a grievous affliction to you, reflect, none in the world are so crossed with stubborn children as God himself.

And though any of you should find your hearts very stubborn, yet for all that do not allow them to sink into despair, for God's grace is free to overcome even stubbornness of heart, as it did here. You have a most remarkable confirmation of this in Exod. xxxiv. 8, 9, "And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped. And he said, if now I have found grace in thy sight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us; for it is a stiff-necked people." Their being "a stiff-necked people" was no argument of despair, that God should not go among them; but Moses uses it as an argument with God, Lord, they are "a stiff-necked people," yet "let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us;" "and pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for thine inheritance." We may by the way here note how the Chaldee paraphrase renders this, Let the majesty of the Lord go among us; the majesty or divine presence: the Hebrews call it Shechinah, שכינה which they usually distinguish from God the Father, and say there is no coming before the blessed high King without the Shechinah. So our Saviour more plainly, John xiv. 16. But to return:

Obs. 7. None should despair. God holds forth by this example that he would have none sink with despair, but be brought in by his free grace, notwithstanding the stubbornness of their hearts against him.

Now as for the latter part of this 2nd verse, respecting their sacrificing to Baalim, and burning incense to graven images, I shall not enter upon it, as I have spoken of it fully before.

Ver. 3. I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms; but they knew not that I healed them.

Here we have the third degree of God's goodness towards Ephraim, the fruit of his love; he called them out of Egypt, and he called upon them by his prophets, and he taught them to go.

"I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms." God here compares himself to a nurse, or to a tender parent, that carries along the child, guiding it by the hand and feet, and in rugged, foul places, taking it up in the arms; such were my dealings towards Ephraim, saith God. In Psal. lxxvii. 20, God is said to lead them by the hand of Moses and Aaron, like a flock of sheep. But here he is said to lead them like a nurse or a parent; and this expression seems to have reference to Deut. i. 31, "In the wilderness, where thou hast seen how that the Lord thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son, in all the way that ye went:" look, as a man leads his son by his hand, and when he comes to difficulties, bears him up and takes him in his arms, so did the Lord thy God deal towards thee "his son;" and, as a loving parent, taught thee how to go in thy way out of Egypt, and led thee all through the wilderness until he brought thee into Canaan.

When they came first out of Egypt they knew not which way to go no more than a child, and if God had then left them, certainly they had perished; their way was very full of difficulty, and God did seem to lead them about, but the Scripture saith, "he led them forth by the right way;" Psal. cvii. 7. Though they were forty years in the wilderness, whereas they might have gone through within a few days, yet still they were led in "the right way," God "taught them to go."

Obs. 1. When God calls his people out of afflictions, they know no more than a little child how to guide themselves in their way. We think if we be delivered from such and such an evil we are well; but when God does grant deliverance, if he should leave us there, we would quickly spoil ourselves, and turn our mercies into miseries. The pride of men's hearts inclines them to self-confidence, hence they get many a knock and bruise. Oh how many stumble and perish because they will be going themselves, and not depend upon God's hand!

We find this by experience: God has in a great measure called us out of Egypt, and we hope that he intends a Canaan to us, yet, what children are we! we do not know how to take a step in our way; oh how often since have we been at a stand, in a maze, not knowing which way to take, this or that! and how often, alas, have we fallen and gone astray! If ever people required God to teach them how to go, we do so at this day; our path is an untrodden path, and there are many stumbling-blocks in our way, and we often stumble and fall in them. Poor children do not more require the hand of the parent or nurse, when they go upon the ice or in slippery ways, than we need the hand of God upon us to lead and guide us in these our ways.

Obs. 2. The way in which God often leads people, may be a way of much difficulty. He "taught Ephraim also to go," and "led him forth by the right way." If we inquire what that way was; it was the way through the wilderness, yea, the way before they came into the wilderness, before they came to the sea: thus, Exod. xiv. 9, "The Egyptians pursued after them, all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, before Baal-zephon." They were in a very strait way, the sea before them, Pharaoh and all his army behind them, and they were "encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth," at the mouth of those mountains which compassed them round about; and they were "before Baal-zephon," that is, The god of watching, the god which the Egyptians believed did watch those that went out of their country without permission. Yet, under the eye of this their watching-god, hemmed in between mountains, the sea before them and a great army behind them, God "taught them to go." In what way does God teach them to go? God "taught them to go" even through the sea. And when they have gone through the sea, is all the evil over? No, they must go into the waste howling wilderness, and there be led about for forty years together; and yet God here reckons up such guidance of them as a fruit of his love.

So long as we are in God's way, though it be difficult, yet have we cause to bless him that we are in it; and let not us be troubled at the difficulties we meet with, when we see God before us, leading us in our way.

Obs. 3. The more difficult their way is, the more care God has of his people. We do not find such an expression of God's care to teach them in any other way but when they went first out of Egypt; because then their way was the most difficult, therefore God took upon him in a special manner their guidance.

Be not discouraged at your difficulties, but when you are in your way, and your conscience tells you that it is not a way that you have chosen to yourselves, look up to God for guidance, cry to him; as you find in Psal. cvii. 6, "They cried unto the Lord in their trouble;" and then, ver. 7, "he led them forth by the right way." Mark how these two are joined together; "They cried unto the Lord in their trouble," and "he led them forth by the right way." When you are in straits, cry to God in your trouble, and the Lord will lead you forth "by the right way." When we have been in the greatest straits, and have had the hardest way to go, how has God taken us up in his arms! Through God's mercy, though we be very weak, yet we are gone on a great way from Egypt, even bondage in our spiritual Egypt. It is unthankfulness in people to say, We are in as bad a condition as ever we were. What God may bring us to through the unthankfulness of men we know not; but certainly, through God's mercy, we have been led along a great way on our journey. God has taught us to go; it has not been the wisdom nor foresight of men that has carried us so far on in our way, no, we have found, apparently, we are not much beholden to the wisdom of men for the way in which we have been carried, but it is God that has come in in our straits. We see by what has fallen out, how otherwise we should have perished in our way, or even returned back again into Egypt: how often have we been ready to think, Would things were with us as heretofore! oh! such has been the peevish discontent of our spirits, that we have been thinking of turning back into our Egypt: as it was with Israel of old, though God was with them in their way, yet often they thought of returning back again. We have been ready to think of by-ways for ourselves, and every one to trust to his own devices; and what cross paths have we walked in, first one way, and then another, undoing what we have done! first engaging men, and then discouraging the same men that we have encouraged; though they have continued the same, yet our spirits toward them have not remained unchanged. We may apply to ourselves Jer. xxxi. 22, which is spoken in reference to their way, coming out of their captivity; "How long wilt thou go about, O thou backsliding daughter?" We may well say to England at this day, Oh, how long wilt thou go about? that is, shifting this way and that, and not daring to trust God in his way. We are afraid, that if we should go on in the right path in which God guides us, that we should miscarry, and therefore we go about, and that is the reason it is so long before we have our deliverance; we follow our own way, and do not submit ourselves to the guidance of God. God makes to his people an excellent promise in Jer. xxxi. 9, in reference to the guiding of them in their way from their captivity: "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them: I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble: for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born." This is a passage very suitable to the scripture we are now opening. It is a fruit of fatherly love to guide us in a straight way, and keep us from stumbling. But mark how this shall be done; "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them;" there must we weeping and supplication, to cry to God for guidance in our way: as a poor child, if it be left a little by the mother or nurse, stands crying for support and guidance; so it should be our care, in all our straits, not to fly upon this or that instrument, but to cry to God to lead us forth by the right way. We may apply this to God's guidance of the soul from spiritual Egypt; when God brings the soul out of spiritual bondage he guides it in the way to the heavenly Canaan. You whom the Lord is bringing out of your spiritual bondage, look up to God to teach you how to go. Why? For the way on which you have entered is a hard way, a straight way, and narrow way; it has many stumbling-blocks in it, and many by-paths near it, that are very like to it: your way is a very slippery way, and you had need be taught how to go; else you may slip and fall, and grievously wound yourselves. You that are young beginners in the way of religion, be not too confident in your own understanding and your own strength. Many poor children, for want of the care of their nurses, have gotten such falls when they were children that have lamed them and made them go crooked all their days: and so it has been with many young professors of religion; because they have been too bold and confident in their own understanding, the Lord has left them to such falls that they prove but crooked all the days of their profession; and though they do go on in the ways of religion, they are but maimed and crooked professors. And truly we have very great cause to fear, that they who survive but a few years, to see the present young professors of religion live to be something old, I say, we have cause to fear that those that live to see it, will see a great many maimed and crooked professors among them; for many young ones in these slippery times, that venture so much upon the ice, upon doubtful things that they understand not, get such falls and bruises as are like to stick to them as long as they live. Oh, let young ones take heed of venturing upon doubtful things, let them look up to God to make their way plain before them, and not lean to their own understandings, lest (I say) they meet with falls attended by bruises that they may feel another day.

Obs. 4. Seeing God makes it a fruit of his love to teach his people how to go, when you see others slip and stumble in their profession of religion, bless God for his mercy towards you, that he teaches and upholds you in your way. As when a man is riding upon the road in winter time, it may be he sees some before him whose horses get into holes and stumble, to the great danger or even serious injury of their riders; now, if you should see a man thus falling and breaking his leg or arm, would you not have cause to bless God that delivered you from such a mishap: so, when you see professors of religion falling in the ways of their profession, O bless God that he teaches you in your way, upholds and guides you. In slippery ways you will take hold of the hands of tender women to guide them; and so God does with you: know, the whole course of your way from spiritual Egypt to spiritual Canaan, is so covered with ice and so rugged, that God is fain throughout it all to take you by the hand. Oh the goodness of God, to condescend thus to his poor creatures, to compare himself to a nurse! Oh how often would we run into harm's way (as we are wont to say) if God did not lead us!

Obs. 5. Take heed, you who are weak, and have need of teaching, that you be not wayward and wanton, that you be not foolish and unruly, and that you do not wilfully run into rugged and slippery ways. God indeed is as a nurse to teach you how to go; yea, but be not you as wayward and froward children, that sometimes tire their nurses. It is more difficult to teach some children than others how to go, they are so froward and wilful that, if the eye of their nurse be from them but never so little, they will go their own way. O take heed you be not among those froward, wilful children, that will still be going their own way.

Obs. 6. God's ministers and all of us should labour to follow God in this his tender care of others. We should be like our Father. God takes a delight in teaching weak ones how to go, and in guiding them in their way. Truly, we that profess ourselves to be God's children, should imitate our Father: and especially God's ministers should take a delight to help weak ones on in their way; yea, to carry them in their very arms. That which God is said here to do, is elsewhere ascribed to Moses, as in Numb. xi. 12, "Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them, that thou shouldst say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father beareth the sucking child, unto the land which thou swarest unto their fathers?" It seems Moses, though he thought it to be very hard to bear so many people in his arms, (as it were,) yet God gave that commission to him, and he did it according as he was able, carrying the people as a nurse or a parent carries the sucking child in their bosom.

Obs. 7. God's ministers must not be discouraged though they meet with those that are very froward. We are as froward in reference to God, as any can be in reference to us; and therefore ministers, when they meet with young professors, and other beginners in the ways of godliness, and find them often untoward and peevish, should not because of that cast them off; but consider, if God had cast off you because of that, what would have become of you? No, instruct with meekness even them that oppose themselves; though they kick and spurn, yet instruct them with meekness. In 1 Thess. ii. 7, we have a notable pattern how a minister should carry himself in this respect; "But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children." Thus ministers should be of gentle spirits, and know that God places them to teach children how to go in their way. So we find in Tit. i. 7, that they must not be "soon angry;" ministers must not be of angry dispositions. You would be loth to put your children to froward nurses, their very milk would be some way savour of them, and injure your children; it is a special qualification, and necessarily required in a nurse, that she be of a gentle and patient disposition. Now God's ministers are compared to nurses; and do not think the comparison too mean, for God himself is compared to a nurse, when he saith, "I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms."

Obs. 8. That the love and tender care of parents and nurses in bringing up children, and enduring much trouble with them, imposes a great obligation on children when grown up to requite with duty and due respect their parents and nurses; and if they do not, it greatly aggravates their guilt. You that are grown up from children, remember the care, the sorrow, and the trouble of your bringing up, and be ashamed of your unthankfulness. How is it that you have all your limbs, but from the care of your parents and nurses? You are to bless God for the care of those to whom you were committed when children, and know that you owe due respect unto them for it. He is an apostate to the great law of nature, who violates charities due to parents and nurses. I remember I have read of the Pisidians, a certain heathen people, that when they were feasting at any time, the first-fruit of all their feast they would offer to their parents, as thinking it unseemly for them to rejoice in the use of the creature, without showing due honour to their parents, from whom they had their being and education. Heathens have ever condemned and punished unthankfulness in children; and the law of God (we know) does punish a stubborn child with death.

"But they knew not that I healed them." Many times children, though there be a great care to teach them how to go, yet will by their very venturesome wantonness get many a knock and bruise. So it was with this people; Indeed my care was towards them, but they would go their own way, and often to their own hurt. Well, did God therefore reject them, and say, It is through your own fault that you have gotten these bruises and maims? No, "I healed them," saith God. Though they were never so froward, and got thereby many bruises, yet my pity was so great, that I healed those very wounds and bruises occasioned by their own wilfulness.

Though in the reading of this we may pass it easily by, yet it is as remarkable a scripture as most we have in the book of God. What is the reason our consciences do so misgive us, and that we are so afraid that the Lord will leave us to ourselves? Our accusing consciences tell us this, that we may thank ourselves for our state; the Lord showed us another way, but we, through our sinful frowardness, would take our own. Can we then think that the Lord will have care of us in our sores that we got ourselves by our wilfulness? Yes, (saith God,) such was my compassion towards Ephraim, that I taught them how to go; and yet they got bruises; but still "I healed them."

Obs. 9. God will not cast off his children though they get hurt; yea, though they get hurt by their own sin, yet the Lord is so gracious as to heal them. There are remarkable words respecting this in Isa. lvii. 17, 18, "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him: I hid me, and was wroth, and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart." "He went on frowardly" when "I smote him." What then? In the 18th verse, "I have seen his ways." One would have thought there should have followed, I will therefore smite him, and plague him, and make him to know what it is to deal so frowardly and perversely with me; but behold the goodness of the Lord! God's "ways are not our ways, neither are his thoughts our thoughts," for he saith, "I have seen his ways, and will heal him: I will lead him also, and restore comforts unto him and to his mourners." I will not say, I will never lead him more, because he would not regard my teaching, but go his own ways and get many bruises; no, I have seen his ways, and will heal him, and lead him, notwithstanding.

O be not discouraged when you have gone out of God's way, but be troubled and ashamed; make use of this promise; the Lord sees the frowardness of his people, and yet will heal them, and lead them, and restore comfort to them.

And, my brethren, thus has the Lord dealt graciously with us in our inconsiderate, foolish, sinful courses. How often have we in this land been brought low by them! we have been sore wounded, yea, in danger of bleeding to death, by the falls that we have got; we have often given up all for lost, as it were; men's ways have been so perverse and cross, and there has been so little hope of any good, that sometimes, when we have met together, we have even said, All is gone, we are betrayed, and therefore there is little hope of any good. Have not we oftentimes said thus? but the Lord has come in and healed us, and that scripture in Isa. lviii. has been made good to us; the Lord has beheld the frowardness of our ways, and yet has healed us, and has led us. You have gone on in such and such ways, saith God, and you have even undone yourselves in them, and you were despised, and others squandered away your estates, and nothing came of it; well, you knew not what to do, I will lead you in ways that you do not think of, in such ways as you have the least hopes of good by, I will lead you on in those ways, and restore comfort to you. My brethren, the ways by which the Lord has this last summer restored comfort to England, were they ways that any of you thought of this time twelvemonths? Certainly, it was never in the imaginations and thoughts of men to be brought by such ways as the Lord has led us in, and by which he has restored to us comfort; the Lord saw that the old army was not the way to restore comforts to England, and he has devised other means, new-modelled our army: well, let God's healing of the bruises that we got in walking in our own ways make us thankful, and careful that we run not willfully into any such ways any more, that we be not still more venturous and more careless; if we be, God may suffer us to break our bones; for though God be patient, and loving, and merciful, yet he has time to leave men to the perverseness of their own ways. It may cost us dear before we are healed, if God leave us; though God may not take away his love to cast us wholly off, yet we may be forced to cry again and again with David, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation;" "make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice," Psal. li. David would go out of his way, and he fell so as to break his bones; Oh "that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice." When God heals us, he expects that we should take notice of his work, and acknowledge it in his hand.

"But they knew not that I healed them." I healed them, saith God, but they knew not that I healed them.

Obs. 10. God does us much good that we know not of: "but they knew not that I healed them." I say, God does us much good that we know not of, not only in preventing mercies, but in healing mercies; we attribute our healing to this and the other cause, but it is God in the use of means, sometimes even beyond means, though means oftentimes have been used without any good result, till at last God by a secret and invisible blessing comes and heals us. We must not envy at the honour due to instruments; but certainly, by the healing that we have had this last summer, we have cause to look beyond all men and means; and though God has used means, yet we should attribute all the glory immediately to God. Oh! let not us by our pride and stontness, our oppression, our foolishness, make it appear that we do not acknowledge that God has healed us: God stands much upon being acknowledged to be the healer of his people, because it is his glory. In bodily healings we are ready to acknowledge those that heal us; what thankfulness is given to physicians when they have been instruments of good to us! Before the cure, what would men give! all their estates, that they might be healed of such a disease; but when healed, it may be, some will neglect the physician; but only those of base spirits, for men generally are very ready to show gratitude in such a case: how gainful therefore is the practice of physicians that God makes use of to heal men's bodies! Louis XI. of France allowed his chaplains twenty shillings a month, but his physician, one John Cottière, ten thousand crowns; four crowns must serve his chaplain, while ten thousand are barely sufficient for his physician; so gainful is the practice of the latter, because men are more sensible of the healing of their bodies than the healing of their souls.

Well, any of you who have been in great sickness and distress of body, yea, and in distress of soul too, and are healed, do not now, by the inconsiderateness of your minds, and the abuse of your strength in the ways of sin, manifest that you do not know that God has healed you; both in respect of national healing, and in respect of personal healing, let every one make use of those words of David, Psal. ciii. 1-3, "Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless his holy name:" and again, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases." Oh that we were able to join these two together now, "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities," and "healeth all thy diseases!" Healing is a mercy indeed, but how much more sweet a mercy when it is a fruit of forgiveness! God has in great measure healed the land and nation. Oh that we could say that he had forgiven us! Our healing without our forgiveness will be to little purpose; and therefore, in the times of our greatest wounds, we should cry for forgiveness in the first place, and not be satisfied with any healing without forgiveness of our sins. And so particularly, God, it may be, has healed some of you, or some in your families, of bodily diseases, and has been pleased to relieve you in your sad condition; yea, but can you put both together, bless the Lord who has forgiven all the iniquities of my family, and healed all their diseases? Do not satisfy yourselves with any thing short of this; when thou findest the one, "all thy diseases" healed, be not satisfied except by faith thou canst see the other, "all thine iniquities" forgiven.

Ver. 4. I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love; and I was to them as they that take off the yoke from their jaws, and I laid meat unto them.

This is a great verse, and it will be very hard to pass over it in an expository way only.

"I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love."

Here is a fifth expression of God's love. Two occurred in the former verse, "I taught them to go," and "I healed them," and others preceded them; now here is the fifth, "I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love." God still aggravates his mercy that they may see the aggravations of their sin. There is no such way to be kindly humbled for sin, as to see it has been committed against much mercy.

"I drew them with cords of a man."

Some understand this as if it were a proper name, with the cords of Adam, for the word is ארם a man of red earth.

But it is rather to be taken appellatively; "with the cords of a man," that is, I did not deal with them like beasts, which must be drawn or forced on with violence; my way was not thus with them, to draw them and force them on with iron chains or strong cords about them; no, saith he, I dealt with them like men, "I drew them with cords of a man." Which denotes these three things:

I. I dealt with them rationally, as men, not as beasts, and so sought to draw them.

II. I dealt with them gently, not with rigour and violence, but as a man, for they were human; so my ways were ways suitable to their humanity: as the Scripture sometimes speaks of the rods of men, I will chastise them with the rods of men, by which some think is meant, I will deal with them gently.

III. I dealt with them honourably, in a manner suitable to that respect which is due to man. I considered that they were men, made at first according to my image, that they were the most excellent creatures that I had upon the earth, and therefore I dealt with them in a way suitable to preserve the honour of their human nature, rationally, gently, honourably.

I. Consider how God dealt rationally with this people.

1. The statutes which I gave them were according to the very principles of right reason, therefore, in Deut. iv. 6, he saith, "Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. Why? Mark the 8th verse; "What nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" Mark, all the nations that are about you shall say, What nation is there so wise, that has statutes and judgments like this nation? surely then my law had abundance of reason in it, reason sufficient to convince, not only you, but all the nations round about you. "I drew them with cords of a man," that is, rationally.

2. God strengthened it with many arguments, which is some way beyond the manner of men. If the Lord had but only given forth his law, and left men to discover its meaning, it had been enough; yea, but the Lord "drew them with cords of a man," that is, added to his law many arguments and reasons to show its equity. Now men think it enough if they give out a law, you are not used to have the proof and the reason of it; yea, but saith God, "I drew them with cords of a man;" I gave them a law that had reason in it, and explained that reason: as, if we should go no further than the very moral law, see how God begins, "I am Jehovah thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt;" every word containing a reason to back the law. "I am Jehovah;" therefore obey. I am "thy God;" therefore obey. I am thy God "which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt;" therefore obey. You thus see how the Lord argues his law by the strength of reason.

3. Yea, he not only employs reason, but many persuasions, and motives, and exhortations, as man deals with man: if you read the 4th, 5th, and 6th chapters of Deuteronomy, you shall find all these, calculated to allure to obedience as well as to convince; motives and persuasions being as the "cords of a man," to draw man as a rational creature.

4. If they had any objections, I answered them all. Do you not find when you come to hear the word, that it meets with every secret objection? you can have no secret objection against any thing that God requires, but at some time or other the word meets with it.

5. Yea, I called them to reason with me, therefore I dealt with them like rational creatures; as in Isa. i. 18, "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord;" see how God deals with people after the manner of men: as now, if you should fall out with a neighbour, who, it may be, is froward and humorous, when you are able to overcome your own passion, you go to him and say, I pray thee let us reason the ease together, and if it be yours, take it; so God saith, Let us reason the case together, be not carried on with humour and passion, but let us come and fairly reason the case one with another.

6. God earnestly desires that they would but consider of things. In Deut. xxxii. 29, "O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!" Now when you have to deal with the froward and passionate, if by the strength of reason you could control your own passion, you would be ready to express yourselves thus, Oh that I could but find such a man exercising his reason, that he were but wise, that he would but weigh things! Thus God saith concerning his people, Oh that they were wise, and considered, and understood!

7. God pleads with them after the manner of men. In Jer. ii. 35, "Behold, I will plead with thee, because thou sayest, I have not sinned." Thou art righteous in thine own thoughts; come then, I will plead with thee, and convince thee, saith God. As now, if any wrong you, and yet will not acknowledge their fault, perhaps some of turbulent spirits will make them know that they have wronged them by casting them into prison; but God does not do so, he pleads the ease with them.

8. The Lord will appeal to their own consciences whether they have dealt well with him, yea or no; he will make them to be the judges. In Isa. xli. 8, "Remember this, and show yourselves men: bring it again to mind, O ye transgressors:" do not be led on like beasts in your passion and humour, show yourselves but men, and do but remember, and think of it. I will leave it to you to judge: "Judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard," Isa. v. 3. And then again, "Are not my ways equal? are not your ways unequal?" Ezek. xviii. 29. Now all these expressions are to show how God drew them with the "cords of a man," rationally.

II. He drew them gently. As if God should say, I have not driven them on with rigour, but I have dealt gently with them, like men. Indeed as to one who was always striking a youth, or servant, or man, you would be ready to say, You have not to do with a beast, or a dog, but with a man: saith God, I remembered I had to deal with a man, and therefore I dealt gently. There are these six or seven particulars, in which God expresses his dealing gently with them.

1. I suited myself to their very dispositions. This now is to deal in a gentle way. As a schoolmaster looks upon his scholars not as a company of beasts, but as the children of men, and therefore considers their dispositions and tempers, and, if he be a wise schoolmaster, suits himself thereto, and draws them on with such ways and cords as are suitable to human nature: so I do, saith God, I lead them gently, drawing them as "with cords of a man."

2. I observed when they were in the best temper, and have sought to work upon them then. If you that are wives will deal with your husbands like men, observe when they are in a good temper, and then seek to draw them. God does so: I observed when they were in the best possible temper, and then I came upon them to draw them with the most strength.

3. I gave them time to consider. Though they were never so untoward, yet I did not instantly chasten them, but gave them time to bethink themselves: many scriptures we might adduce on this point. Now when we fly upon others presently, without thus giving them time to consider, we deal not with them like men, but beasts; but "I drew them," saith God, "with cords of a man."

4. I hired them to obedience by my gifts. I do not only in an imperious way command them to obey at their peril, but I have come and hired them to the ways of obedience, and gave them gifts to draw them, and so I dealt with them like men.

5. When they did not obey, I considered whether it were through weakness or wilfulness, and, putting a difference between them, dealt with them accordingly.

6. In all afflictions that were brought upon them, I considered that they were but men of weak natures, and could not bear much; I did not lay on as if I were laying upon an ox, or some such creature that had much strength to bear, but I considered that they were men, and their natures tender, and I laid on my strokes gently: as you know the prophet speaks in Isa. lvii. 16, "I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." The Lord looks upon the weakness of his people, and therefore will not contend, lest their spirits should fail before him.

7. In their afflictions I sympathized. So you know what the Lord saith, "In all their afflictions I was afflicted," Isa. lxiii. 9. As a tender father, or wise master, if he strike the child or servant, the very blows, in a manner, will be felt by himself; but it is not so with you when you strike a beast. So saith God, when I afflicted them, it went to my very heart, and I was afflicted as well as they.

III. He drew them honourably. That is, so that the honour and respect which were any way due or suitable to such a creature were preserved.

1. My instructions ever exceeded my corrections. I never inflicted more stripes than I gave instructions. It is a dishonour to mankind for any superior to give more blows than instructions; but I dealt with them like men, suitable to the respect which is, in a manner, due to human nature.

2. Whatsoever spark of ingenuosity remained in them, I took care to preserve it. If there were but a spark of this virtue in any of them, I not only did not quench it, but took great care to preserve it in all my dealings towards them.

3. I aimed at their good as well as mine own glory in all things. Many scriptures confirm this. When you strike beasts, you do not consider of the good of the beast, but of the benefit you may derive by the furtherance of your work; but when you strike men, you should regard their good as well as your own advantage. No parent should strike a child, but with reference rather to the benefit of the child than to the gratification of their own humour: when you strike merely for your own advantage, without aiming at the good of those you punish, you deal not with them like men, but like beasts.

4. In all my dealings I still held forth hope of reconciliation upon their returning unto me. Though they deserved never so much, and I seemed to come against them in the harshest manner, yet I never so dealt against them but there was hope preserved that, upon their repentance, I would be reconciled to them: this is to deal with them like men. When you, parents or governors, deal with any that offend you, never be so harsh as not to leave, though they be very evil, some hope that upon their coming in they may be reconciled to you.

5. In all my dealings with them, though they were hard sometimes to flesh and blood, yet I put a difference between them and other people. Other people were to me in comparison but as dogs, but these as men, yea, as free-men. So in Jer. ii. 14, "Is Israel a servant? is he a homeborn slave? why is he spoiled?" What! Israel a servant, a home-born slave? No, he must be looked upon as a free-man. So in Isa. xxvii. 7, "Hath he smitten him, as he smote those that smote him?" No, I look on them in a different respect, and as men, yea, as free-men, and deal with them accordingly.

6. Whosoever they began to return, I met them half way. I did not stand it out to the uttermost, to discourage their hearts, but I met them half way in all their returnings. And did not God deal honourably with them? Indeed, if you desire to treat contemptuously those who have offended you, you say, Let them wait; but if to honour others, if we see them but coming afar off, we go forth with haste to meet them, as the father of the prodigal did: so saith God, I did not deal with them in a contemptuous manner, but "I drew them with cords of a man," and honourably entreated them.

Thus you have this expression opened, "I drew them with cords of a man."

Now there are divers things to be observed on these three points.

Obs. 1. The ways of God are very rational, so that they may draw any man of understanding to love them. If man's nature were not degenerated, if we did but stand right in regard of our principle of reason, it were impossible but the ways of God should draw us, at least to an outward obedience to them: there is no reason in your ways, but there is reason in God's ways; and therefore, if you had but the hearts of men, though you had not the hearts of saints, you would be constrained to approve at least of God's ways, and drawn to an outward conformity with them. If men were not besotted with their lusts, and did but bethink themselves of the ways of God, they certainly never would be so confident in their wickedness. "If thy people," saith Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 47, "shall bethink themselves in the land whither they were carried captives: there is so much reason in God's ways, that if one did but bethink himself. "I considered," saith David, Psal. cxix. 59, "my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies." Oh, it is a great mercy to have a considering heart; and it is a great judgment of God to leave any to a slight and vain spirit, not to weigh and ponder things. Most people are led on in a continued hurry of passion, like to the horse in the battle, and no man saith, What have I done? O, couldst thou but attain so much power over thy passion and the violence of thy lusts, as to get alone and weigh God's ways, surely thou couldst not but be convinced that the ways of God are better than thy ways, they are so rational.

Obs. 2. The way to prevail with men, is to deal with them in a rational way. The way that I took to prevail with this people, was to draw them with the cords of men. Certainly the means God adopts to prevail with people are the best.

Therefore those who would prevail to bring any to adopt their views, should deal with them in a rational way: so the Spirit of God, in John xvi. 8, "And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin;" that is, he shall come with demonstration, for so ἀδείξει literally signifies; to convince by way of demonstration so clearly, that one cannot possibly deny. And so the apostle saith, Our preaching was ἐν ἀποδείξει πνεύματος καὶ δυνάμεως, in the "demonstration of the Spirit and of power," 1 Cor. ii. 4: mark, "in the demonstration of the Spirit," and so in "power." This concerns ministers more especially: if ministers would speak powerfully to people, let them speak in demonstration, the demonstration of the Spirit indeed it must be, there is a spiritual reason in the Scripture. Ministers must not think to scare men into the ways of godliness, though I know sometimes God makes use of the bare terrors of the law; but the main thing whereby ministers must have hope to do good to their people, must be by preaching convincingly, to overcome their very reason as far as possible, and to set the law of God so before them, that if they will but judge between God and their own souls, they shall condemn themselves, and approve of God. That ministry is likely to be the best soul-saving ministry, which meets with every objection of their hearts, and at every turn reveals their secrets. O remember you preach to men, and therefore make use of that reason which you find in Scripture. I know reason alone will never do it; but yet when God works to the salvation of souls, he works upon them after the manner of men, and therefore the ministers of God, that are co-workers with God, should work in a manner correspondent.

And not only ministers, but magistrates too, must labour to draw them with the cords of men, that is, by reason rather than violence, in difficult cases of conscience. In such things as men cannot be convinced, and yet are not wilfully ignorant, they must not make prisons and fines their arguments, these are not the cords of men: indeed in civil matters, that carry in them a very face the light of common equity and justice, magistrates need not stay to persuade or convince, but may enforce obedience by punishments; but in all things of a more dubious nature, and that, from their connexions and consequences, are difficult to be understood, and are controverted even among godly and wise men, there they must proceed with tenderness and caution: people must first be instructed and informed, and then, if they do not oppose wilfully, but seem to desire to understand, and yet cannot, they must not be dealt with in a way of violence. That is not to deal with men like men, to force them to things for which they discern no reason, and with all their labour are unable to understand; certainly in such cases forbearance must be shown; and especially the rather, because that Christ, by an apostle, has charged us not to yield to any thing in matters of religion, till we understand the reason of it: "Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin." When Christ saith thus, that we must not receive a thing because such and such men enjoin it, till we examine and understand it for ourselves; surely, then, the uttermost that the power of violence and force may do is this, to make men examine things; but it should proceed no further. And so parents and masters should use conviction rather than correction.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation of men's sin, to stand out against reason, not to be drawn by these "cords of men." Many stand out against the ways of God, while yet their consciences fly in their faces and condemn them. Oh what a wretch thou art, that though the Lord has sought to draw thee with the "cords of a man," with reason, and has convinced thee, yea, has gotten the cords into thy conscience, and would pull thee to himself, thou wilt not be drawn by them! this is indeed an aggravation of your guilt. Some vain reasonings can draw man to sin as a cart-ropes: They "draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart-ropes;" that is, their vain reasonings that they have for their sin, twisted together, make a strong cart-ropes to draw iniquity. Oh! shall not God's cords be as strong as the devil's cords or man's cords? Many there are, though God seems to draw them with these "cords of a man," yet whose lusts are so strong, that, like pampered horses in a team, they will break the cart-ropes, break all their harness to pieces; their unruly spirits even say like those in Psal. ii., "Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us." Well, thou shalt one day be held by the cords of thine own sin, (as the Scripture speaks,) and thy conscience shall lash thee with those cords of conviction that failed to draw thee. Shall not the cords of conviction draw thee from thy sin? they shall serve to be as whips to lash thy soul even to all eternity. Know that the rules of right reason and Scripture reason shall stand, when thou, and thousands of such wilful fools as thou art, shall perish eternally. And these are the notes for God's dealing in a rational way.

Obs. 4. Man's nature, if not degenerated, is loving and gentle. So saith God, "I drew them with cords of a man;" that is, gently, in accordance with man's nature, as fair means will work upon it rather than rigid severity: hence, in ordinary speech, kindness is called humanity, Let men have some humanity in them, that is, let them be courteous; to be courteous and to show humanity we use as synonymous. So that the nature of men, though fallen, yet if not twice dead, and overcome by its corruptions exceedingly, is naturally kind and gentle.

O, you that profess religion, labour to be eminent in courteousness, in gentleness, in humanity; know that grace, though it does elevate above humanity to Christianity, yet it does not take away humanity. No, it raises it higher; and therefore, seeing there is something left in man's nature of gentleness and fairness, surely those that have grace and a principle within to curb corruption, should covet earnestly these most excellent gifts.

Obs. 5. We should draw our relations with gentleness. Seeing that gentleness is the cords of men, we should use it to draw on to goodness those whom we desire. Ministers, parents, governors, neighbours, observe the dispositions of those you have to deal with, suit yourselves to them, labour so to gain their hearts if possibly you can; and that they may have good thoughts of the ways of godliness, manifest no bitterness, nor sourness. Did not God gain upon your hearts by gentleness? But if God did come in a harsh way to your apprehensions at first, yet know, there is no such distance between you and your neighbours, your children, or servants, as there is between God and you; therefore it is for you to deal with your fellow creatures in a gentle, kind manner. If a hunter would get his game, he does not make a hooting and noise, but steals on them gently and quietly; and so, if you would win souls, you must attract and allure them by "the beauties of holiness." Learn this, you that are of harsh tempers, who do nothing but attempt to terrify to good, saying, If you will not do thus and thus, I will deal with you thus and thus: O, try what gentleness will do; do not so domineer over others as to think that it is for you to satisfy your will upon them, but labour to be all things to all men.

And never chastise children nor servants but with grief; and put a difference between weakness and willfulness; and let your hand be heavy on them only upon mere necessity, when all other means have been tried unavailingly: God deals thus with his people.

Obs. 6. Gentle means rejected, aggravate sin. As now, if you can bring gifts to a man, you can quickly blind his eyes: we have found that man's nature, even in the place of justice, loves gifts; they are the cords of men, suitable to their natures indeed. Now God does thus (as I may so speak) bring gifts; but if God shall not prevail with his gifts, this will be a great aggravation of your sin.

Obs. 7. Always preserve the honour of inferiors. It is a rule that will be very helpful to those that have young ones to bring up; though the fault be great, yet put them not to so much shame before others, as they shall have no esteem or honour to lose, they will grow desperate then; and so long as the bridle of shame is on them, you may keep them from much evil. And this is the reason that your gaol-birds never almost come to any good; why? because they have no honour to lose, all is gone already, and therefore they grow desperate. Nothing is more suitable to a man's nature to deter from evil, than the fear of the loss of respect and of honour; and therefore the very doom of the damned at the day of judgment is thus expressed, they shall rise "to shame and everlasting contempt," Dan. xii. 2. "To shame," that is as much against human nature as any thing; and therefore you that have to deal with men, take heed how you deal; always keep such a hand over them, as those that are under you may see that they have yet some honour to lose; do not deprive yourselves of such a means to bridle your children or servants. Some of you have for your servants persons of good birth in this city, divers have children well born and well educated; use them accordingly, draw them with correspondent cords: if you be of meaner birth and education, and had hard breeding, and were drawn by iron cords, do not think to deal thus with others who have had better breeding than yourselves, but deal with them fairly, with due consideration of what suits their quality and condition.

Obs. 8. How will the shame and confusion of men be aggravated hereafter, who disregarded God's using them in an honourable manner! This is the way to bring shame and confusion upon you for ever, as hereafter men and angels, and your own consciences, shall say: Just it is with God to punish me with eternal shame and confusion; why? for God had respect to me when I lived, and dealt with me honourably, seeking to draw me with the cords of a man; and it is just that now he should give me my portion among devils and reprobates, and that he should no more regard me as a creature, but rather hate and abhor me as a devil, for I would not regard his dealing with me as a man. This will justify God in that wrath which will one day fall on you.

Obs. 9. Not to be drawn to our duty but by violence and strength, is bestial. Brute beasts can roar and cry out when the pain is upon them; and so it is with many men, they never cry out of their sins, never fear God, never yield to his hand, but only when his strokes are upon them, then they cry out and bellow like beasts. Well, God delivers them; but they turn to their lusts as formerly, and as soon as they are delivered forget their vows and covenants with God; they sin again, and God comes upon them again, and again they bewail their sins: Oh that we had spent, say they, our time in praying, and in lamenting our sins, which we spent in such and such company! This is when God's hand is upon you, and the effect of the hearing of his word: to be drawn by the word is to be like a man; not to be moved but by blows evidences a bestial and brutish heart. Charge yourselves with this brutishness of spirit; I fear some of you have cause to say, In all the course of my life my heart has never yielded to God, but just when his strokes have been upon me. I beseech you, brethren, deal with God like men; God deals with you like men.

Obs. 10. The Lord deals with us suitably to our nature. "I drew them with cords of a man." O let us then deal with God, as far as we are able, suitably to his nature. What! does God regard us as men? let us then regard him as God, let us glorify God as God. When the Lord has to deal with us he considers we are men; when we have to deal with God, let us consider he is God; and as the Lord is pleased to condescend to us as men, O let us labour to ascend to him as God.

"With bands of love."

"Bands," that is, thick cords; not only with "cords," as before, but thick cords, so כַּבְדֵי here translated "bands" signifies; for its primitive עֲבָרָה means to wreath, and to thicken with wreathing; as you see those that make cords and lines, take their hemp and form one wreath, and then another, twisting many of them together, so as to make a strong cord.

"With bands of love;" that is, with such bands as have many wreaths in them, many plies joined together to make them a strong cord, a cord as strong as a cart-ropes: so I find the same word used in Isa. v. 18, where it is said, "Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart rope!" The word וּבְעֵבֵר here translated "cords," is the same that occurs in the former part of our verse, the "cords of a man;" but now the other, "and sin as it were with a cart rope," is the same word here rendered, the "bands of love;" that is, a thick rope, as of a cart, with many wreaths in it: so that though the former word, "cords," in your English, seems to imply as much as the latter, "bands," yet, according to the Hebrew, this is especially emphatical. As indeed when we come now to open the "bands of love" with which God did draw this people, we shall find many cords wreathed and twisted together to bind them fast to God. An expression somewhat parallel to this occurs in Jer. xxxi. 3, "With loving-kindness have I drawn thee."

I drew them "with bands of love;" that is, I used them in a loving way; if love could have gained them, could have overcome their enmity, and bound them to me, they have wanted no love, saith God: whereas their sins deserved the bands of iron, instead, they have had "bands of love."

If you ask me what were those "bands of love," by which God drew this people of Israel unto himself, I answer,

1. Separation from all other people. God did wonderfully separate this people from all the nations in the world, to be a people unto himself, and that out of love; and this was a great fruit of love, and a strong wreath to bind them, that God should set his heart upon this to be his own people above all other people in the earth. In Exod. xxxiii. 16, "Wherein shall it be known that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight? is it not in that thou goest with us?" (saith he) "shall we be separated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth." It is in your books, only, shall be separated, but נִפְרָדִי signifies wonderfully separated, we shall be wonderfully separated from all the nations of the earth. Indeed the Lord did wonderfully separate this people from all the nations of the earth, and this only out of love, and not from any excellency he saw in them. "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people," Deut. vii. 7.

Obs. 11. The Lord does not always stand upon the greatest number. Indeed our argument is, that so many go in such a way, and so few in another, and so surely God is most like to approve of that which the majority adopt. No, God does not always stand upon number: "I did," saith he, "not choose you because you were more in number than any people, for you were the fewest of all people;" therefore it was only love that made the Lord choose this people at first, and separate them from other nations.

2. Election of the parents and their seed. "I chose you, and your seed also." And this was a great mercy: If I had but only set my heart upon yourselves, it had been somewhat, but it was upon you and your seed, so as to bring you and your seed into covenant with me. There are two twists (as I may so say) in this band of love, that he should choose them and their seed, and bring them both into covenant, for thus you have it in Deut. iv. 37, "Because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them;" and in Ezek. xvi. 8, the text saith, "Thy time was the time of love; and I swore unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine." The time was a time of love; and that made the Lord to enter into covenant with this people. God showed it was a time of love indeed, that he would take such a people as this was, and enter into covenant with them.

3. God's setting his heart upon them to delight in them. I made them my portion, my inheritance, my treasure, the dearly beloved of my soul, my glory, a royal diadem to myself; I could show you Scripture for every one of these expressions: Deut. vii. 6, "The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself;" a "special people," and he gives them all those epithets. Surely these are "bands of love."

4. Pitying them in their afflictions. If so be at any time they were in any afflictions, I pitied them, and looked upon them with the eye of mercy, and relieved them, and redeemed them out of their afflictions: "In his love and in his pity he redeemed them," Isa. lxiii. 9.

5. God engaged all his attributes for their good. I set on work all my wisdom, and my power, and my mercy, to do them good above all nations, working great wonders for them. Now for this we shall not need to cite any particular passage, the whole story of God's carrying them from Egypt through the wilderness to Canaan, and there providing for them, is a sufficient testimony. So, in Isa. lxiii. 9, we named before God's redeeming of them, he adds this too, "and carried them all the days of old." The Lord never was so glorious in his power towards any people as towards them, the right hand of his power and excellence was stretched out for them, Exod. xv.

6. A continued watchful eye over them. "With bands of love." I had a continual watchful eye over them and their land, mine eye was upon their land where they dwelt for good, above all other lands that were upon the earth: "A land which the Lord thy God careth for: the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year," Deut. xi. 12. Canaan was a land that God cared as little for as any place of the earth before his people came into it, a land wherein God was as much dishonoured as in any other place; but now when his people came into it, it is a land that his eye is upon, that the Lord takes care of, from the beginning of the year to the end of the year: such respect did God show to his people.

7. He gave them his oracles, the revelation of his will. This was another notable fruit of the love of God to this people. "In Judah was God known: his name was great in Israel." "He showeth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them," Psal. cxlvii. 19, 20. This was a notable privilege that Israel had above all other people. In Rom. iii. 1, it is asked, "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?" In ver. 2, the apostle replies, "Much every way:" the Jew has much advantage every way above all other people of the earth. Why, wherein? "Chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God." Other men had the book of nature, they could see God's name, as it were, written in the characters of that book; yea, but the special things of God, the counsels of God concerning the eternal state of the children of men, were not then revealed: but saith he, I gave to this people my oracles, I revealed to them those counsels of mine concerning man's eternal state, I opened to them my whole heart and soul, all that I would have known to the children of men for that time I opened to them. Oh this is a band of love indeed, to have the oracles of God committed to a people.

8. The Messiah was to come of them. This was the eighth twist (as it were) in these "bands of love," to make them a great cable to bind them unto God. I set my heart so upon, as to have the Messiah to come from them, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed. I rather chose this people than another to have my Son to be born of them, to be of their stock.

9. A law, the sum of which was nothing but love. I showed before, that the law of God had strength of reason in it, and so God "drew them with the cords of a man," that is, his law was rational. So here he draws them "with bands of love," gives them a law, the sum of which was nothing but love, as thus: What is the sum of the first and second table of the law? The sum of the first table is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul;" and the sum of the second table is, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," so that love is the sum of the whole law.

10. God gave them more than any else could offer. He outbid all temptations. Whatsoever good, pleasure, delights, honour they could expect in following any thing else, I showed them that they might have all these and much more in myself; there was nothing they could have in following after any of their false worship, but I made it appear that they might have as much in myself, I outbid all temptations in order to encourage them in my ways. Accordingly, throughout the whole Scripture, we find the Lord propounding himself to his people as a lovely object, on purpose to draw their hearts away from all other things which might seem to be lovely, that he might have the whole soul to himself.

11. He heard all their prayers. Whensoever they were in any want, if they did but cry to me, I heard them. "What nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for?" saith Moses, Deut. iv. 7.

12. And lastly, I have done so much for them, that it cannot be conceived that I should have done more. "What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it?" Isa. v. 4. Let any one speak what more love they could conceive possible from a God to his people than I have shown. So that put all these together, and you see how God drew this people "with bands of love." Now this for the explanation: our observations from hence are,

Obs. 12. Love has strong bands; yea, "strong as death," Cant. viii. 6. None are so strongly bound together as friends that are bound in love. The bands of nature are not so strong as the bands of love. "A friend is nearer than a brother," saith the Scripture. The bands of love are the strongest bands, they are a twisted band. For,

1. Love is in itself a lovely thing to behold, there is an amiableness in love to attract the eye and the heart. So Cant. vii. 6, "How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love, for delights!" How fair and how pleasant is love! Take "love" for the affection of love, it is fair and pleasant for delights; and when the beloved is called by the name "love," it shows that love is very amiable and very beautiful.

2. Love has in it much sweetness, much power to insinuate itself into the heart. Base, adulterous love we know has a great deal of power to insinuate itself into the heart; so in Eccl. vii. 26, the hands of the whorish woman are called "bands;" how much more attractive power must dwell in true, gracious love!

3. Love is generative, love has a great generative power to beget love. Augustine saith, Nulla est major ad amorem provocatio, quam prevenire amando. Aug. There is no greater provocation to love, than to begin to love. Love can draw iron hearts. Magnes amoris amor, love is the loadstone of love, it will draw love, and, wherever it is, beget love.

4. Where love is got into the soul it commands all the faculties and understanding. Look, what a man loves his powers are exercised about: if a man love his sin, his understanding will work for it; oh what subtle arguments will men have for the sin they love! a man's heart will be very subtle to argue for the object of its regard. So, on the contrary, when once the Lord has taken the heart with love, this love commands the understanding, and then all reasonings are for God, and the soul hearkens to none that are against him, or against his ways. If a man's heart be taken with love to a woman, he will hear nothing against her; but if his mind be alienated from her, then every report against her he will readily receive, and even aggravate to the uttermost. So when a man's heart is taken with the things of God and of religion, it will hear nothing against them; but if the ways of God cease to please, then they are glad if they can hear any thing that makes against them. Love commands all the faculties of the soul, the understanding and the thoughts; it commands the will and affections; it commands the body, and estate, and liberty; it commands all that a man has, or is, or can do. Love has the absolute commanding power of all; oh! love has strong bands.

5. Love makes all services for the beloved delightful; it not only commands, but renders the obedience easy: "I will rest in my love, and rejoice over them with singing," saith God. When the heart is once taken with love, I say, it not only does that which is good for the object of its regard, but does it with delight.

6. Love knows not any bounds, it never sets itself any limits, but would even infinitely prevail.

7. In its service love knows no weariness. The soul is never weary in the actings of love. Men that love their pastime will sit up all night and never be tired; so with those who love the ways of God, though the flesh may be weak, yet the spirit flags not.

8. Love is strong, so that it stands out against all oppositions, nothing can prevail against it. "Love is strong as death." "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it," Cant. viii. 6, 7.

9. Love rejoices in suffering; not only delights in doing, but delights in suffering. If one that loves another shall suffer for him whom he loves, he will rejoice in those sufferings.

10. And lastly, Love seeks not its own, suffers not itself to be itself, (as it were,) to be at its own disposal. The heart once taken with love is no longer its own, but gives itself into the possession of that which it loves. Join all these together, and you may see that love has strong bands.

Obs. 13. Let us do as God does; that is, labour to cast the bands of love upon those with whom we have to deal. It is God's way to bind his people to himself, "I drew them with bands of love." Then, saith God, I have enough, I have them secure enough, if I get them within the bands of love. Oh, if you would draw any to you, let it be by love. You that are ministers, and especially appointed to the work of drawing others to God, what should you do? Open the love of God to them, present the grace of the gospel to souls, labour to work upon their hearts by all the mercies of God; by the mercy of God tendered to them, received by them, and bestowed upon them: there is no such way to draw souls to God as this. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," Mark i. 15, that is, the preaching of the gospel. The first of all Christ's sermons, and of his disciples', was, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." As if he should say, O sirs, look about you, consider your ways; there is a glorious kingdom now at hand, a kingdom of righteousness and mercy, wherein the glory of the grace of God is revealed to the children of men in another way than ever formerly. This is the way to bring men to repentance. True, it is good to use all means, to show the greatness, and the justness, and the holiness of God, and the like; but the prevailing argument above all to bring men to repentance is, that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and indeed we would do so if we considered that repentance is a gospel grace; it comes not by the law, the law recognises it not, but the gospel, and therefore to present the love of God to the children of men as manifested in the gospel, is the way to draw to repentance. We have a notable story in the Book of Martyrs, as also in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History: John the apostle having committed a young man who was very hopeful to the care of a bishop, the youth afterwards proved to be very wicked, associated himself with thieves, and so became in time the captain of a company of thieves and robbers; with them he lived in the mountains, wholly bent on slaughter, murder, and extreme cruelty. After this, John comes to this bishop, and bids him restore to him the charge which he and Christ had committed to his custody; whereupon the elder, looking down with a heavy countenance, sobbing and sighing, said, He is dead. John inquiring when, and by what kind of death, he answered, He is dead to God, for he is become the captain of a company of thieves in such a place. The apostle then, rending his garments in great sorrow, said, I prepare me a horse, and let me have a guide. And so he rode in haste, and, being come to the place, is stopped by the thieves' watch. The apostle neither flies nor resists, but saith, For this purpose came I hither, bring me to your captain. He, in arms, stood awaiting his approach; but when he perceived that it was John, he was struck with shame, and fled away. The old man, forgetful of his years, pursues him flying, and cries, My son, why fliest thou from me thy father, unarmed and old? O son! tender my case; I be not afraid, as yet there remains hope of salvation, I will undertake for thee with Christ. And thus he runs after him, crying, that yet there was hope of mercy and pardon, and that he would die for him. He, hearing this, first stood still, turning his countenance to the ground, next shook off his armour, then trembled for fear, and wept bitterly; so that this "band of love," this affectionate concern of the apostle, broke his heart, and he returns back and falls weeping upon the neck of John, and became afterwards an eminent Christian.

Whatever may be thought of this story, yet certainly there are no such bands as these of love to draw the hearts of people to God. Have you to deal with stony hearts? the way is to lay them upon the soft pillow of the gospel, and so you may break them. Lay a stone upon a stone, and it starts from you and does not break; but if you lay it upon a pillow, you may presently break it with a hammer. The word is compared to a hammer; yea, but we must labour to lay the hearts of people upon the pillow (as it were) of love, upon the grace of God in the gospel, that is the way to subdue them. None are so bound to God as those who are bound to him by love: those that are bound to God by fear, unmixed with love, their bands will not hold, they will seek quickly to break through their restraints; none (I say) that are held to God by the hands of fear alone, but will seek after any occasions to break those bands, and if they can but get any opportunity, they will, and commonly at last do, break through them: but now, those who are held by bands of love, are bound for ever unto God.

Obs. 14. When men cast off the sweet of their sin by the sweet of the love of God, then they will never return to their sin again. If it be only the bitterness of the law, and its punishment, that makes them cast off sin, they will be ready to turn to their sin again; but when it is cast out by the sweet of love, when one sweet enters for another, such hold on their way. Austin, speaking of a sweet of sin, saith, Thou, Lord, didst cast out those sweetnesses, and thou didst enter in thyself instead of them, who art more sweet than any pleasure whatsoever. And it was from hence that he held on so in his way, because God, casting out the sweet of sin, instead thereof did himself enter into his soul. Oh, said he then, how sweet it is to want those sweetnesses! No marvel though grace be so persevering, and we read so much of perseverance, especially in the times of the gospel, because that there are none truly converted to God, but have that sweet come into their souls through love, which is more delightful to them than all the sweet they had by sin before.

Never be afraid, you whom God is beginning to turn to himself, never be loth to part with any sweetness you had in the ways of sin, for by turning to God you shall find a thousand times more in God and his ways. Oh, they are things that you love, and you are loth to part with them; yea, but when you are turned to God, God will be as lovely to you as ever any thing in the world was. If the ice be but broken over-night by the husbandman, when he comes the next day he finds it frozen up again; but let the sun dart on it his warm beams, and then it runs down in streams: so the breaking of the heart by the terrors of the law, is but like the breaking of the ice with a pole by the husbandman to give the cattle drink; but when the love of God comes to the heart, then the corruptions of the heart dissolve, even as the ice dissolves when the warm beams of the sun rest upon it.

The way, therefore, to gain the hearts of men is by love. And we should the rather do it, because it is the great design of God in the gospel, to manifest his love to the children of men; he has in it opened his heart, and the treasures of his love. What is the gospel, but the manifestation of the treasures of the love of God? those eternal loving-kindnesses of God towards mankind are all displayed in the gospel; and no minister can be a faithful minister of the gospel, who does not endeavour to open this heart-love of God to the children of men in Jesus Christ. Oh! it is a pleasant work to be a minister of the gospel in this respect, to be always searching into the treasures of love, and to array them before souls to win them unto God.

And then, likewise, if you have to deal with men, you must labour to draw them with the bands of love. In Phil. ii. 1, 2, "If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love," saith the apostle. Oh! let it be through love that you come to be "like-minded;" and do not think to force men into the same mind, by using bitter language and expressions to them if they differ in judgment from yourselves. But if there be any love, be of the same mind; labour to get into one another's hearts, if you would do good one to another. A minister, if he would do good to his people, must labour to get into their hearts, that the people may love him: therefore it has been observed, that your wrangling ministers and bitter men, who, if they be but crossed in any thing, presently vent their own bitterness, never do any good at all; but those that are willing to deny themselves, and to suffer for the cause of the gospel, prevail most. So, if you would do good to any of your kindred, do what you can to get into their hearts; labour to win their love, and so you may be a means to draw them to the ways of God: if once they be persuaded that you love them, you may then reprove any thing that is evil in them, and persuade them to any thing that is good, they take nothing ill from you. Therefore men of sour and bitter spirits labour under a great disadvantage in compassing their designs; if they speak any thing, though never so good, yet is it rejected, because that people think it proceeds not from love. But on the other side, let one of a sweet and loving disposition speak never so harshly, yet the party will take it well, because he knows he loves him. Oh! these "bands of love," my brethren, they are mighty strong. When you meet together in any society, if you would effect your object, do not seek to get your will by wrangling and frowardness, but by "bands of love." I confess there are some of such perverse spirits, that the more advances are made, the further they recede, they have even lost all ingenuousness; but if you have to deal with men whom you believe to be gracious and upright, then do not think to gain any thing from them but by love.

These "bands of love," in the text, the devil seeks to break; his great design is, to make men have hard thoughts of God and his ways, to make them believe that God hates them, and that though they have some good things from him for the present, yet that the heart of God is not towards them; and so he labours to make a separation between the soul and God. In like manner he strives to break the "bands of love" between Christian and Christian. That was a fearful judgment which we read of in Zech. xi. 14, when the staff that was called "Bands" was broken, intimating, as a judgment, the disruption of the brotherhood between Judah and Israel, and the ruin attendant on their rejection of Christ. When the staff of "Beauty," "the covenant which God had made with all the people," was broken, the "other staff, even Bands," "the brotherhood between Judah and Israel," was "cut asunder."

My brethren, never were the "bands of love" more broken among Christians than they are now. We read of "bands of love," but what is become of them? They are broken. They were in former times twisted in so many wreaths, (as I told you the original signifies,) that one would have thought they could never have been broken; but now, on every occasion, we find they snap asunder. Oh how justly might God bind us with iron bands, seeing that the "bands of love" will not bind us! God has cut the cords of divers of our yokes asunder, and has broken the bands of the oppressor, and now, behold, we break the "bands of love."

Oh! unworthy wretches that we are, we look with a jealous eye one upon another, every one shifting for himself, there are no "bands of love" in our hearts. Of the wicked it is said in Scripture, "there are no bands in their death," that is God's patience; but woe to us, we live without bands! and that results from our sin, and the wrath of God upon us. In Eccl. iii. 8, it is said, there is "a time to love." When is the time? Certainly, if ever there were a time to love, this surely is it.

O Divine love! whither art thou gone? hast thou left the earth as unworthy of thy beauty and glory? Oh that thou wouldst come again into the hearts of the saints, and bind them together! The want of the "bands of love" every one complains of; Oh those soul-refreshing and soul-ravishing meetings that we were wont to have! But, especially, we find the bands of public love quite gone, and quite broken: read but over 1 Cor. xiii., and see the effects of love there, and by that you will find the "bands of love" quite gone. Love, the scripture tells us, "thinketh no evil," it puts the best interpretation possible on all things. Now surely there is great want of love amongst us, that when men, in the uprightness and sincerity of their hearts, desire to find out the mind and will of God, and that merely out of conscience, because they dare not go any further than they see the mind of God go before them, therefore they shall be judged to be a stiff-necked people, and to be the great hinderers of reformation. Is this the best interpretation that possibly can be made of things? Can there be no other grounds why they differ from their brethren, but merely stiff-neckedness? how if it shall be owned by Jesus Christ at the great day, that it was out of sincerity, because they desired to know the mind of Jesus Christ fully, and yet they could not see what their brethren say they did? We should put on every thing the best possible interpretation. Love "hoped all things," and "beareth all things;" now for such public striking against any such forbearance, and crying out that we would have a toleration of all things in religion; for this is their great argument, whereas they know in their consciences that their brethren do join with them in the doctrinal part and in the main points of religion, and the things wherein they differ are matters of no such great moment, but may be forborne with peace enough if men's hearts were peaceable and still; now to infuse that into the people's heads, that if forbearance be shown in any thing, there must be a toleration of all things, surely this is not a fruit of love, this is not that which the Holy Ghost saith, that love bears all things. I am loth to proceed, lest it should serve as an occasion of stirring up any spirits, and so hindering the fruit of love: let me say, on the contrary, there may be too eager censure the other way, that is, we may too readily accuse such as are of a different way and judgment, that they do it altogether out of their self-ends and self-aims. I verily believe, that those brethren on the other side who do differ, may be conscientious in their way, and do it out of zeal to God, and to what they apprehend to be truth; we should apprehend one another so, if we see corruption of heart manifested in nothing else but merely in the judgments and opinions. Now if both could but thus judge each of other, that they both are upright in what they pursue; one side imagines that their party follows God's mind, and the other that the side which they espouse is the Lord's side: let us judge now that they do it in uprightness, except it appears some other way, then we should quickly close and join hearts together, if we had such upright opinions one of another: the more it is the design of the devil to break those bands of brotherhood and of love, the more should we labour to unite together; we should counterminimize Satan.

And you who are superiors, labour you to gain your inferiors by love. Do not say of them, They are of untoward dispositions, and how can my heart be towards them to love them? Oh! none of your inferiors are more untoward to you than you are to Christ; and Christ, if he should not love you because of your untowardness, what would become of you? Now consider this, when your servants and children are untoward, Why should that hinder love, whereas my untowardness does not hinder the love of Christ to me? I remember to have read of Monica, Austin's mother, that some of her neighbours who had Christian husbands wondered how she and her husband, who was a heathen, managed to live so lovingly together. Our husbands, said they, are Christians, and yours a heathen, and yet you live more lovingly with him than we do with our husbands. She answered them, It may be, when your husbands do any thing that provokes you, you are presently froward with them; but I labour to overcome my husband by love, and so to gain his heart to me, and thereby we live so lovingly together; Christianity teaches me to perform the duties of a wife to my husband, though he be a heathen. I verily believe there are many godly couples, who for want of love live worse than when one yoke-fellow is carnal. You will say, How can that be? Yes, though there be godliness, yet there may be such frowardness and passion as may cause wonderful disturbance: but on the other side, where there is godliness and love, there is such an overcoming with love, that though the man be wicked and never so harsh, yet, having the nature of a man in him, he will be overcome by love. Would you then be united more than you have ever yet been? Labour to cast the bands of love one upon another; let the husband study how to overcome his wife with love, and so the wife the husband, and then there will be a sweet union indeed. And so for masters and servants, there should be love there to unite one to another: though the master be above the servant, yet the master should account his servant's regard a happiness: there is not such a distance between you and your servants, as between God and you. Oh! it is a sweet thing when a man can say in his family, I bless God, all my family love me; and whatsoever they do, they do it out of love to me. It may be you are harsh towards your servants, and you will make them do what you command them to do, and they dare not do otherwise: yea, but what is that? do your servants love you? do they do all for you out of love? you might have as much and a great deal better obedience from your servants than you have, if it sprang from love. And so likewise in a family, when one servant loves another: as it was said of David in 1 Sam. xviii. 22, "all his servants love thee," all Saul's servants did love David; so servants should labour to live so in families that all the other servants should love them.

But you will say, They are so wicked, how can I hope to have love from them?

Yes, though they cannot love thee because thou art godly, yet godliness has something in it common to the excellency of man's nature.

Yea, and magistrates should labour to gain those subject to them by love. As the greatest in a family, if he be a lord, or an earl, should not think it too much to gain a servant by love; so those intrusted with the greatest power in government, should not think it too much to gain the affections of their meanest subjects. We see it was thus with David, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, "Then David the king stood up upon his feet, and said, Hear me, my brethren, and my people." What a sweet expression respecting a great prince! "Then David the king stood up upon his feet, and said, Hear me, my brethren, and my people;" he did not sit down magisterially, and say, My people, and you that are my subjects and servants, I command you to do thus and thus; but he stands up to them, and saith, "Hear me, my brethren, and my people." This was a way to gain the hearts of people to him. You know Absalom sought in a false way to steal away the hearts of people by a gentle carriage. I have read of John the Second, of Portugal, that he chose for his emblem a pelican, because when her young have been bitten with serpents, she feeds them with her own blood, and thereby cures them: thereby he would testify his readiness to let out his blood for the good of his subjects, for the healing of his subjects; he would not feed upon his subjects' blood, but he would rather let out his own blood for their good. This is the commendation of a prince, not to seek to feed upon his subjects' blood, and to raise up his honour and prerogative by shedding it; but to love them so as to be willing to let out his own blood for their good, if required. The maxim that some have laboured to infuse into princes,

I had rather be feared than be loved, is a maxim beseming only tyranny, and no way suitable to an ingenuous mind.

Certainly that man, be he what he will, who is actuated by such a principle, is a man of a sordid and base spirit; a man of a generous, ingenuous mind would rather be beloved than feared. Let every man seek to gain another by love. If you strive to gain any but by love,

1. You are not likely to prevail.

2. If you do prevail, there will be more previous trouble than fruition will repay.

3. When you do prevail, and men do as you would have them, they dare not do otherwise; yes, but they hate you: what good is it for a man to have his will upon another, if in the mean time he hate him?

4. If you do not prevail by love, they will do no more than just needs must. And this is the reason, indeed, why hypocrites are hide-bound toward God, why they do so little for him; God has never gained their hearts by love, but only by fear, and therefore they will do no more for God than of necessity they must; whereas (as I said before) love never propounds bounds.

5. If you do not get them by love, they watch for all opportunities to fling off. Now what a poor gain is this, to gain one with a deal of trouble, and for him to do what I would have him, and yet to hate me, and to do no more than needs must, and then to watch for all opportunities to appear against me! Wherefore, my brethren, to close this, let us follow after and provoke one another to love; you will find sweetness in your own love, sweetness in the very exercise of it, and sweetness in the fruits of others' love.

Obs. 15. As love has such bands in it, let us make use of the love of God to bind our hearts to him. You have heard that love has bands; you have heard too that we should do as God does. Is this then God's way? Oh! let us make use of all the love that ever God has shown to us to gain our hearts to him.

This would be a large theme to speak of, if we should attempt to open to you what the love of God has been to you, how much love God has shown to the nation, and to ourselves, to gain our hearts. Oh the many twists of this cord! it is a strong cord indeed to bind us to God. This is that which God seeks by all his love, to work our hearts to love.

Not to speak now of the love of God to you as to creatures, nor as to men; but to speak a little of his love to you as you are saints. I shall show you very briefly what strong cords of love God has cast upon you, to gain your hearts to love him. God's love, then, to you is,

1. Eternal. Before ever you were born the bowels of God yearned towards you (as I may so speak with holy reverence). God was twisting these bands of love from all eternity that he might gain your hearts; and thinking that at such a time such and such persons shall live upon the earth, I will make preparation by such bands of love now as, when revealed to them, shall unite and fasten them close to myself. It was love from eternity. Oh the transactions that were between the Father and the Son from all eternity to manifest love to your souls! the great counsels (I say) that were transacted between the Father and the Son before the world was, were about these your bands of love.

2. Elective and separating. When he left many thousands, he set his heart upon you. Mal. i. 2, "Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob." So, wert not thou of such a family? and yet thou seest how God has cast off a great part of that family, and yet has he loved thee! Wert not thou such a one's brother, such a one's sister, that remained wicked and ungodly, and, it may be, died so? and yet God has loved thee; he has passed by so many great ones in the world, and so many of thy kindred, and rather pitched his love upon thee. It is a love of choice, and therefore might the rather gain thee to thy God.

3. Free. "I will love them freely," Hos. xiv. 4. "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people," Deut. vii. 7. God there would manifest his love to his people to gain their hearts to him: "The Lord did not set his love upon you," saith he, "because you were more in number; but," as in ver. 8, "because the Lord loved you." It is a strange mode of arguing, "The Lord did not set his love upon you because you were more in number;" but the Lord did set his love upon you "because he loved you." He could go no higher; there can be no other reason why the Lord should love you, but because he did love you. We are wont to say, It is a woman's reason to say, I will do such a thing because I will do it. Now if any of you would have a reason why God loved you, why thus, He loved me because he loved me. The Lord did not set his love upon you for this reason; but he did set his love upon you because he loved you; so it is a free love. Oh let the freeness of it be another ingredient, so as to bind your hearts unto him.

4. God so loved you that he gave his Son for you. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son," John iii. 16. Sometimes it has been in the thoughts of men, whether there might not be more worlds than this our world. Certainly God in his infinite power might make a thousand worlds more glorious than this, such worlds that the meanest creature in them might be as high in excellency above the sun, as the sun is above a piece of earth. But now this we may know, let there be never such excellent creatures made, they cannot have a greater fruit of love than mankind has from God. Oh! this is the love of God to mankind, and calls aloud to the children of men to love God; here is a fruit of love beyond that shown to angels, for the Lord took not upon him the nature of angels, but the nature of man.

5. He has given himself too, as well as his Son. Not only given the Second Person in the Trinity, but himself. He does not think it enough to give heaven and earth to thee to be thy portion, but he will make himself thy portion, he will be thy God. You would think it a great matter if God should say, Well, all this world I will give for thy portion; yea, that I may give thee a testimony that I love thee, I will make another world for thy sake, and make thee the lord of it all: but in that God has given thee his Son, and given thee himself, this is a greater degree of love; and the soul of man, were it so enlarged as it might be, yea, so as grace does enlarge the hearts of the saints, such a soul would say, Lord, what wilt thou give me, if thou givest me not thy Son, if thou givest me not thyself? though I be less than the least of thy mercies, yet, except I have thyself as my portion, all else is not sufficient for me. Well, saith God, that thou mayst know that my heart is set upon thee for good, I will give thee my Son, I will give thee myself and my Spirit. Oh, what love is this to the children of men, that ever we should live to have our ears filled with such a sound from heaven!

6. God so loves his people, that, in comparison of his saints, he cares not what becomes of all the world. Thus, Isa. xliiii. 4, "I have loved thee; therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life." If thy case be so that it shall not be well with thee without great evils that shall come upon the generality of the children of men, and people, and nations; I do not so much care for them, (saith God,) my heart is upon you, so much so, that, in comparison of you, I care not what becomes of all the world. Oh the love of God to his saints!

7. A pardoning love. "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood," Rev. i. 5. You do not hear it said, that Christ has loved us and purchased great kingdoms for us, has made us lords, and earls, and countesses, and so loved us; no, but "unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." Now it is a good argument that the love of God is upon you, if you account this to be a great fruit of love, to wash you from your sins by the blood of Jesus Christ. Surely if he will do so much for you, as shall cost him so dear as his own blood, he loves you; the love of Jesus Christ broke through the difficulties, for when there were such transactions between the Father and Son about redeeming the soul, God said, If thou wilt take upon thee to deliver them from their sin, thou must come thyself and be made a curse for their sins. And Jesus Christ replied, Lord, thy will be done in it, yet let me deliver them from their sin; though I lose my life, though it cost me my blood, though I be made a curse, whatsoever it cost me, yet let their sins be washed from them. He has washed us from our sins at the price of his own blood. Oh the love of Christ to his saints! what bands of love have we here! I have seen some who, that they may twist and bind their cords the more fast, will wet them: the cords of the love of Jesus Christ are wet with his own blood.

8. A conforming love puts loveliness on the creature, even God's own nature. If one could say any thing greater than has been said, this, one would think, should be very high and great: for God so to love us, as to make us partakers of the Divine nature; so to love us, as to put his own life into us, to enable us to live the very same life as himself does; so to love us, as to put his own image upon us; oh, this is the love of God to his saints!

9. He loves thee with the very same love wherewith he loves Jesus Christ himself. Thus John xvii. 26, "That the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them," saith Christ to the Father. Oh to have the same love as that with which the Father loves Christ! Is not this a strong band to bind thy heart to God? If God had loved thee only so as to give thee an estate and honours here in this world, this were no other than the love which the reprobate may have; and will this love satisfy thee? Oh the difference between the love of God to his saints and the love of God to other men! he loves the great ones of the world, that are wicked, with no other than the love wherewith he loves a reprobate; but he loves the saints with the same love wherewith he loves his Son; and this love will bring thee one day to be one with the Father and with the Son: is it not then a strong band of love to gain thy heart to himself?

10. A love of communion. God delights in communion with his saints: God indeed does all this for his saints, puts the Divine nature and the life of God into them, and sets so much love upon them; why? that he might have a people to enjoy everlasting communion with him. I would fain, saith God, have some creatures that might live with me, to enjoy communion with me; that might live to see my face, and to behold all the glory that I intend to manifest to all eternity. O blessed God! hast not thou the angels that are with thee to enjoy thy glory, to have communion with thee? No, saith God, but I would have these poor creatures that are so low and mean in the world, I would have them raised up to enjoy communion with myself. This is the end of God's bestowing any grace upon his saints, it is that he might raise them to enjoy communion with him, and to delight in him, and he to delight in them; that he might have creatures to communicate the treasures of his goodness to, and that thou mightest communicate what thou art able to him. Surely Christ does not account himself full without his saints; and therefore you find in Eph. i. 23, that the church is called "the fulness" of Jesus Christ; and therefore he prays, "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am," John xvii. 24: I shall not account myself full except they be with me, and see my glory. Oh the love of Jesus Christ to his saints!

11. A sweetening and sanctifying love. Thou mayst see love in every thing; though thou hast now less of the creature than others have, yet thou hast it out of love; on all thy mercies thou mayst see the eternal love of God to thee. The Lord from all eternity saw that such a kind of life was the best calculated to further the eternal good he intended for me, and therefore he has chosen to place me in this condition. Oh how sweet may the life of any be when they can reason after this manner, Well, this condition in which now I am in, the Lord from eternity saw the fittest condition to work my heart to himself, and therefore it is that I am in this estate rather than another. And then thou findest daily by experience how the Lord has helped thee in thy straits, and heard thee in thy prayers, and answered thy desires. This I told you, in the opening of the text, was a fruit of love to the people of Israel, and so it has been with thee.

12. An overcoming love. God's love overcomes all our unworthiness, both before and after conversion. He foresaw all, yet still his love was not quenched toward thee, but saith the Lord, My love shall break through all. Many times you set your love upon some who prove untoward and unworthy, and you think with yourselves, Could I have but foreseen this untowardness they should never have had my love: but now the Lord foresaw all thy ill requitals, and yet it did not hinder the love of God towards thee.

13. In the love of God there is the love of all relations. As now, the love of a father towards a child; the Lord takes upon him the relation of a father: the love of a husband; the Lord takes upon him the relation of a husband: and the love of a friend too, a friend "that sticketh closer than any brother."

14. God's love is an everlasting and unchangeable love. This crowns all, his is a love that shall never be quenched. He that the Lord loves, he loves unto the end; "he will rest in his love," Zeph. iii. 17; Jer. xxxi. 3. If thou knowest that he has loved thee in his Son, thou hast hereby an "everlasting consolation;" let heaven and earth meet together, let there be what changes and alterations there will, yet there is "everlasting consolation" for thee, if thou knowest but this love of God, 2 Thess. ii. 16.

Now, my brethren, all this I have done that your hearts may be gained unto God. And what wilt thou do now? Wilt not thou now love the Lord thy God? shall not all this love of God to thee in Christ constrain thee? "The love of Christ constraineth us," saith the apostle, 2 Cor. v. 14. "O love the Lord, all ye saints;" if the Lord has thus loved you, love ye the Lord, all ye his saints. Then God is love himself, he is the element of love; and whither should love go but up to its kindred element? Air desires to be in its proper place; and earth will descend to its proper place: the proper place of love is God. God is (as it were) the element of love, for so the Scripture saith, "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God," 1 John iv. 16. O labour to be rooted and established in love: "That ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge," Eph. iii. 17—19. Being rooted in love, thereby ye come to comprehend with all saints the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. Neither the strength of natural parts nor learning so teach us the love of Christ as love; get but your hearts "rooted and grounded in love," and you will come to understand the glorious things of the gospel in another manner than ever you did. And mark what follows, "that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God." Had we not such an expression in Scripture, we should not dare to make use of it. What! for a poor creature to be filled with "God," to be filled with "the fulness of God," to be filled with "all the fulness of God?" This is the reason why Christians are so scant in their obedience, and empty in their spirits, because they are not acquainted with this "breadth, and length, and depth, and height" of "the love of Christ." O know that God prizes thy love, and is satisfied with nothing but thy love. In Cant. vii. 12, "There will I give thee my loves," saith the spouse. When thou comest to the ordinances to hear the word, to receive sacraments, or to prayer, yet if thou comest not to give the Lord Christ thy "loves," it is nothing; "There will I give thee my loves." Christ prizes love at a high rate; and that love which will serve for other things, certainly will not serve Christ. He loves thee too little (saith Augustine) who loves any thing besides thee, or will not love that thing for thee. You may love wife, and children, and friends, yea, but you must love them all for God; when you see any thing lovely in them, think it is but a beam of the loveliness of God. And thus I have endeavoured now to raise your hearts to God by love: the Lord has cast bands of love upon your souls; oh that, by the ministry of his word this day, these bands may be somewhat strengthened, that you may go away with your hearts more strongly than ever united to the love of God!

But there is one point more observable in these "bands of love" by which God draws people to himself.

The scope of the prophet here in mentioning these "bands of love," is to aggravate their sin; from whence,

Obs. 16. Nothing more aggravates sin than that it is committed against love. God has three bands to bind us to obedience.

1. The band of his law.
2. The bands of afflictions.
3. The bands of love.

But now to break the bands of the commandments, and the bands of afflictions, and the bands of love too, this aggravates sin very much.

O thou sinner! charge thy sin with this aggravation. What! sin against such a God, such love? Oh what a vile heart have I! Augustine saith, The spirit is too hard, which, though it will not bestow, yet will not requite love. O let not there be such a hardness in the spirits of the saints. Thou didst not begin with God to love, thou didst not begin to bestow love; be not so hard towards God as not to requite love. Do not see how base, adulterous love can gain upon men's hearts? what strong bands that love has! The giving of gifts and bribes, what bands they are to tie men's hearts, and hands, and tongues! And shall not the love of God, and the fruits of that love, be a stronger band to tie thy heart unto him? Nothing goes more to the heart of man or God than the abuse of love; a man can better bear the abuse of his money, the abuse of any thing, than of his love. God's Spirit is grieved with his saints: we do not read that the Spirit of God is grieved with the wicked; God may be "angry with the wicked every day," but not grieved; but when the saints sin against him the Spirit of God is grieved, because their sins are against love. When thou sinnest against God, the Lord looks upon thee, as Cæsar once upon Brutus: What! thou too, my son? What! thou whom I have so loved? What! break all those bands? When we read in the 2nd Psalm of the kings and princes of the earth, who said, "Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us," we think that is great rebellion; but for thou that professest thyself to be God's, it is a greater evil to break these "bands of love." O thou, my son, my child, thou on whom I have bestowed so much love, yet thou to sin against me! When thou art committing any evil, conceive with thyself as if God were looking upon thee, and pleading with thee, by all those fruits of his love that ever thou hast received from him; and wilt thou yet sin against him for all this? We read in Luke xxii. 61, 62, when Peter had sinned, Christ did but look upon him, and he "wept bitterly;" oh! Peter saw love in the looks of Jesus Christ; and therefore we know, when Christ afterwards came to him, he pleaded with him with this argument of love, "Lovest thou me?" and "lovest thou me?" Oh! when he saw the eyes of Christ so sparkling with love, and then considered that he had sinned against that Christ who had so loved him, had broken all those "bands of love," then "he went out, and wept bitterly." The word in Mark xiv. 72, is επιβάλων, breaking out in weeping; so it may imply the force employed in doing any thing; he did break out, break out in weeping, he was not able to bear it, his heart burst even in sunder, when he considered how he had burst asunder the "bands of love." What! after such manifestations of mercy and goodness, such warmings of heart in communion with Jesus Christ? O my soul! what canst thou find in any ways like God's ways? canst thou find the like love and the like sweetness in any as thou hast done in God? yet for all these unkind, unloving dealings, God follows thee with love, his heart is yet open unto thee. As a man may go from the sun, and yet still the beams of the sun follow and warm him; so the hearts of the saints do many times decline from God, yet they have the warm beams of love following after them to draw their hearts again to him. Oh! return, return into this bosom of infinite love, here thy soul may have everlasting embracings.

"And I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws, and I laid meat upon them."

Here is a fruit of love in delivering them from their bondage. As a husbandman who is merciful to his beast will not tire it too much with hard labour, but takes off the yoke, lifting it up with his hands, and gives it food; so did I, saith God, I did not tire Ephraim with labour and servitude. When you were in Egypt, and often afterwards when under your enemies' yokes, I freed you from your bondage; as the husbandman, when the beast has been ploughing and begins to be hot, lifts the yoke up to cool the neck that the beast may refresh itself.

"As they that take off the yoke on their jaws."

Because of some instruments, some bridle that was fastened to the yoke that was on their neck and put into their jaws. Therefore this phrase, "As they that take off the yoke on their jaws."

Luther on the place understands this of that spiritual ease which there is in the yoke of Jesus Christ; and so saith, The Lord by his Spirit helps us to obey; he does not only command, and tell us what to do, but assists us with his Spirit, and gives us power, and lifts up the yoke, and bears it together himself with us; and hence saith Christ, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light." Indeed it is an easy yoke in comparison of the law: the law saith, Do this, and live; do not, and die: the law takes advantage upon every infirmity, it admits not of endeavours without performances, it gives no strength to what it commands: but the yoke of Christ is easy; Christ "continues strength;" there is never a command without an appropriate promise of strength, as an artery that runs together with the veins. And Christ accepts of endeavours; his yoke is far easier than the yoke of the law.

We must not think this too far-fetched, because we find that the Holy Ghost in the New Testament interprets the beginning of this chapter concerning Christ, which we would never have thought to have been meant of Christ, "I called my son out of Egypt." Now if so be that God had an eye to Christ in the words, "I called my son out of Egypt," why should we not think that Christ might be also referred to, when he saith, "I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws;" I delivered them from the yoke which neither they nor their fathers could bear, and I brought on them the more easy yoke of the gospel?

But though the Holy Ghost may have had an eye to this, yet that which is primarily and literally meant is, the deliverance from oppression, I delivered them from the oppressions that were upon them. Whence then the observations are,

Obs. 17. Deliverance from oppression is a great mercy. Oh what ease is there in it! how does it cool our necks! "I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you go upright," Lev. xxvi. 13. We had once heavy yokes upon us, that made us stoop, we stooped under them; but through God's mercy these bands of our yokes are in a good measure broken, so that we may go upright; and woe to us if we go not upright now! In Ezek. xxxiv. 27, "They shall know that I am the Lord, when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them." My brethren, if ever God manifested himself to be the Lord towards us, it has been in breaking the bands of the yokes that were upon us, and in delivering us from those who served themselves of us. We were under a proud and cruel generation of men, that minded themselves, and cared not what became of the consciences, estates, liberties, or lives of men, if only they could have their humours and their lusts gratified; and what means could we see for the deliverance of ourselves from their yoke? But the Lord has appeared: and then, saith the text, "They shall know that I am the Lord;" if we did not know that God was the Lord before, yet now we may know him. And the truth is, such have been the wonderful works of God towards us in the breaking of our yokes, that methinks it were enough to convince an atheist: those of you who have been heretofore troubled with temptations of atheism, the strange ways of God towards this nation in freeing of us from the yokes which have been upon us, may convince you of a God, may make you say, Surely there is a God in heaven that beholds the ways of the children of men: "the Lord, he is God." Then "they shall know that I am the Lord."

Oh that upon the manifestation of God in this way of mercy we may come to know that God is the Lord! The Lord might have forced us to have known that he was the Lord by laying more grievous yokes upon us, by bringing us under more dreadful evils than we have ever yet experienced; but the Lord has rather been pleased to choose another way, to make us to know that he is the Lord by taking our yokes off from us. This God has done.

Obs. 18. To grow wanton after deliverance from yokes is very sinful. This arises naturally from the scope of the context here, which is, to aggravate their sin so much the more; as if he should say, I have taken off the yoke from your jaws, and yet now you are wanton, and kick and spurn with the heel against me. What! now when we come to have a little more liberty, and begin to feel our necks freed of those yokes that were upon them, shall we begin to frisk, and spurn, and kick, and that against God himself, who has taken the yoke from off us? Oh, this is very dreadful. What! to abuse our liberty from bondage to all manner of licentiousness in horrid and wanton opinions, in wicked and abominable practices? certainly this is an ill requital of this fruit of love, in lifting up the yoke from off our jaws. This is a very great evil which we are this day guilty of; if ever there were a people guilty of this evil, of kicking and spurning against God so soon as he has taken off the yoke from their jaws, then we are at this day. Could any have believed, if it had been revealed from heaven but six years since, that within six years this people of England should be delivered from those sore yokes under the burden of which they cried to heaven, yea, that the Lord would work in a miraculous way, to deliver them; and yet, upon their deliverance, there should be such wantonness, such horrid, blasphemous opinions, and wicked, licentious ways, even among the very professors of religion; could it have been believed? Certainly if our godly forefathers that were under the yoke, and that cried to God for deliverance, were to rise out of their graves now, and hear a full narration of all that liberty which God has granted to his people in England, in the breaking of all those yokes of tyranny, both in the civil and in the ecclesiastical state, they would presently think that they should see wonderful, glorious results from all this in England; but if, after conversing for a little time with men, they were to hear such monstrous opinions, and to see the extreme licentiousness and wantonness in the hearts of men, as expressed in their actions, they would be ready to spit in the very faces of their children, to disown with contempt those that now live in such times as the present. The wantonness of our hearts in abusing our deliverance is very evil in these respects:

1. It hardens our adversaries. Our former oppressors, the prelates and others, will not they say, (or do not you give them occasion to say,) Now you see what is the fruit of casting us out; was there such wantonness before? were there such horrid opinions when we had power? We kept down all such things, in our time of authority we could easily curb them; but you see what extravaganeies there are, how men run wild, as soon as our power is taken from us. By this means they are hardened: and others that are of a prelatial spirit are hardened, and begin to think, Surely the other is the better way. And indeed if this be a good argument, if the keeping men in union, and suppression of errors by violence, prove the truth of any way, or of any government, it may as well prove prelatial as any other, for we know that they kept men by violence from venting such notorious errors; but shall we, because there is not this tyranny upon us, be more erroneous, and more wanton in our spirits?

2. It darkens the glory of this great work of God.

The Lord has been pleased to magnify his name in the deliverance of these kingdoms from the yoke; now what should be the care of all the people of God, but to seek to magnify the great work of God, to make it beautiful and glorious before the eyes of all? But now, by this wantonness and licentiousness, men do darken the glory of God, and obscure its lustre and beauty. In Psal. cxlix. 4, the Lord promises to beautify the meek with salvation; "He will beautify the meek with salvation;" now the Lord has wrought so towards us as to beautify us with salvation, and indeed there is a great beauty in the salvation which he has wrought; but this does (I say) darken the glory of God, and takes away the beauty of the work of God in our salvation. What! has God done all this for us, that men might turn wanton, and run wild into monstrous opinions and blasphemies? Oh, woe to thee! how unfit art thou to live in such a time as this is, to darken the glory of such a glorious work as God has wrought for us here in England!

3. It deprives others of just liberty. It is on your account who are so wanton, and run so wild in your opinions and in the looseness of your lives, that the discreet, and wise, and holy, and peaceable, who desire to make use of their liberty in Christ, must be denied it for your sakes. Whatever denial they have of that liberty which they would use in a gracious and peaceable way for the honour of God, will one day be laid to your account, for by your wantonness it is occasioned.

4. It may bring the yoke on us again, or be the means of bringing others under heavier bondage.

5. It justly prejudices rational men against liberty, and inclines them to think that they shall do God good service by laying heavy yokes upon men who thus dishonour his name. If ever, instead of the great strings that have tied yokes upon you, you should have lesser strings, and these meaner instruments of oppression should be multiplied to tie still heavier yokes upon you, thank yourselves, you are the cause of it. "The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand," Lam. i. 14. The Lord may justly bind the yoke of your transgressions upon you. Oh that God would humble us for the abuse of our freedom from our yokes! Oh let us take heed of this, and say with ourselves, Surely this is not the use that we should make of our deliverance; no, but rather this use, we will rather so much the more willingly take the yoke of Jesus Christ upon us. In Exod. xii. 25, after the people of Israel were delivered from the yoke of Egyptian bondage, presently it is said, "ye shall keep this service;" speaking of the passover, that was to be kept upon their deliverance from Egypt, "ye shall keep this service." The word there for "service" is עֲבָדָה the same that is used sometimes for their service and bondage under the Egyptians; as if the Lord should say, You were once in service indeed, there was a service that the Egyptians required of you, a servile service it was, and your necks were under it; now I will work thus miraculously to deliver you from that servility, and you shall keep this my service, which is a great deal better than the service under your enemies. And indeed this should be the use; we were slaves to our adversaries, let us be willing now, seeing we are free-men, to be servants of Jesus Christ, and to take his yoke; but the growing wanton upon the removal of our yoke is a great aggravation of sin. "Because thou servest not the Lord thy God with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things; therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things: and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee," Deut. xxviii. 47, 48.

Obs. 19. Oppression of others after deliverance from oppression is a crying sin. If this be a mercy that we should bless God for, that we are delivered from the yokes of men, and the abuse of it in our wantonness be a great sin, then it must needs be an aggravation of our guilt, to begin to lay yokes one upon another. If it be the mercy of God to take off your yokes, we should seek to take the yokes off from our brethren, to make their ways as easy to them as we possibly can, and not devise means to pinch their consciences; conscience oppression of all oppressions is the most grievous. There was heretofore a generation of men, who studied what would pinch conscience most, and that which they found most likely to do so, they would urge to the uttermost upon men: this was devilish; I hope we have not many so vile as these were. Though such and such opinions and ways may serve our turn, we should consider whether they may not be burdensome to others.

Well, but though they be burdens, if they be truths, why should they not be urged?

Nay, suppose they be truths, yet, except they be necessary, let not men be instrumental in imposing them upon others: if a necessity exists, then no plea can be admitted. Some men, however, are so happy (if I may so call it) that they have a latitude in their judgments, that which way soever the times turn they can find out a distinction to help themselves, that so their fair necks should never come under a yoke: it is their singular good fortune that their judgments always suit with the times.

I will not condemn such men, for possibly it may be God gives them to see further than others do; but yet, by this they have ease: but now, were these men ingenuous, they should consider their brethren thus: I have a latitude, and I could conform myself to the complexion of the former times, as, now times are changed, I can to the present; but some others, whom I have reason to judge as faithful and as gracious as myself, have no such latitude; it falls out unhappily for them, for in former times their judgments could not suffer them to do what was enjoined them, they were fain to suffer, and to be deprived of estates, and livings, and whatsoever they had; well, now the times are changed, it happens that their judgments cannot conform to the alterations the changed times bring along with them; and yet surely this arises not from frowardness, nor perverseness, for take these men in all things else, I find them as conscientious, as spiritual, as myself. Alas! must they now suffer, and shall I add to their afflictions? shall my hand be used to lay the yoke on them and to press it hard? God forbid; I will rather study, though I will not yield any truth, but stand to defend whatever I am persuaded in my conscience is a truth, yet I will rather study as far as I possibly can to ease them, and to make their lives comfortable. I know God has given them ability and hearts to do him service, and it may be as much as I; oh why should they be hindered and discouraged in their work? I will study what latitude there may be for them. This were somewhat like, this were ingenuousness indeed, this would truly savour of a good spirit, and be a gracious testimony of your thankfulness to God for breaking off the yokes that were upon you. My brethren, when our yokes are taken away or lifted up, we must have regard to others as well as ourselves, and not think or say, Let them bear, let their necks bear; oh no, what are our necks more than theirs? If God pities his people and will lift up the yoke, let us do what we can to put under our hand to relieve others, although we bear somewhat ourselves. Some men glory in imposing burdens; but it is not such a glorious thing to lay yokes upon others, the glory is in lifting up the yoke from off them. This is the glory of God, to take off the yoke from the jaw and from the neck. Christ professes his "yoke is easy," his "burden is light;" oh! let not ours then be hard and heavy, if Christ's be easy. And especially in these days of our fasting and prayer, oh! let us be very careful to lift up the yoke from off our brethren as far as possibly we can without sin. "Is not this the fast?" (saith God) "that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?" Isa. lviii. 6. "Is not this the fast that I have chosen,—that ye break every yoke." And in the 9th verse, "Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am." If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke." Still mark how God urges this removal of the yoke, when you come to fast: Is this the fast that I require, to do thus and thus? no, saith he, but "to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke:" and again, if you shall do so, "Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am." God stands much upon this in the days of our fasting, that we lay no burdens and yokes upon our brethren, but that we do what we possibly can to take off yokes, that we may be able to appeal to God, Lord, thou knowest that I do as much as I can, and I pray that thou wouldst direct me in mine endeavours to render comfortable the lives of those whom I believe to be faithful and conscientious.

This is not to give liberty to every kind of licentiousness and blasphemy, but when I see that certain things may consist with godliness, and godly and peaceable men have many doubts among them, and especially seeing I hold these my present views but a short time, and did not see heretofore as now I do, I will do what I possibly can with a good conscience, that my brethren may enjoy thy ordinances in what liberty thou wilt afford unto them. This savours like the spirit of a Christian indeed.

And, likewise, you that are in any authority, seeing God accounts it his glory to take off the yoke from his people, O, be you tender towards them that are under you; as magistrates, as governors, as parents, as masters, lay not, my brethren, too heavy yokes on your children and servants: fathers should "not provoke their children to wrath," and masters should be gentle towards them that are under them, knowing they have also a Master in heaven. Give them therefore whatever liberty may consist without sin, even outward liberty; keep them not continually at work, but afford them some times of recreation and refreshment. True, your holy-days are taken away, but surely there is no such likely way to bury them in oblivion, that they should never be thought of again, as to have some set times for servants and children to recreate themselves. It is, too, the only way to keep the sabbath pure; for if they have no recreation during the week, they will have it on the sabbath, or return once more to their former superstitious holy-days. The beast must not always be ploughing, sometimes the yoke on his jaws must be taken off.

"And I laid meat unto them."

Luther saith, I so wrought for them, that they should eat their meat quietly: as if the prophet should say, You did not provide for yourselves your meat, God prepared it for you, and came and laid it before you. Thus God laid meat before them when he rained manna from heaven; when the quails were he provided them. Whence, Obs. 20. Mercies prepared, provided, and laid before us, are to be prized. When we receive a mercy, I say, that did not cost us much, but is prepared and set before us, it is to be prized.

How many of you have all your mercies prepared for you! when you go abroad on business, you take no care for provision at home in your families, you do but rise and dress, and go abroad, it may be to a sermon, or other company, and return home again; you have your tables spread, and find full dishes upon them, without any care of yours, all is prepared for you. O, consider the mercies of God towards you in this thing. Whereas many poor people are faint, before they can get bread for their families, their wives and children, to work hard; but the Lord lays meat before you. God is to be acknowledged in this.

The propriety of the word is, I made it to descend; it came down from heaven, יָרַד = יָרַד descendere fecit. it was neither too high nor too low, but it came just to you, fitted for you: which teaches us further,

Obs. 21. In receiving our food, we must look up to heaven. We are more beholden to the heavens than to the earth for our bread. God is to be acknowledged in that "he satisfieth the poor with bread," yea, and that he satisfieth the rich with bread; the richest of you all are to see how it comes from heaven: I made it to descend. I say we should look from whence our very food descends, it descends from heaven. Lift up thine eyes to heaven when thou art eating meat; be not as the swine under the tree, that looks downward to the acorns, but never upward towards the branches of the tree from whence the acorns fall; but look up to heaven from whence thy meat and thy provision did descend.

Obs. 22. The service of God's people is easy, and their provision bountiful. "I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws, and I laid meat unto them." Now the service of many of your servants is hard, and their provision very penurious, you would have them do your hard labour, and yet provide little food for them; oh, this is the basest of all cruelties, to put servants to hard labour, and yet not to provide comfortably for them for their food.

But, my brethren, the main thing that I would note from hence is, How great are the mercies of God to us, who has eased our yoke this day, and laid meat too before us! My brethren, who would have thought four years since, that there would be civil wars for almost four years together in our land; and such cruel, bloody wars, and so general throughout the whole kingdom; and that yet we should at this day have provision so plentiful as we have? Did not all say, even at the first year when the wars began, Surely things will be very scarce? many began to lay in corn and other provision, and we had cause enough to fear; but behold the bountifulness of the love of God, that has eased our yokes, and has laid meat before us, that "the poor is satisfied with bread," and there are "no complainings in our streets;" we have not only our bread, but our tables filled. What difference do you see in the tables of men now from former times! If a stranger should come into this kingdom, hearing what miserable wars there have been, (as bloody and cruel as ever were in any kingdom,) and yet see every man's table so filled, he could not but stand and wonder: certainly strangers think our condition to be far more sad in respect of provision than it is. Let us not then be wanton with our plenty. We were wont to say, If we might have but bread and cheese and the gospel, it were good cheer; now, my brethren, we have food of earth, and the bread of life too. What! is it sweet to be freed from outward bondage, and to have meat laid before us? how sweet is it then to be freed from spiritual bondage, and to have the food of life laid before us! yet this is our condition. Our blessing specially consists in this, in having our spiritual yokes taken off from us, and having the bread of life laid before us in a more plentiful measure than ever we had: was there, ever a time that this city had so much meat laid before it for the soul, as at this day? The misery of other parts of the kingdom is your misery; the Lord grant that you do not loathe and despise your manna: God has ways enough to cut you short.

Ver. 5. He shall not return into the land of Egypt, but the Assyrian shall be his king, because they refused to return.

To give you first a short paraphrase of the words, (for there is no difficulty in them,) and then the notes of observation: it is as if the prophet should say,

Howsoever he thinks to help himself with ease, to shelter himself in Egypt, yet he shall not, but he shall go into captivity into Assyria; for all the means which have been used would not bring him to return.

The observations then are,

Obs. 1. That which hardens men's hearts against threats in their sin, is some expedient that they have in their thoughts; Let the worst come that can be, yet I have such and such a relief.

My brethren, it is a great mercy of God to be so wholly taken from all carnal props, from all vain shifts and hopes, as to be thoroughly convinced that there is no help in any thing, or in any creature, in heaven and earth, but only in turning to God, and casting the soul down before mercy; If that saves me not, I am undone for ever. When the heart comes to this, God is working in a gracious and merciful way: I see my sin, my affliction that is upon me, and feel it; though my heart would be shifting this way and that way, yet God has convinced me nothing can do me good, I am lost and undone whatever course I take, except I return to God, and humble my soul before him, and seek his face, and obtain his mercy.

Obs. 2. A stout heart cares not whither it goes, rather than it will return to God. "He shall not return into the land of Egypt." It was a very strange perverseness to think of this shift, to go back to Egypt. Why, was not Egypt the place of their bondage, and the Egyptians still retained their cruelty? and yet they thought of this help, that they would turn to Egypt rather than to God. So the prodigal will rather go to the swine to feed upon husks, than to his father. And some stubborn children care not what miseries they suffer, rather than they will come and humble themselves to their parents; they will hang themselves, and drown themselves, and seek their fortune, as they are wont to say, rather than be persuaded to come in and submit themselves; no, never as long as they live, though they die, yet will they not: and thus their hearts are stout. But while they think they are stout against their parents, they are stout against God too, and God has ways to bring men's stout hearts to yield.

Obs. 3. Stubborn hearts, though God be dealing with them in mercy, will, foolishly and desperately, if any thing cross them, wish to return to their former condition of misery. If you make any thing that God does an argument to a stubborn heart for duty, if it pleases him not, he will reject all that is done for him, and say he had rather be as he was before, Let me go into Egypt again. This is their unthankfulness, that because they are vexed and crossed in some one thing, they will foolishly and desperately wish that they were returned to their former condition.

Oh, thus it is with many of us; how foolishly, how wickedly; have we thought and said it was better with us before than now, let us return to our former condition! this is thy folly and thy desperate wickedness. But saith the text, "He shall not return," though he thinks of returning: as if the Holy Ghost should say, Do not please yourselves to think it is but to return to Egypt, that you can no where be worse off than you are now; God has worse things in store for them who harden their necks.

And, my brethren, this is our case this day; let not us think of returning to our former condition; certainly, were we to attempt to return, our condition would be far worse than before, our danger far greater. This is certain, to the view of any men that have their eyes open, that our condition in England must, if we return, be far worse than before. Many say, Oh, we were thus and thus in former times, and if we were now but as then we should do well enough! O, let us not think so; we must certainly be far worse off than we were, for if we think of returning it will not be to Egypt, but to Assyria.

Obs. 4. God knows how to cross the wills and mar the plots of wicked men. They please themselves with their devices, they will do thus and thus; if they be put to this shift, then they have a second, and a third. Yea, but there is a God in heaven who has determined otherwise.

Never were wicked men more crossed in their plots than they are at this day; they have said that they would do thus and thus, but God has said they should not, and they have not.

Now God in his mercy defeats the sinful projects of his people; but when the wicked are crossed in their sin, it is because God has other ways to bring about greater evils on them: "the Assyrian shall be his king." Well then, whatsoever any man's thoughts and desires are, the Lord deliver us from turning into Egypt again. And likewise the Lord grant the Assyrian may not be our king.

"But the Assyrian shall be his king." The Lord deliver us from both Egypt and Assyria. Why an Assyrian? why was he threatened to be their king? You shall find that he was one of a cruel and proud heart; the Assyrians were generally so, a generation of men cruel, proud, stout, and hard-hearted. "O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger," saith God, Isa. x. 5; and in ver. 7, "It is in his heart," in the heart of the king of Assyria, "to destroy and cut off nations not a few." And in the 12th verse, "Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks." Oh! it is a sore evil to be subject to the rage of a proud and stout-hearted man, who will set his heart against God himself; who, though God fights against him, yet will stand it out; and though his design is crossed, yet will not come in; who will not give glory to God though his will cost him the blood of many thousands, but will go desperately on, regarding more his own will and lusts than the blood or lives of millions. How sad and dreadful is the condition of those who have such a stout heart to reign over them, armed with power, inflated with pride, enraged with cruelty! This is that which the Lord threatens here; and why? "because they refused to return." I beseech you observe this; "He shall not return into the land of Egypt," saith God, "but the Assyrian shall be his king, because they refused to return." From whence further, Obs. 5. If we will not do God's will, God will cross us in our own. They would have their will, they would return, but they shall not, saith God; they will not return to me, therefore they shall not return whither they will themselves. God can cross us in our own wills at every turn. Foolish men! who will presume to cross God in his will, when God has them at such infinite advantages to cross them every way in every thing! If you cross God in that in which he delights, you may expect God will cross you in that in which you most delight.

O, when you are crossed in any thing that you have set your thoughts and heart most upon, commune with yourselves thus; Have not I crossed the mind of God, in that upon which God most set his heart? It is a good way, my brethren, to take a holy revenge upon ourselves, and if we cannot get our hearts to work for God as they ought, not to suffer them to work for ourselves as they would.

Obs. 6. God is not so much displeas'd at our sins, as at our not returning. He saith not, that the Assyrian should rule over them because they have sinned, but because they refused to return. "Because they would not return." It is too much that thou hast sinned, but as soon as ever thou hast sinned it concerns thee to think of returning; God expects as soon as ever the sin is noticed, that thou shouldst presently begin to return. It is dangerous to continue in the least sin; this aggravates thy sin dreadfully, and endangers thy sealing up to wrath everlasting.

Obs. 7. To refuse to return, notwithstanding means used, and mercies tendered, is a fearful aggravation. Not to return is evil, but to refuse to return, notwithstanding means used and mercies tendered, oh this is fearful indeed.

O lay this to heart, thou convicted sinner; what offers of mercy has God made to thee! what callings to mercy hast thou heard, outward calls in providence, and inward calls by the Spirit of God! Oh how has God called after thee, "Return, return, thou Shulamite;" return, return, return, thou wretched, wilful sinner; O, come in and return! What means of all sorts hast thou had to cause thy heart to return to God! and yet standest thou out? Think of what the Spirit saith in Job i. 4, "Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?" What! dost thou think to harden thyself against God, and yet to prosper? "Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?" And mark what follows; "Which removeth the mountains, and they know not: which overturneth them in his anger. Which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble." And yet cannot thy heart be overturned, can it not tremble? In this, that thou refusest to return, thy sin is aggravated above the sin of the devils themselves, for we do not know that ever the devils refused to return, for they were never offered mercy; God did never offer the devils mercy, God never sent to preach to them, either by his ministers, or word. Return, and ye shall have mercy; here is a price paid, here is a salvation for you, your sins may be pardoned: the devil had never such an offer. Who knows what the devil might do if such an offer were made to him? But now these offers are made to thee, and thou refusest to return. O return, therefore, thou sinful soul that art wandering from God in the ways of death and destruction, this day give in thine answer: as we read in Jer. iii. 22, where the Lord calls his backsliding children, "Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings." Mark the answer they give to God, "Behold, we come unto thee; for thou art the Lord our God." Oh that there might be such an answer given this day from some backsliding soul that is turned from God! O poor soul! whither art thou gone? God calls this day to thy soul, Return, return; and professes that he is willing to heal thy backslidings. O give in this answer, "Behold, we come unto thee; for thou art the Lord our God." Oh that some soul might this hour refuse no longer to return. Why wilt not thou return? God is content to return to thee: thou art turned from God, and God in the ways of his administrations is turned away from thee; but mark the promise in Jer. viii. 4, 5, "Thus saith the Lord; Shall they fall, and not arise? shall he turn away, and not return? Why then is this people of Jerusalem slidden back by a perpetual backsliding? they hold fast deceit, they refuse to return."

Some interpret the words here, "Shall he turn away and not return," of God. The Lord is not so turned back, but he is ready to return; oh! why shouldst thou backslide with "a perpetual backsliding?"

"Because they refused to return." The word אָבָה translated "they refused," may signify they scorned. What! talk to him of returning, tell him of his sin against God, and its greatness, and the greatness of the danger, and the threatenings of God against his sin? he despises all these things, these are poor things to scare children withal; tell him of the mercies of God in pardoning his sin, he slights all. This humiliation now for sin, this breaking off of sinful courses, they deride the motions of them, they scorn to return. Hence, further,

Obs. 8. Sorrowful spirits, when called upon in the bowels of mercy to return from their evil ways, do not only refuse to return, but also scorn and slight what is said to them. Well, howsoever thou dost scorn and contemn it, know there are some who admire at God's mercies in calling thee to return, who admire at mercy tendered to themselves, and prize it more than all things in the world; they turn to the Lord with all their souls, nothing in all the world can stop them; they bless God that ever their ears heard the call of God, wooing them to return, and they would not for ten thousand thousand worlds but they had heard it, and felt the Spirit of God working their hearts to return to him.

Ver. 6. And the sword shall abide on his cities, and shall consume his branches, and devour them, because of their own counsels.

"And the sword shall abide on his cities." They relied on their cities and therefore refused to return; but saith the Lord here, וְיָרֶה הָרִבּ בְּעָרָיו "The sword shall abide on his cities." The Vulgate and Jerome translate it, The sword has begun on their cities.

If we understood it thus we might derive a very profitable meditation.

Obs. 1. It is time for a people to return, when God doth but whet, or draw out, his sword. "At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it; if that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil. I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them," Jer. xviii. 7, 8. Oh! happy had it been for us, if, when the sword begun with us, we had turned from our evil.

But we must rather take it as in our version, and so the words are more proper, "The sword shall abide on his cities."

The evil of the sword I have already opened in the latter end of the former chapter, but that which I here would note is, The abiding of the sword upon their cities. From whence,

Obs. 2. The abiding of the sword is a sore judgment. So it was here, for afterwards, in the reign of Hoshea, was this prophecy fulfilled, when Samaria was besieged for three years together. When God threatens fearfully, he threatens the abiding of the sword; "the bathing it in heaven," its being "filled with blood," "made fat with fatness," and that it "shall devour," and "shall be satiate," and "made drunk with blood." All these six expressions you have in two scriptures, Isa. xxxiv. 5, 6, and Jer. xli. 10. Oh! this a dreadful thing, for the sword to abide. It has abode long on Germany, the Lord has been angry with them for almost these thirty years: we think three or four years long for the abiding of the sword amongst us.

But if it be such a fearful judgment for the sword to abide, how vile are they that seek to prolong its abiding on a people, and that for their own advantage! Oh! that is a cursed thing; such men live upon blood, every draught they drink they drink blood, who have endeavoured the prolonging of the sword upon this kingdom for their private advantages.

My brethren, we have cause to bless God, that he has raised up instruments* for us, who have hazarded the shortening of their own lives to shorten the war, who have done their work of late as if they took it by the great. There is a froward and envious generation of men, who will say of some, because in certain things they differ from them, that they would be glad that these troubles might continue, because then they might have the more liberty. But we see these men, though of different judgments, do not contrive measures to continue the trouble, but hazard themselves to conclude it as soon as possibly they can, and that to admiration, doing things in the winter season, that is not ordinarily heard of among other nations; and all this, that the sword may not abide upon their country, but that peace may be hastened: on such surely the blessing of God must rest.

Obs. 3. The sword has its commission from God, and will abide as long as God will have it. He that is the Lord of hosts, gives the commission to the sword, and till he recalls his commission the sword shall go on. We may think the wars at an end; oh! let us look to it that we may make up our peace with God, and then we may hope it; but otherwise the Lord may cause "a serpent to come out of the cockatrice's egg," the Lord may kindle fires otherwise than we can imagine; therefore saith God, "The sword shall abide." It may be they thought, that indeed if the enemy come he will not stay long; but, saith God, he "shall abide."

I verily persuade myself, that there were many, yea, and some of the wisest in this kingdom, who persuaded themselves at the beginning of the taking up of the sword, that it would scarce have held twelve months together, it was so impossible to have foreseen the abiding of the sword so long upon us as it has. Yea, but if God gives commission it must abide: there is a notable text for that, in Jer. xlviii. 6, 7, "O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard, rest, and be still." Mark the answer there: "How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge?" It must go on, it must abide, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge.

Obs. 4. It is a sad thing for the sword to be in the field, but still worse for the sword to be in the cities, for in the cities is the strength of the kingdom. "And the sword shall abide on his cities." When the sword comes into the cities, oh the fearful sights of houses fired, of streets running with blood, the hideous noise of shrieking women and children! Josephus, in his account of the Jewish Wars, reports of Jerusalem, that when the Romans came against it and took it, the narrow streets were so filled with dead bodies that there was no passage; and he adds, that the streets ran with the blood of the inhabitants, and many things set on fire, were quenched with the blood of men and women which deluged the streets, so dreadful was the sword there. The number of those that were slain and died during the time that the sword was stretched out against that one city, he saith, was eleven hundred thousand, it having been surrounded when crowded with strangers at the time of the celebration of the passover. Oh! for the sword to come to populous cities is very dreadful.

And the more dreadful it is, the greater is the mercy of God to our city; the Lord has so wholly delivered it from the sword that it has not come upon it at all. If the sword had come to this city, oh! it would have raged indeed; for this was the butt of the malice of the adversaries, their fury was reserved for this city: but the Lord has protected it, it has been the city of the Lord of hosts, the Lord has commanded that no army should meddle with it for hurt: Isa. xxxvii. 35, "I will defend this city," saith God, "to save it for mine own sake." Yea, it is for God's own sake indeed that he has said to the sword, "Go through the land;" and indeed quite through the land, except this city, and a few surrounding counties about it: as in Ezek. xiv. 17, "Or if I bring a sword upon that land, and say, Sword, go through the land," &c. The sword has even devoured from one end of the land to another, and yet this city is preserved, and not only preserved, but made a refuge and a succour for all the godly party flying from the rage of the sword. "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised" in this city, preserved by the Lord; except it had been preserved by the Lord, the watchmen certainly had waked "but in vain," Psal. cxxvii. 1.

The "branches," that is, the towns and villages about the city; for the cities in a kingdom are like the root or the body of a tree, while the villages or towns are as the branches; and here are threatened both city and branches.

And this city has been as a great body of a tree, that has sent out juice, and sap, and succour to all the towns and villages in the kingdom. When the sword is upon the city, there is little hope that the villages shall escape. Isa. xiv. 31, "Howl, O gate; cry, O city, thou, whole Palestina, art dissolved." When the city cries, then whole Palestina is dissolved. No marvel then, though there has been such plotting in this city, by making divisions, besides other treacherous and villainous ways, to bring the sword upon it to spoil it. What efforts have there been to betray us, one plot upon another! as soon as one is broken up, presently another is formed, and all against this city. Oh what a pleasant sight would it have been to our adversaries, to have seen it in confusion, and wallowing in its own blood! But the more there is depending upon it, the more carefully should all that love peace, and the welfare of the kingdom, labour for its good; every one should labour for the peace of it, that it may be a city compacted with unity within itself, that all that are godly and faithful therein may unite together, and every one bear the infirmities of his brother; that there may be no grating upon one another's spirits, no exasperation, no stirrings-up of violence one against another, especially against those that are gracious and peaceable. The more plotting, and falseness, and treachery there is against this city, the more faithfully should we labour for its good, yea, and the more should we increase our prayers for it. So Psal. lv. 9—11, "I have seen violence and strife in the city. Day and night they go about it upon the walls thereof: mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it. Wickedness is in the midst thereof: deceit and guile depart not from her streets." What then? In the 17th verse, "Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and he shall hear my voice." What saith the psalmist? "I have seen violence and strife in the city," yea, and "deceit and guile depart not from her streets." What shall I do then? "Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray." We complain of contentions, and divisions, and strifes in the city, and that there are so many plots and treacheries against the city; O let not us only talk of these things, but increase our prayers in frequency and fervency. Let there be no family without prayer to God in it, evening and morning at least; and if you prayed twice a day before, then pray thrice a day now, because of the strife, and treachery, and deceit in the city; and the Lord will hear our voice. And he concludes the Psalm thus, "Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days; but I will trust in thee." Let them be never so bloody-minded, and desire never so much to imbrue the city in blood, yet saith the text, "Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days; but I will trust in thee."

Joseph. de Bello Judaico, lib. 7. cap. 7.

* The new-modelled army. Ann. 1645, 1646.

"Because of their own counsels."

The evil, folly, and danger of men's own counsels, we have spoken to, in the 10th chapter, 6th verse, "Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel." Now only a word here in reference to the abiding of the sword upon them.

The sword has abode upon us divers years: the wisest amongst us did not think the sword would have continued so long as it has done; and yet who can tell when there will be an end of these things?

Among other evils, certainly this evil of our own counsels is a great evil, that has made the sword to abide upon us: every man follows his own counsel, one man for his friend, and another for his friend. Men's own counsels, both in parliament, in city, in the army, in the country, throughout the kingdom, have been a great cause of the abiding of the sword so long a time upon us.

"Their own counsels." The Vulgate renders it, connecting it with the foregoing words, Sua consilia comedent capita eorum, shall eat up, or destroy, their heads. Those men that seemed to be the wisest and most full of counsel among them, even they were the cause of the continuance of this evil upon them. Montanus and Vatablus render it, their counsellors; because those that put them upon such counsels were the cause of the abiding of the sword. So in Ezek. xi. 2, of Jaazaniah and Pelatiah, princes of the people, it is said, "these are the men that devise mischief, and give wicked counsel in this city." God has an eye upon such as "give wicked counsel in this city," as the men that are the causes of the evil that is upon it. There is nothing more useful in troublesome times than counsel, if set aright; and nothing more dangerous in troublesome times than counsel, if it be wrong. The Lord deliver us, both parliament, army, city, and kingdom, from our own counsels. This will ever be; men will ever follow their own counsels, till they be taken off from their own designs and their own ends, till they can trust God with his work, and be willing to have their own private advantage swallowed up in the public good. Squint-eyed and selfish counsel will destroy us, if God be not infinitely merciful to us; yea, and it may be there are some well-intentioned for God, who yet in their counsels may be led aside by carnal principles: as for instance, many of good intentions, many who desire the furtherance of the kingdom of Christ, and can appeal to God that their hearts are sincere in their desire, think that there is no such way for the furtherance of the kingdom of Christ, as by the correspondency of it with the kingdoms of the world. This they regard as a sound fundamental principle; but certainly they are mistaken, for as the kingdom of Christ is not of this world, so the way to promote it is not by endeavouring the correspondency of it with the kingdoms of this world. God has laid the great work of man's salvation, the greatest work that concerns the glory of his name, in that which is foolishness to men; and almost all the great works of God, especially those that have a more immediate subserviency to the kingdom of his Son, he brings about, not by man's counsel, but by ways and means which seem folly to the counsels of men carnally wise. "For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent," 1 Cor. i. 19.

Ver. 7. And my people are bent to backsliding from me: though they called them to the most High, none at all would exalt him.

"And my people are bent to backsliding." Sometimes they may begin to reform, but they are quickly off again, for there is a principle of apostasy in them. "My people are bent to backsliding." If they do any thing in the way of reformation it is upon some external motive; their hearts are inclined another way: they are like a bough of a tree bent contrary to its nature by an external force; it may be for the present it yields, but there is in it an inclination, a propension, to return whither its own nature carries it. Thus it was often with Israel, upon some extraordinary work of God they would do such and such things, but they were as a deceitful bow that soon starts back.

My brethren, let us search our hearts. There was a great forwardness of reformation in the beginning of the parliament; how did men stir then! their spirits seemed to be then otherwise disposed than now; but it appears that in many of them it was only a spirit against those that had oppressed them, and a triumphing and rejoicing in having their wills upon them, and in the novelty of the change of things, but their hearts remained as earnal, drossy, and vain as ever. Therefore when men's wills were a little satisfied, and they saw that the godly people of the land began to rejoice, hoping for greater freedom than ever for, and countenance of, the religious party, and they found that there were some difficulties in the work of reformation, and that thereby their lusts should be curbed, that they should not, as before, have a licence to sin, upon this their hearts "are bent to backsliding;" that is, they fall off from the godly people of the land, with whom they formerly closed, and seemed much to rejoice in, their hearts are now against them as much as ever they seemed with them; yea, their hearts do vex and fret at any liberties they may possibly enjoy, or at any work of reformation that is begun. Thus it is with the nation at large, men's hearts "are bent to backsliding."

And if we look at men individually, their hearts "are bent to backsliding" from the ways of godliness which they began to profess, as thus: many young ones, and others, who have had workings on their hearts, and have made great profession of religion, yet, never having had their hearts changed, start back now; and that for many reasons.

1. God's ways have been unsuitable to them, and therefore they have found them hard and tedious.
2. To other things they have had a greater inclination, only they have been kept from them by the strength of conviction and external motives.
3. They have grown weary of the ways of God: that is a third degree, weariness of the ways of God.
4. They have watched all advantages how they might get off from their profession.
5. They have been sorry that they have engaged themselves so much as they did.
6. Any objections against such ways they greedily embrace, and diligently improve.
7. They are very ready to take any offence.
8. They watch for offences.
9. Any opinion that will give them a liberty from that straitness which they made profession of before, they are willing to embrace and entertain; if there be any practice that may give them any more liberty, they fall presently to it, and so they come to backslide. Now their actual backslidings are but a fruit of the bent of their spirits; their spirits were bent to backsliding before, and what they do now is but a fruit of the inward inclination. Let such know, that if they have no need of the ways of godliness, the ways of godliness have no need of them; the ways of godliness shall be justified and honoured, when they shall perish and be swept off as filth and dung from the face of the earth. I will leave only that scripture with them, "If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him," Heb. x. 38.

But I find לשונות תלויים which we translate "bent to backsliding," rendered variously; and indeed the Hebrew does seem to countenance divers readings. Calvin, Pareus, and others of our later writers, render the words suspensi sunt, they are as men hanging in suspense; for תלויים they say, translated by us "bent," signifies a propensity to a thing; and is accordingly rendered by them, in suspense; the Septuagint favours this, translating it by παρακείμενος. Now then, if the translation of the word be thus, which is for aught I know as suitable, or rather more so, than our version, why then there are these two things mainly in it.

First, They are in suspense; that is, they being in straits know not what to do. I find in Deut. xxviii. 66, the same word that here is translated "bent," is there rendered "shall hang in doubt;" "thy life shall hang in doubt before thee;" and that makes me the rather think that this interpretation may set out the mind of the Holy Ghost in this scripture. So then the meaning would be this:

They see themselves in such a sad condition that they know not which way to turn; they see their plots take not, their designs prosper not, they see God is out against them; and they would fain devise new plots, but they see as great an unlikelihood to prosper in their new, as in their former plots; what the issue of them may be they know not: thus are they in suspense and in doubt, not knowing which way to turn themselves.

And blessed be God who has put our adversaries in suspense and doubt: this is a judgment of God upon men who cannot trust God in his right and holy ways; they must have ways of their own, they must follow their own counsels, and these their own counsels in-snare them, and bring them into most miserable straits, from whence they know not how to extricate themselves. God makes the ways of the righteous plain to them; but the counsels of men's hearts bring them into straits. They thought to deal wisely for themselves, but the truth is, their counsels, in which their wisdom was much applauded, bring them into such miserable straits and extremities, that they know not what to do.

Secondly, Luther has a very good interpretation of this, reading the words thus: My people doubt whether they will turn to me or not; they see they profit not in their way, their consciences misgive them, they have some thoughts of returning to me, sometimes they are persuaded it is best for them to return; but the corruption of their own hearts stirs up temptations, and when they are presented to them, they know not what to do; they give many onsets, but they come not off freely; my people do hang in doubt and suspense, and do not come off freely to my way.

And this is according to the Chaldee paraphrase, My people hesitate to convert themselves to my law: there are tossings to and fro in their minds, they are in doubt, and come not to a full resolution.

Obs. 1. It is a great evil for men to strive with their consciences. When their consciences put them upon the ways of God, they think there is good in God's ways, and that God is not well pleased with their present courses, and that it might be well for them if they reformed; yea, but then, on the other side, there come in temptations, and there are such difficulties in the way, I shall discountenance such and such great ones, I shall have opposition from some whom my measures will displease, I shall hazard myself, and the like; I must deny myself and go against the hair in many things, I must cross my heart in certain things on which it is strongly bent; why may I not do well enough in some other way, without so much trouble to myself? Thus their hearts reason within them: and yet again at other times serious thoughts begin to work, and their consciences thus to stir, Have not I to deal with a holy and glorious God? how if things shall prove otherwise than they are apprehended by me? what good will it do to me to cozen my own soul? were it not better for me to return? Oh that I could but tell how to speak this day to such as are perhaps yet in suspense! It may be there are some such here this day; they cannot be quiet in their present state, when they awake in the night season their consciences trouble them, and yet when they come abroad among company then that carries them away again; and thus their lives do as it were hang in suspense, and they are vexed and troubled in their own thoughts, not knowing what to do. Oh that I could (I say) speak to such hearts this day, that I could but tell how to present to them some determining thoughts! I will but in a few words suggest four or five meditations to such, that may help them to come to a determination; for the truth is, this is the cause almost of all the wickedness of such as have enlightened consciences under the means of grace, they do not come to a full determination. If thou art in suspense, let me cast into the scale these thoughts:

1. These stirrings now upon thee, which put thee thus to oppose the ways of sin, and bring thee so far as to be in suspense, know, they are the work of the Holy Ghost in thee; I do not say, that all going against such stirrings and workings is the sin, that unpardonable sin; but this I say, the sinning against those stirrings and workings of thy conscience is a sin against the Holy Ghost: take heed then of sinning against the good Spirit of God; the Holy Ghost has begun to conceive in thee, take heed thou dost not destroy the child in the womb. We know it is murder to destroy a child in the womb, when it is but beginning to be conceived; and thou that art in this suspense, thou hast a conception of the Holy Ghost in thee; take heed of murdering it.

2. If the Spirit of God leaves thee after this, thou wilt be more hardened than ever: let this be in thy thoughts. Thou hast stirrings of conscience, and some propensity to the ways of God, but yet thy corruptions hang off; look to thyself while these workings of God are upon thee, if they leave thee they will leave thy heart harder than before.

3. In matters of such infinite consequence, certainly the safest way is the best way. It is not enough for thee to say, Is it necessary? and why must I do thus and thus? and what need it? and may not I do well enough without it? But when thou art reasoning about matters that concern eternity, though thou canst not fully satisfy thy mind, yet to take the safest way is the best way; and that thou art upon the safest way, is enough to countervail whatever trouble thou mayst meet with; though it should not be absolutely necessary that thou shouldst take such a course in such a particular, yet if thy conscience but suggests to thee, that this way is safer than the other, to go the safest way is best.

4. There is more evil in the least sin, than there can be good in whatsoever all the creatures in the world can tender to thee. Resolve upon this; this is a certain, undeniable principle: There is more evil in the least sin, than there can be good in all that all the creatures in the world can tender to thee.

5. It is best for me to do that now, which I would wish I had done if I were now to die. Put that meditation into the scale. Art thou in suspense, inclining now this way, now that, whether fully to come off from those ways of sin that thou art upon, or no? put this fifth thought into the scale, It is best for me now to do that which I would wish I had done if I were now to die. This will tend mightily to weigh down abundance of temptations that may be put into the other scale; and so thou mayst come to a determination, and deliver thy soul.

Populus meus dubitat an velit reverti ad me. Luth.

Populus meus hesitat se convertere ad legem meam. Chald. Paraphrase.

"Bent to backsliding," rendered by Calvin and others, they are in suspense, the Vulgate translates, My people hang in a kind of hope that I will return, and that all may be well with them at last; that though they do thus and thus, yet all may be well with them at last; God has often delivered them out of great afflictions, and why may not he deliver them still? And so they hang in expectation of God's coming to them. So they make חָשָׁבְתִי here translated "backsliding," to be a returning, a returning of God. I confess the word has something in it that signifies returning; but those who are skilful in Hebrew say, it is not used in a good sense, but in an evil; it is rather a going from, than a returning. Still, as the Vulgate has it, the hope of God's returning, and that things may be well, is the cause of the hardening of many hearts in sin; they hang as it were in the air, thinking that it may be well with them, and that things may not prove so bad as they hear. But cursed is that hope of comfort which has nothing else to ground upon, but only, It may be things are not so bad as we hear out of the word.

"Though they called them to the most High." That is, the prophets and messengers of God "called them to the most High," they wanted not means in the ministry of the word, they were called to "the most High," that is, to God. Now that God is "the most High," we have shown, chap. vii. 16, where he has also the title of "the most High." You who are highest, look upon God as above you; know that God looks upon you, and all men that are lifted up in the pride of their own hearts, as infinitely below him.

"They called them to the most High;" that is, they called them in the ministry of the word, that they might,

1. Know him; that is, that they might know him, "the most High," to be the infinite, supreme, glorious Majesty; that they might know the infinite distance which there is between God and the creature, and that they might know him to be the highest end of all things, so as to work after him submissively.

2. Acknowledge him; that they might thus fear him, that they might worship him, and love him, and trust in him, as the most high God.

3. Submit their wills to him whose will is supreme above all, and especially in matters of worship.

4. Come to have this high God as their God, and enjoy him as their portion. Thus the prophets "called them to the most High." Whereas their hearts were drossy, and low, and base, they minded only the satisfying of their flesh, and having their wills one upon another; their hearts hung down to their devised worship, which, though suitable to their public ends, and carrying great wisdom in their adoption of it, yet God would not own; God despised that worship of theirs with which they thought to honour him: the prophets therefore called them from these base, drossy things, to the most high God. Hence,

Obs. 2. Men's hearts naturally sink down to low and mean things; things unworthy of their souls, unworthy of that excellent nature with which they are endued. Men indeed have swelling hearts in their base, sinful way, but this very pride is their disease. The heart of man wants a true elevating principle, and the knowledge of "the most High" would more dignify and exalt it than pride can ever do: sin, wheresoever it is, debases man's nature.

Obs. 3. It is the end of the ministry of the word, to call to the most high God those who have their hearts grovelling after low and base things. Have not you found this fruit of the ministry of the word in your hearts, calling you many a time to the most high God from the vanities on which your hearts were fixed, telling you of the great and glorious Being with whom you have to deal in all your ways, who will have to deal with you to all eternity? I question not but many of your consciences have found this, even a word darted into your hearts that has called you from low, base things to the high and blessed God.

Obs. 4. It is a great and sore evil to stop our ears against the calls of the word. What! not answer to God's call? Does God call you, and you not answer to him? We say to a child, Your father calls you, or to a servant, Your master calls you, will you not answer? Oh! to shut our ears against the call to the most high God is a dreadful thing, it will lie heavy upon thee one day; those calls which thou hast had in thine ears will prove to be terrors in thy heart. Certainly, though thou lettest go the invitations of the word calling thee to the most high God, remember this, the calls which thou hast to the high God, being neglected by thee, will prove terrors in thy heart. Poor creature, to what dost thou listen? what invitations engage thy heart, that the calling to "the most High" cannot overcome thee?

Obs. 5. The calling "to the most High," is a special means to cause those that are in suspense to come to a full resolution. In Psal. xvii. 9, "Thou, Lord, art high above all the earth: thou art exalted far above all gods." What follows in the 10th verse? "Ye that love the Lord, hate evil." God is a high God above all gods; hate evil then; set yourselves against evil, be resolved in the ways of God. When you are called to "the most High," you may see how infinitely worthy God is of all glory from you, what infinite good there is in him, and what infinite power he has to avenge himself of you, if you neglect his call; therefore there is a mighty deal of force to cause resolution. In Acts vii. we have a notable speech of Stephen concerning Abraham. Abraham was called from his father's house, and it cannot be imagined but that he had many thoughts to keep his heart in suspense; when called from his kindred, and all the contentment and comfort he had there, it is impossible but flesh and blood would suggest many thoughts to Abraham to keep his heart in suspense. But what led Abraham's heart to resolve fully what to do in such a case? The text saith, "The God of glory appeared to him." Acts vii. 2; it was not only God, but "the God of glory." My brethren, when God is calling you off from all creature comforts, from all things that may quiet your hearts in the world, and you have strong temptations to keep you in the ways of sin, let but the God of glory appear to you, and this will engage your hearts, this will bring them to a full resolution. Oh! blessed, blessed are those souls to whom, though they have continued long in suspense, yet at length the God of glory has appeared in the midst of their doubts and temptations.

And if there be such a force in this, then learn to present before thy soul that is in such a suspense, the glory of the great God; look up to this great God; It is the infinite high God to whom I am called. O thou hesitating, wavering soul, look up, and answer this call of God unto himself, answer it thus:

O Lord, thou art an infinite, blessed, glorious Being, the Supreme Being of all. I am a poor, vile worm, that lies under thy feet, and it is of thy mercy that thou wilt vouchsafe to look towards me; thou mightest have let me gone on in my baseness, and have suffered me to perish to all eternity, without giving me any call to thyself; but now that thou shouldst give me a call to thyself, thou, the high, and glorious, and blessed Lord, this is mercy: Lord, I come, and with fear and trembling fall down before thee, saying, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Those who have been wavering and afterwards settled, have found that this has been the thing which has settled them, some dreadful authority of the high God that has come to their hearts in some truth beyond their former experience.

Obs. 6. The true worship of God is an elevating thing. Then are they called to "the most High," when they are called to the true worship of God, for it raises the soul to "the most High." Men's inventions are low, base, and unworthy things. O consider whether thou findest this in the worship of God? Dost thou find thy soul raised up to "the most High" in his worship? if not, thou dost not worship God aright. Let no man look upon the worship of God as a low, mean thing; know, when thou art worshipping God, thou hast to deal with "the most High," whom angels worship and adore, with that God who is far above all creatures in heaven and earth: thus thou art to regard the worship of God. Oh how far are most men from this in their worship of God! very few there are that lift up their hearts to "the most High," even in the duties of worship. And so it follows in the words, "None at all would exalt him." Why, If God be the most high God, how can he be exalted?

I answer, he is so high, that he cannot be more high than himself. God cannot be more excellent than he is in himself. God cannot make himself better than he is, nor more glorious in himself than he is; therefore no creature can make him more than he is: all that all the creatures in heaven and earth can do for God, can add nothing to him. "Blessed be thy glorious name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise," Neh. ix. 5.

Yet then God accounts himself to be exalted, when he is known and acknowledged as the high, supreme, first Being; when we fear him as a God; when we humble ourselves before him as before a God; when we are sensible of the infinite distance there is between him and us; when we are willing to lay down what we are, or have, or can do for the furtherance of his praise; when his will is made the rule of all our ways, and especially of his worship; when we make him the last end of all; when it is the great care of our souls and work of our lives to do what possibly we can, that he might be magnified and lifted up in the world; and when we account the least sin a greater evil than can be recompensed by all the good which heaven and earth can afford us: when we do thus, God accounts himself exalted by us. And this is the work that we all have to do, to give up ourselves to the exalting of the name of this blessed God. He is worthy, so worthy of honour from us creatures, that though ten thousand millions of men and angels should perish eternally for the furtherance of the least degree of his honour, he is worthy of it all; and therefore let us know it to be our work to endeavour in our places to exalt him: and blessed is that man or woman, who when about to die is able to say, O Lord, thou hast been high in my heart; thy wisdom I have adored, and submitted mine unto it; thy will I have honoured, and yielded mine likewise to it; and it has been the great care of my soul that I might, according to the ability given unto me, do something in my place to lift up thy name: such may go out of the world in peace, as having in some measure fulfilled their mission into it.

O you whom God has exalted, let it be your care to exalt God; and especially ye saints of the Lord, know God has exalted you on high, and expects that you should lift up his name: he has lifted you up out of the depth of misery, from the nethermost hell, he has joined you to, and made you one with, his Son, he has loved you with the same love wherewith he loved his Son, with him he has made you heirs, even "joint-heirs," he has given his angels to be ministering spirits to you, he has made it his great design to honour himself in your eternal good, he has prepared a crown of glory for you; O then, do you join together to exalt the name of this God who has lifted up you who were such poor vile worms, let the high praises of this God be in your hearts and mouths for ever. Thus Psal. cxlii. 4, "Thy mercy is great above the heavens, and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds;" mark what follows in the 5th verse, "Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; and thy glory above all the earth." O Lord, we see thy mercy is exalted above the heavens, and thy truth to the clouds; then, Lord, be thou exalted above the heavens, that is, in our hearts and in our lives. Oh that God may be exalted in an answerable way above the heavens in what we do for him, as he has been exalted above the heavens in what he has done for us. Let us all exalt God's name: in either our everlasting destruction or salvation he will be glorified; let us pray that our safety may be identified with his glory.

My brethren, God has exalted himself of late in our eyes, in a glorious manner. "Be thou exalted, Lord, in thine own strength," Psal. cxi. 13. The Lord has exalted himself in his own strength: but mark what follows, "so will we sing and praise thy power." O let us sing and praise the power of God, who has of late so exalted himself in his own strength, and for the good of his own people.

Obs. 7. God has little honour in the world. "None at all would exalt him." Men seek to exalt themselves, but none to exalt God; every man follows his own ways and his own lusts, but the blessed and glorious God is exalted by few, or none. Men will arise to lift up antichrist, the kings of the earth will give their power to the beast, but none will exalt the Lord. Oh let this grieve the hearts of the saints, to see that the blessed God, so blessed in their eyes, should be exalted by so few.

And consider, every one of you, how little he has been exalted by you in all your ways. And why should you vex and fret that you have not honour and respect, when the blessed God, so infinitely worthy of honour and glory, is yet respected by almost none. Well, let this be our resolve from it; the less glory I see God have from the children of men, the more let me labour to honour him.

"None at all would exalt him;" so your version reads it: Luther and others, however, offer another interpretation, which, although not so good, may consist with the original, לֹא יִרְאֶה for if you observe the words, "him" is not there: they accordingly render it, there is none that lifts up himself; and explain it thus, Men are in a sleepy, sullen mood, that when God calls them, they will not stir up themselves to listen. And Luther makes use of this similitude, As a stubborn servant, or child, when the master calls him, will not stir and lift up himself to his call, there are none will lift up themselves; drossy, base, drowsy spirits, that are sleepy, and sink down to base, low things, they will not lift up themselves when they are called to the most high God. "They called them to the most High, there is none that lifts up himself."

It is a great evil to give way to a dead, dull sullenness of heart. When you come to the ministry of the word, you come with hearts dead and sinking down with discouragements. Now, when God calls, you should stir and lift up your hearts to close with those truths of God which do concern you; and it is a great evil in many, when they hear excellent truths which might do them good, that yet they do not lift up their hearts to close with those truths.

Ver. 8. How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zebaim? mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together.

Here, according to Luther, ends the 11th chapter, and the 12th begins at the next verse.

For the words themselves, we have not in all the book of God a more full expression of the pathetic affections of mercy and compassion in God.

"How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"

I beseech you observe, God was in the midst of his threatenings of judgment, and of charging them with their sin: "The sword shall abide on his cities, and shall consume his branches, and devour them, because of their own counsels. And my people are bent to backsliding from me: though they called them to the most High, none at all would exalt him." How! not one would come in? what should follow? One would think, Now let wrath pursue them, let the curse of the Almighty overtake them; one would wonder that it did not: but mark a greater wonder; after charging them with this wickedness, and in the midst of threatenings of the most dreadful judgments, God exclaims, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" &c.

The Lord here takes upon him (as it were) the person of a loving father towards a stubborn and rebellious child. The child has gone away from the father, and has continued in its stubbornness; it may be the father sends after it; it will not come, it will not return, but goes on perversely. The father has many workings in his heart to cast it off; He shall never be the better for me, let him beg his bread from door to door, he is unnatural. Yea, but in the midst of these resolutions, and these sad thoughts towards the child, there comes a turning of his heart on a sudden: How shall I give it up? how shall I disinher it? how shall I do it? It is my child, though stubborn; why may it not return? why may not yet God work good upon it? It is very evil, but how shall I give it up? I know not how in the world to bring my heart to it. Thus the Lord breaks out here. Here we have in your books four houses: "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?" I confess in the Hebrew there are but two, yet they have the sense of four, and accordingly the interpreters insert them; How? how? how? how shall I do it? There are four interrogations here, and four answers. Four pathetic interrogations that God asks as it were himself:

First, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"

Secondly, "How shall I deliver thee, Israel?"

Thirdly, "How shall I make thee as Admah?"

Fourthly, "How shall I set thee as Zeboim?"

And to these there are four answers, as thus:

First, "Mine heart is turned within me."

Secondly, "My repentings are kindled together."

Thirdly, "I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger."

Fourthly, "I will not return to destroy Ephraim."

These are the four answers; and for the last of them two reasons are given:

First, "I am God, and not man."

Secondly, "The Holy One in the midst of thee."

Now what the force of these reasons is we shall see when we come to them. But now to open to you briefly the words in a way of paraphrase, and then the several doctrinal notes from them.

"How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" or, as some read it, What shall I do to thee, Ephraim?

I am as it were at a stand what to do; as the father, that with the rod in his hand comes to correct, and lets the rod fall out of his hand, his affections work so strongly.

What shall I do? As if God should say, Oh, were there but any repentings, I would rejoice; yea, I would accept them were they but ever so little. Could I but tell how to vindicate mine honour in any other way than by your destruction, I would do it; oh, what shall I do? It is your foolish, wilful stubbornness, going on in such a vile, sinful way, that puts God to such a stand. What shall I do? God seems here to have his heart troubled within him, much like that in Exod. xxxiii. 5, when God was offended with the people, "Put off thy ornaments from thee," saith he, "that I may know what to do unto thee." It is a strange expression; as if he should say, Come and fast and pray, "put off thine ornaments," and humble yourselves before me, that I may know what to do to you: oh! why may there not be some hopes? "Put off thine ornaments," if there be as any repentings.

Or if you take it as it is in your books, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" then the scope is, Thou art upon the very brink of destruction, in the very mouth of ruin; wrath and misery stand waiting only for my giving thee up; oh! but how shall I do it? but I cannot tell how to find in my heart; how shall I do it? "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"

"Ephraim." This word contained a strong argument to move the compassion of God. If thou wert indeed the refuse of the world, I would not so much care for many thousands of them; but thou art "Ephraim," "my pleasant child," "my dear son," Jer. xxxi. 20. "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"

"How shall I deliver thee?" As if he should say, Justice calls for thee, that I would deliver thee up to her; justice pleads that thou art her due; but how shall I do it? how shall I do it? how shall I deliver thee? "Mine heart is turned within me."

The Septuagint and Vulgate render the words, How shall I protect thee?

The mistake arises from this: the same radical letters in the Hebrew that stand for delivering, signify likewise a shield, and therefore they translate it, How shall I <sup>אֲשִׁירְךָ</sup> protect thee as with a shield? but the sense is much the same, thus, How shall I protect such a one as thou art? how shall it be for mine honour that thou shouldst be under my protection? Men, indeed, do abuse their power to give protection to others, (and you know there has been a great abuse of this kind since the parliament began,) but saith God, How shall I do it? that is, I who am a holy and infinite God, how shall I protect such a one as thou art?

"How shall I deliver thee, Israel?" "Israel;" here is another argument: Israel, I remember thy father, I remember that mighty prince who wrestled with me and prevailed, and I account it my glory to be the glory of Israel and his seed. What! art thou the posterity of Israel, of one so dear to me, of a prince that heretofore so prevailed with me in prayer? what! art thou his posterity? "How shall I deliver thee, Israel?" When God looks upon them he sees them sinful and wretched, but when he looks upon what they were in reference to their forefathers, "How shall I give thee up, Israel?"

"How shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?"

Admah and Zeboim were the names of two of the five cities of the plain; now four of these five cities were destroyed by fire from heaven for their wickedness, and one only spared for Lot's sake. But this Admah and Zeboim were two of the cities on which the judgments of God were most terrible. The apostle Jude in his Epistle, ver. 7, saith, they, with "Sodom and Gomorrah," "are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Now, saith God here, the truth is, you have provoked me as much as Admah and Zeboim have done, their sins were not greater than yours, and as great wrath belongs to you as to them; but oh! how shall I do it? "How shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?" how shall I constrain my heart to such a measure?

Jerome on the place moves this question, Why does he mention Admah and Zeboim, and not Sodom and Gomorrah?

The answer which he gives is this: Judah is compared in their sin to Sodom and Gomorrah, Isa. i.; Ezek. xvi.; for Judah had more means than Israel had, Judah had the temple amongst them, and therefore their sin was more aggravated. So Sodom and Gomorrah were the chief sinners; Admah and Zeboim did but as it were follow their example, and, by so doing, wrapped themselves in the same judgments; but yet their sin was not altogether like Sodom's and Gomorrah's; therefore Judah, that had more means, is compared to Sodom and Gomorrah, and the ten tribes to Admah and Zeboim.

"Mine heart is turned within me."

Luther, according to his usual way in magnifying the grace of God, saith here, It is as if the heart that is stirred with anger for the sins of men, were not the true heart of God; and therefore saith he, "Mine heart is turned to me," mine own heart: now I have mine own heart indeed, when I have thoughts of peace; when I had thoughts of wrath it was not as it were mine own heart. So in Isa. xxviii. 21, God calls his execution of judgment, "his strange work." God's own heart is affected with our evil, and even turns with mercy towards us. So, Mine heart is come to me, saith God, as if it were gone before.

But otherwise, "Mine heart is turned within me;" that is,

As when a man's heart is much affected with love and compassion, there is the working of the spirits and blood round about it, and within it mighty motions and stirrings; so, saith God, methinks I find all my blood, as it were, and spirits, so working and stirred, that I find my heart even turning up and down within me, when I come to the execution of wrath. And then, "My repentings." That is, those thoughts of God by which he came to do such things as men do in their repentings.

"Are kindled together." That is, all the thoughts that could possibly be mustered together to turn my heart from the dictates of justice to the ways of mercy, conjointly conspire (saith God) to kindle a flame within me. As a number of brands being laid together make a great flame; so all those thoughts, presented together, mightily stir and burn within me.

Oh, this is the goodness of God to his people, to have all things that in any way may be a motive to do them good, to come together before him, and make a fire in the very bosom of God. All the reasonings, as it were, of my heart being joined together for them, have kindled a fire, so that I cannot hold, but I must needs vent myself thus, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"

But you will say, Why does God express himself thus? God might, without any more ado, pardon, and help, or deliver; why then should he express himself thus?

To this Calvin answers, He accommodates himself to our weakness. God, who disdained not to take man's nature upon him, disdained not to personate a man who, being much wronged, is reasoning in himself what to do; his heart is full of pity, his bowels yearn, and he would fain find a way for mercy; and when provocation of execution comes into his mind, it is as a dagger to his heart: Oh, how shall I do this?

God personates such a man, and saith, How shall I do it? and mercy and justice are introduced to plead the case, both against and for Ephraim.

Justice comes in and pleads, Lord, their sins are great and many; their mercies have been great, the means which they have had have been exceeding many, thou hast been patient a long time towards them, and this thy long-suffering has been abused, their hearts are still hardened, thy name is blasphemed because of them. These arguments are advanced against them. But then mercy steps up and pleads, But, Lord, art not thou a God? Thou art a God: these actions indeed may overcome men, but shall they overcome thee? Is not this Ephraim? are not they thy people? are they not in covenant relation with thee? Spare them, Lord, for their forefathers' sake, for Abraham's sake, for Israel's sake, who was so mighty with thee. Remember, Lord, "the kindness of their youth," the wonders that thou hast done heretofore for them, when they were stubborn and rebellious. Lord, thou hast many of thine elect among them, and wilt thou then utterly consume them? When the Lord hears mercy thus pleading against justice, he exclaims, How shall I do it? I cannot do it. Thus you have seen the opening of the words, with the paraphrase.

Thus you have the words explained and paraphrased, and if any one of you should think that I do not confine myself to a mere brief exposition of this scripture, I may even answer you, How shall I do it? it were a very great burden upon one, to open such scriptures as these in an auditory that desire to have something spoken to their hearts, and to pass them over with a mere brief exposition. But for the notes, the first observation is,

Obs. 1. The greatness of men's sin hinders not the working of the bowels of God's mercies towards them. "None at all would exalt him:" they followed their own counsels, and did what they list, yet, "How shall I give thee up?" I will give you a like instance, and that is as remarkable a one as we have in all the book of God. What sins were greater than the sins of Jerusalem against Christ when he lived? yet Christ looks on Jerusalem, and weeps over it; weeps over it, when he considered of its destruction. Yea, and mark, though Jerusalem was guilty of the blood, yea, took away the very life, of Christ; yet when Christ was risen again, one of the first things recorded of him, is his saying to the disciples going to Emmaus, "That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," Luke xxiv. 47. Repentance and remission of sins preached to all nations: oh, but surely Jerusalem must be left, Jerusalem that did slay the prophets, and was so injurious, yea, Jerusalem which put Jesus Christ to death; though all nations should have repentance and remission of sins preached to them, yet one would think Jerusalem now should be excepted. No, saith Christ, "beginning at Jerusalem;" Jerusalem shall be the first place where I will have repentance and remission of sins preached, even that Jerusalem which took away my life; I will have repentance and remission of sins preached there first of all. Truly God's mercies are beyond man's iniquities.

My brethren, consider on this, first, If the bowels of God's mercies work towards us, notwithstanding our great sins, why should not the bowels of our compassions work towards our brethren, notwithstanding their infirmities? why should we, upon every little discontent, cast off all pity and love to our brethren? What! such great unprofitableness in us, and yet it move not God to cast us off, but still, "How shall I give thee up?" O, when you look upon your brethren with whom your hearts did once close, and who were to you as your own souls, in the contemplation of being any instruments of evil to them you should have such reasonings as this, How shall I do it? I see infirmities in them, yea, but notwithstanding my great sins, God saith of me, "How shall I give thee up?"

Secondly, Why should great afflictions for God hinder our hearts working to him, when our great sins against God hinder not God's heart from working towards us? Why should any great afflictions for God hinder our hearts working towards him? Surely if God will be merciful to us notwithstanding our sins, we should go on in the ways of obedience to him notwithstanding any consequent afflictions.

Obs. 2. Sinners are at the very mouth of misery, the brink of destruction, when they think not of it; nothing is required but for God to give them up.

Obs. 3. Nothing but God's free mercy keeps us from being destroyed; "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed."

Obs. 4. Sin puts God to a stand. How shall I do it? It brings disorder into the world; God must set his infinite wisdom on work to bring things about to his own glory. Sin has brought disorder and confusion; Now, saith God, I must set mine infinite wisdom on work to bring glory out of this confusion. If God has any good intentions to thee, know, thy sin lays such difficulties in God's way to find out a channel for his mercy toward thee, as puts him to a kind of stand; as thus, for God to find out a way that all the wrong which sin has done to him should be atoned for, and yet thy soul saved, is the hardest thing in the world. Thou canst commit sin easily, but (I say) when the sin is committed, for God then to discover a way whereby all that dishonour which is done to him may be made up, (as it must be, for otherwise all the disorder will not be brought into order,) and yet thy soul saved, is the hardest thing in the world; and were not God a God infinite in wisdom, he would never be able to devise the means of reconciliation. God does seem, as it were, to be at a stand; How shall I act so as to save these sinners, and yet not wrong myself? Oh this should humble us for our sins! As if a child should do so much evil as to bring himself into such briers and troubles, that if his tender father, being affected with his sad condition, would help him, he is put to abundance of difficulties, and is fain to beat his brains, and study ways and means how he shall contrive to save this his child from utter undoing: now if the child has any ingenueness in him, he will not think, It is no great matter, so be it I be delivered; oh! but this will break his heart, Oh what troubles have I brought my father into! It is thus with us in reference to God, if we look upon God thus as personating a man.

Obs. 5. The salvation of a sinner breaks through a great many reasonings and workings of God's heart. How shall I do it? saith God. We little think what reasonings there are many times between mercy and justice about our lives, about our souls; could we but hear them as they debate in heaven regarding us, it would go to our hearts. The great salvation that comes by Christ was not determined without many reasonings between mercy and justice; there was presented to God whatsoever justice could say, and whatever mercy could say: What! (saith God,) must my son be under my wrath, and be made a curse, for the satisfying of justice? yet this must be; justice requires satisfaction; how can it be done without the Son of God being made a curse for man's sin? Such reasonings there are in the heart of God about man's salvation. In 1 Sam. xxvi., we read of Abishai and David's debating about Saul's life: "God," saith Abishai to David, "hath delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day: now therefore let me smite him," &c. No, saith David, "destroy him not." And thus they reasoned one with another. Saul was in a very dangerous situation when there was that reasoning about his life: in a like state are we many times; the justice and mercy of God reason about our lives and souls. Oh, how do we depend upon God for our lives and souls! and if we be saved, we are saved through many reasonings.

Obs. 6. According to the relation a sinful people have to God, so God finds it a difficult thing to execute wrath upon them. How shall I do it? The wrath of God is many times brought to the birth, and God cannot, as it were, (to speak after the manner of men,) know how to put strength to it to bring it forth. This is the reason that in Scripture we have such sending after sinners, and crying to them to return, such earnest wishes, Oh that they would return! and such pleadings with them, They will not come in, and return: this is the reason why we read of the Lord whetting his sword, and bending his bow, and preparing his arrows.

Why, is not God ready at any time to execute judgment upon a sinner?

No, he will be whetting, and bending, and preparing, and all because it is a work that he is loth to go through with (as it were): and this is the reason why God will not stir up his wrath, or if it be stirred up, he will call it back again. Lam. iii. 33, "The Lord doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men;" and all this is, because it is God's nature to be merciful; mercy pleases him, and the Lord perfectly foresees, and has perfectly in his view, all the reasons that might move him to mercy, and stand in the way of his justice: as now thus:

1. The many prayers of the saints. Justice must break through all the prayers of all the saints of God that are in such places; and this is not an easy matter. We account it not an easy matter to break through a mighty army. God cannot come to a people that he is related to, and is worshipped by, but he must break through an army, the army of the prayers of his people: now saith God, How shall I do it? a mighty array of the prayers of my people stands between me and them.

2. The little ones, yea, the children of his own people, in a place. You know when God was about to destroy Nineveh, he looked upon the many thousands that could "not discern between their right hand and their left hand," Jon. iv. 11. But when God comes to destroy a kingdom that worships him, he looks upon those many infants, and sees in many of them the posterity of his servants. As they are but little ones, that moves his bowels; they have not been guilty of those sins wherewith their parents have sinned: And as they are, many of them, the little ones of mine own precious servants, how shall I destroy this place, even for their sakes?

3. God considers that he has but little worship in the world. There are but few in the world who worship him at all; And though it is true there are such mixtures in worship here, that in respect of that I cannot accept of what they have done, yet it is somewhat that I am worshipped; there are very few in the world that own me to worship me at all.

4. Services formerly rendered to him in that place. True, thinks God, but few there honour me now, but there are many of my servants that have done much, and suffered much; how many have I that have stood out to witness for me, and my truth! Certainly, my brethren, the Lord, in saving any kingdom when in danger, if it be a place that he has been honoured in, and where his people have suffered much for his name's sake, then he remembers it: and there is not a louder argument, next to the blood of Jesus Christ, in the ears of God, to save a place from ruin, than the blood of his people that has been shed for him; and therefore such a place is beholden to all that have suffered there for God.

5. The remnant of his saints. Some are yet left. And would I have saved Sodom if there were but ten righteous persons? now I will reckon how many I have here; not ten, or a hundred, but (it may be) God shall find thousands of righteous persons. Now the blood of my Son pleads for them, and how then shall I give them up?

6. A foresight of the miseries of the afflicted. Oh! their very cries are in mine ears already. If I should deliver them up into the hand of their enemies, oh the extremity they would endure! how would they be plundered of all they have, put into prison, and miserably tormented! what shriekings and cries would there be, even from my people that serve me! Methinks mine ears are filled already with their cries beforehand. Often when we speak of the sorrows and miseries of people, before they come we are a little affected with them, but when we are eye-witnesses of them we are much more moved; as if any of you have seen the woeful miseries of those that have been under the power of their adversaries here, your hearts must have been affected indeed: but now all these miseries are present before God, as if they were now in real being, and therefore, "How shall I give thee up?"

7. The insulting triumph of the adversary. If I should deliver them, they will not honour me, they will blaspheme, they will scorn at their prayers and fastings, and at all their trusting in God, and at their good cause; What is become of your good cause, they will say, and of your so laying claim to God as you have done? Now the Lord foresees these blasphemies and insultings of the proud adversaries, how they will triumph, and tread upon his saints as dirt under their feet.

8. Many of mine elect are to come out of their loins, and therefore though I do not preserve the kingdom for their own sakes, yet for those elect ones that come out of their loins. If I should deliver them up to the rage of the enemy, then the line of my election would even be cut asunder, and therefore, "how can I give thee up?" I shall wrong myself in this thing, in giving them up I shall cut asunder even the very thread of election.

9. Other objects of wrath. If my wrath must be satisfied, let it run out upon others, "who will set the briers and thorns before me, that I may go through them and burn them up together."

10. The affliction of the saints is God's own affliction. True, they will suffer very much, but in all their afflictions I must be afflicted too; I foresee how their afflictions will affect mine own soul.

11. I am bound to fetch good out of all their evils. Suppose I should give them up; yea, but then I must work for mine own glory, and fetch out good from all their sufferings; and will it not be as easy for me to be patient towards them, as to work good from their sufferings when they are given up? God reasons in this manner.

12. If I destroy them, what glory shall I have? I shall have the glory of my justice; yea, but it will be but passively: and will that be much, to have justice so glorified? I have enough in hell to glorify my justice in a passive way.

13. Lastly, Mercy may yet work upon their hearts. Who knows but if yet I continue the gospel amongst them, and deliver them from their present great straits, who knows but their hearts may be turned to me?

O my brethren, I question not but at this day all these reasonings have been in the heart of God concerning England. When we have been at the very pit's brink, the Lord has been often saying even concerning England, "How shall I give thee up?" "how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together." Before the parliament, when forces were raised against our brethren of Scotland, then said the Lord, "How shall I give thee up?" And then at Edge Hill, and at Brainford, and at Newbury, and Marston Moor, and Nazeby fight, we were at every one of them even at the point of being delivered up to the rage of the enemy; and then came in these reasonings of the heart of God, Oh! how shall I make thee as other people, as Germany, or other nations? besides other mercies in former times, as in 1588, and the powder treason, these have been the workings of the bowels of God towards us, a poor, wretched, and sinful people. And let us now learn to acknowledge whence our preservation is. It is not from this man, and the other man, so much as from the reasonings of the heart of God thus for good to us-ward.

Hence let us learn what to do when temptation to any sin comes. What! is it thus with God? does God say when we are in danger of being destroyed, How shall I do this? Then when tempted to sin against God, let us say, How shall I do this, and sin against God? Joseph reasoned thus: when he had as fit an opportunity to sin as almost a man could have had, yet presently there came this reasoning into his heart, How shall "I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" Reason itself dictates this. When God has fit opportunities to destroy us, God's mercy reasons within him; so when we have our temptations to sin, our hearts should consider, Oh! how shall I do this, and sin against the Lord my God? Let us present to our souls every argument against sin. Men will gather pleas for their sins; and so we should gather all we possibly can against them. It were well, my brethren, if men after they have sinned would say, Oh! what have I done? But it is better if men before they have sinned would say, How shall I do it? Oh! certainly our minds are very barren, that we have not, upon every occasion when a temptation comes, pleadings within to move us against it. Indeed after a sin is committed, men then can think of this and the other reason. Oh! it would be ill for us if God should thus deal with us, first deliver us up and destroy us, and then think of this and that which might have been done to have preserved us: therefore God, just when the danger comes, thinks of every thing calculated to avert ruin from us; so, when the temptation to a sin comes, then should we think of every motive that might deter us from its commission.

Obs. 7. A choleric disposition is none of God's image. When God comes to execute anger he cannot do it, but he must have a How shall I do it? before he does it, he must make a stop. Proneness to anger, suddenness to let out wrath, is not the image of God in any man or woman.

When any of you are about to do any thing, especially against your brethren, against those to whom you are related, be not over-passionate, reason the case first in thine own heart: How shall I do this? True, I think they are in the wrong, but what good will result if I do thus and thus? Are they not those with whom I have had sweet converse, and whose godliness I have witnessed? Would it not be more for the honour of God if I forbore? Will any good come to the public? Shall not I rather serve the designs of the enemies with such sharpness and bitterness? will they not laugh and scorn at religion? Oh, how shall I do this? Oh, when we have workings in our own thoughts as bitter as gall, if, before we vent them, we would but put this question to ourselves, How shall I do this? by presenting all the arguments we possibly can to stop our anger, much good would result.

Yea, when ministers have prepared something to deliver, yet if there be any tartness in it, they should think, How shall I do this? what may come of it? I may vent myself, but what good will result? what glory to God? what advantage to the church? We should make many pauses, and many stops to our anger. As sometimes, when travelling in the country, you come upon some steep hill, you find that the countrymen lay here and there in several places something to turn the current of the water, for otherwise it would gore too much if it should run down swiftly, but when it has some stop it does not do so much hurt. Oh how does the anger of men gore deep! Why? Because it runs down headily, and violently, having nothing to stop it. Men in anger are very full of thoughts and resolutions, and all the reasonings of their hearts in their anger tend to nothing else but to heat their hearts more; all their thoughts work that way, till their hearts are made fiery hot, and so they burst out and cannot stay; they muse upon nothing else but that which may further their anger and displeasure: and those that are barren enough in their thoughts otherwise, yet are very quick in invention, and witty in the letting out of anger and wrath. But this would be your wisdom, had you the image of God prevailing in you, when you find anger stirring in your bosom, to rather muster up reasons that may qualify and allay it, and to muse upon those things which may serve to be a stop to it for the present, as God doth here. Oh! did men but pause, and say, How shall I do this? what peace and quiet might we have among us!

Obs. 8. Saints may be bold in seeking God in prayer. What! does God find it hard to him to execute wrath, does he muster up all possible arguments to stop his anger, and consider continually how he may manifest goodness and mercy? Why, then, if thou hast any arguments to plead with God for mercy, thou mayst come up with boldness and freedom to him; he is ready to receive thee, for thou bringest unto him that which is exceedingly suitable to him, suitable to his very heart. What! dost thou apprehend that the displeasure of God is out against thee, or against a land to which God is in any wise related? hast thou any arguments at all to plead with God in prayer? God gives his creature leave to plead with him, as if he were a man: come, then, with a free spirit, come cheerfully, and full of hope, for thou comest now to do that which God's heart is full of. Could a man know the thoughts of other men, and what most occupied their minds, and could he suggest thoughts to them suitable to what was passing within, what entertainment would he have! When a poor sinner, then, (if a penitent sinner,) comes to God, and suggests any arguments for mercy, I say thou dost suggest that of which the heart of God was full, and which is exceedingly suitable to it: thy pleadings mercy has been pleading already; and mercy carries on those arguments with a great deal more strength than thou art able to do, but it takes it well at thy hand to present any arguments to it. Thou art loth to perish, and God is as loth thou shouldst perish. If God give thee a heart to come to him to stop wrath, thou comest to him to do a work as acceptable to God as it can possibly be unto thee. When thou apprehendest judgment ready to be executed, look up to mercy; it may be the Holy Ghost may raise an act of faith, which will set on work the bowels of God's mercy. That which is very ready to work, a little thing will set on work; the least act of faith then would certainly constrain God to show mercy. Mercy has been pleading a great while, and justice pleading; mercy calls thee in to help, and to assist her to plead for thee, and who knows but the casting voice stays for thy coming in? though there have been pleadings in God's heart, yet the dispensations of God may be such that the casting voice shall not be given till thy pleadings are heard; by them the matter may be determined.

Obs. 9. How different were the dealings of the Father with his own Son. Do the bowels of God thus work towards poor sinners, pleading for them when wrath is ready to be executed; then we may here see the great difference between God's dealings with his saints and with his Son. When God comes to deliver up his people to punishment, for their sakes he saith, "How shall I deliver thee?" We do not find that God said so concerning his Son. God did deliver up his Son to wrath without a How shall I do it? yea, the heart of God was in it; there is no such expression of reluctancy about this work, but the Scripture saith that "it pleased the Lord to bruise him." Indeed it was for glorious ends which God had in view. Why so? God might have ends enough to bring forth his glory in our bruising: but yet, notwithstanding any thing that he might effect, he saith, How shall I do it? God doth not delight to grieve the children of men, but God did grieve his Son, he bruised him, and it pleased him to bruise him. You find such an expression in Isa. liii. 10; and in Psal. xl., "In the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will." It was the will of God that Christ should come and suffer what he did. When Ephraim was bemoaning himself, God's bowels were troubled within him, he lets the rod fall out of his hand; thus, in Jer. xxxi. 18—20, when Ephraim was bemoaning himself, mark how God's bowels of mercy work, but the Scripture saith, that "God spared not his own Son;" God would spare Ephraim. Jesus Christ did bemoan himself when he cried out, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me;" and, "O God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Oh what a bemoaning of himself was this! and yet in Rom. viii. 32, it is said, "He that spared not his own Son;" he did not spare him, notwithstanding all the moans that he made to him, but he delivered him up. We read here, and divers times in Scripture, of God's repenting of the execution of justice upon sinners; but when he speaks of Christ, "I have made him a Priest for ever;" that is, so as he should be a sacrifice, both the Priest to offer, and the sacrifice itself: in Heb. vii. 21, "The Lord sware, and will not repent." Oh, certainly it was from this work of God, the delivering up of his Son, that the Lord has such working of bowels towards sinners when wrath comes to be executed: "How shall I give thee up?"

Obs. 10. The saints that walk close with God must needs be very secure. If the Lord deal thus with rebellious sons, what will he do with a son that serves him, that walks close with him? Though a son be very vile, very sinful, yet there is a "How shall I give thee up?" O, then, thou whose conscience witnesses of thy sincere endeavour to walk close with God continually, know that thy estate must needs be secure.

Obs. 11. When God delivers up his own people to any judgments, it is for some weighty cause. Never does any affliction come to them, but it breaks through many reasonings of God's heart; God intends by it something great. Does judgment begin at the house of God? It is because the Lord has some great intents to bring forth, and not because the Lord takes pleasure in the moans of his people, in the sorrows and sufferings of his servants; for certainly these bowels of compassion would not let such sore and grievous evils pass, if there were not some great ends and purposes of God to bring about.

Obs. 12. There is a difference between the day of patience and the times of wrath. For the sake of the godly there God's patience speaks thus towards the body of the people, "How shall I give thee up?" But there is a time that God will laugh at the destruction of sinners, and "will mock when their fear cometh," when he will execute his wrath, and be comforted, as the Scripture speaks. There is a time indeed when God saith, "How shall I give them up?" but there is another time wherein God gives forth "the wine of his wrath," Rev. xiv. 10. "The wine;" it delights the Lord as wine does a man. When indignation shall be as wine to God, then mercy and patience shall hold their peace, for they have had then their glory already, they will never speak more; but turn over the sinner to justice, yea, plead to justice against the sinner.

Obs. 13. If God thus hastens not judgment against us, we should not hasten it against ourselves. But let us make use of these dealings of God for the breaking of our hearts, and causing them to return unto him; let not us assist justice to our own destruction; seeing mercy pleads against the execution of wrath, let us take heed of new provocations: when God ponders the letting out of his wrath, let not us pull it upon our own heads; seeing God keeps off, and forbears, let not us hasten it. If Sodom had but known God's reasonings with Abraham in its behalf, one would have thought it would have broken the very hearts of Sodom. And let us consider the reasonings of God in this, and lay them to our hearts to break them, and think thus with ourselves, Lord, why should it be so hard with thee to deliver me up, when it is so easy with me to sin against thee? No pleadings have stopped me in the course of my sin, the word has pleaded, conscience has often pleaded, but I have not been stopped; oh, why should any pleadings stop thee in the course of thy wrath? The Lord cause such workings to be in our hearts to break them, considering, that indeed it is through the pleadings of mercy that any of us are alive, that we are out of the nethermost hell. And thus much for those words, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel?" There follows,

Obs. 14. God's people are subject to as sore evils as the worst of men. "How shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?" Indeed, the sins of the saints have such great aggravations, that if God should deal with them according to a covenant of works, and not in a covenant of grace, their condition would be sadder than the vilest and most wicked. In Amos ix. 7, God saith, "Are ye not as the children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel?" You have had, indeed, deliverances, and so have they; and what are you better than the children of the Ethiopians unto me, if I should look upon you as in yourselves? Therefore in Isa. i. 10, the princes of Judah are called the "rulers of Sodom," and the people, the "people of Gomorrah." And in Lam. iv. 6, "The punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom." Ezek. xvi. 48, "As I live, saith the Lord God, Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters." "As I live;" God swears to it, that Sodom was not guilty of such great sins.

You will say, Yea, but we are delivered from such evils, by being under another covenant.

Yea, but that should not at all hinder the work of your humiliation, but rather further it, considering what you are in yourselves.

Obs. 15. When sinners are nearest to judgment, yet bowels of mercy are working towards them. When they deserve to be as Admah and Zeboim, even then, saith God, "How shall I give thee up? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?"

Obs. 16. Those that are in relation to God have a great privilege, which others have not. Thus, as if God should say, Let Admah and Zeboim perish if they will, let fire and brimstone come from heaven and eternal fire pursue them, what care I for Admah and Zeboim? but "how shall I make thee as Admah? and set thee as Zeboim?" I know not how to find in my heart to make thee so. Those in relation to God have a great privilege, which others have not; God disposes his mercies as he pleases.

It may be, some of you think that your sins are not so great, or not greater than the sins of others, and therefore you may escape as well as they. No, you may mistake in that; God may save some that are guilty of greater sins than you, and yet damn you, damn you for sins less than theirs. God's mercy is his own; if God will destroy Admah and Zeboim eternally, who can speak against God's dealings with them? But "how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?" God knows how to make a difference between man and man. Let none presume, and say, Because others commit as great sins as I, I may escape as well as they; no, thou reckonest in this without thine host; God may make a great difference between his dealings with them and with thee, and still do thee no wrong, for the mercies of God are his own.

Obs. 17. If God be unwilling to make his people like the wicked in punishment, let not them make themselves like to them in sin. Does God put a difference between reprobates and his people in punishment? Oh, let the saints then labour to put a difference between themselves and such as are of the world in respect of sin; let that be no argument to them, Such and such do thus, and why may not I do so too? that is no argument with God. I have destroyed such and such, and why may not I destroy thee? that argument will not prevail with God. Thou committest such a sin, and I have some in hell whom I sent thither for the same sin: this argument prevails not with God. O, let not such an argument prevail with thee, that because such and such sin, therefore thou too wilt venture.

Obs. 18. Though God be never so much inclined to mercy, yet this doth not hide from his eyes the sins of his own people. He still sees them, he sees what they are in themselves, and he sees what would become of them if they were left to themselves. Now I am in a way of mercy towards you, yet I look upon you now as such as have deserved to be as Admah and Zeboim: do not think that because my mercies work towards you, that therefore your sins are not before mine eyes; I know your iniquities, and yet am gracious and merciful.

And is it so? Neither then should the hope, or encouragement, of mercy from God, hide our sins from us. As the thoughts of God's mercies to us do not hide our sins from him, so our hope of mercy from God should not hide our sins from our own eyes; but at the very time we think of the greatest mercy, we should look upon ourselves as, in ourselves, the most wretched, miserable, forlorn creatures.

"Mine heart is turned within me."

The word הִתְּוֹךְ here translated "is turned" signifies some great stirring, some change into another condition, and not only denotes (as I see several interpreters observe) that God changes the sentence of his wrath, yet without any change in God's nature.

But I think the words besides have another special meaning, and that is, they denote the strong affections in God: in all this we must speak of him after the manner of men; as now, we know that strong affections in us, whether they be affections of love, or of joy, or of anger, carry the heart along with them, and cause in it very strong motions. I will give you one scripture that has this very phrase, which will show you the meaning is not "turned within me," that is, in a way of change, so much, as that it denotes the strong motions that are in the heart of God toward sinners: in Lam. i. 20, the church is lamenting her sin, and expressing the mighty workings of heart which she felt in herself by reason of her sin, and of her affliction, and there the same expression occurs that you have here: "I am in distress: my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me." The meaning there is not that I am changed in my heart, so as to be turned from my sin; but that I find a mighty moving in my heart, through the mighty workings of it, and the strong affections of my heart. You may make my heart to leap within me, (as we say sometimes,) or pant, or ache within me. Any kind of strong affections makes strong stirrings in the heart. So here, "my heart is turned within me," I find strong motions and mighty stirrings in my heart.

Obs. 19. Strong movings of the heart of a penitent after God, give strong encouragement to come to God, for there are strong motions in God's heart after him. "My heart is turned," there are mighty strong movings in my heart for mercy to you. Do you find such movings in your hearts as you never before were acquainted with? before your hearts lay dead, and dull, and nothing would stir them, and now you find them mightily moved; do your hearts work strongly towards God? be encouraged in those stirrings; there are as strong stirrings in God's heart towards sinners.

Obs. 20. Let arguments of obedience to God cause stirrings in our hearts; let them not lie dead and dull within us. As arguments for mercy, oh how stirring are they in God's heart! If any argument for mercy toward sinners be propounded, the heart of God mightily stirs. Oh what arguments do you often meet with coming from the word, which one would think might work upon the heart of a devil to draw to obedience, and yet your hearts lie dead and dull under all those powerful arguments! Oh how unsuitable are your hearts to God! Do you expect that God's heart should work strongly towards you to do you good, and yet nothing stir in you?

Obs. 21. Let us not think it too much to have our hearts turned from strong resolutions to do evil. "Mine heart is turned within me," turned in respect of the revoking of the sentence. Men often have strong resolutions to a thing, and they see arguments that might turn them, but yet, they have resolved, and they are loth to change their thoughts and resolutions: oh! take heed of this, for God expresses himself after the manner of men. There have been many times strong resolutions found to destroy thee eternally, but the Lord does that which man would do when he changes his resolutions, though there be no change in God's nature; and he would, by expressing himself after this manner to us, inculcate this, that we should take heed we stand not upon our resolutions when there are arguments to the contrary, but be willing to have it known that now we are otherwise minded than before.

"My repentings are kindled together."

Surely God repents not as man does. You know the answer of divines, viz. that his administrations are such as if he did repent: but the word נחמו here translated "repentings," comes from נחם which signifies as well to comfort as to repent, noting that repentance and comfort are very near akin one to another: as the Hebrews express sin and punishment by the same word שחח so they do repentance and comfort.

"Are kindled." My bowels yearn within me; which expression you have in Gen. xliii. 30, Joseph's "bowels did yearn upon his brother;" and 1 Kings iii. 26, when the mother of the child said it would be cut to pieces, "her bowels yearned upon her son:" the word "yearned" there is the same here with "kindled," her bowels kindled within her.

"Are kindled together."

Whatsoever might cause any repentings, they all come together, they lie glowing at the heart. The notes are these:

Obs. 22. God's repentings are mighty encouragements to prayer. When we present arguments to God for mercy, to think, that those arguments which we present, and all other that possibly may be presented, lie glowing at God's heart, yea, they lie glowing warm at the heart of God; they are not only before God, but there they lie as a number of sticks collected together and glowing, and ready to flame out; so all considerations that any way may serve to benefit the saints, do lie glowing together at the heart of God. It may be sometimes, when we come in prayer, alas! we are straitened in our own bowels, perhaps we cannot express ourselves, it may be but in one or two particulars we are able to give vent to our feelings, and that which comes out of our hearts comes very cold; but when we are straitened in our own bowels, and can express but little for ourselves, if we be such as belong to God's covenant, we must know that all considerations for our good that possibly men and angels can express, are all with God, all of them lay in a heat at God's heart. I do not know such a full expression as this is of repentings kindled: "kindled together."

Obs. 23. We must gather together as many arguments as we can to kindle repentance within us. Surely there is all the reason for it in the world. Does the Lord gather all together that may be for our good, and lay them upon his heart, and there keep them till they kindle and work powerfully upon his heart for our good? then, when we would repent, (for there is reason that we should repent as well as expect that God should for us,) we should be gathering all arguments we possibly can, and never leave till we find them kindled and warm at our hearts.

Oh! many of you have sometimes one argument that sticks at your hearts, and at another time another; at such a time some one truth darted in, and took possession of your hearts, and you would say as those that went to Emmaus, Did not we find our hearts burn within us? So you found truths coming in successively at such sermons. Yea, but now could you get but all the arguments for repentance that ever God darted into you together, and work them upon your hearts, and never leave till they be kindled, and continue crying to God, as Elisha did, till he got fire to come from heaven to consume the sacrifice; O Lord, my heart has a deal of watery stuff in it, that will not kindle, till the fire of the Holy Ghost descends; oh that it were with us, as David in Psal. xxxix. 3, "My heart was hot within me, while I was musing the fire burned:" so we should go into our closets, and gathering all things together that we can, to work upon our hearts, continue musing till we find the fire burning within us; nay, our hearts so inflamed, as to break forth with our tongues, to say, The Lord, he is God, he is worthy for ever to be feared, and honoured, and served; I have lived like a base and sinful, wretched creature, without a God in the world, but the Lord is God, and worthy to be honoured with my body, and soul, and estate, with my name, and liberty, and life, and whatsoever I am, or can do: now if it would break forth in such a resolution, how excellent would it be! Oh! let us be humbled, I beseech you, for the coldness of our hearts, that nothing can kindle there. What a damp is there upon our spirits, that when any argument is laid it goes out presently! We have truths laid upon us when we come to the word, but our damp hearts quench them all, they do not kindle. Many are witty enough to gather arguments for sin, and lay them upon their hearts, and so to kindle wickedness within; as in Psal. xli. 6, where you have a notable scripture of wicked men that came to David; "If he come to see me, he speaketh vanity: his heart gathereth iniquity to itself; when he goeth abroad he telleth it." All things that might suit with their wicked hearts, and for the furtherance of their ungodly ways, they gathered together for the encouraging and strengthening of themselves in their wickedness: so it should be the care of the saints to gather all things that might further repentance in them. That is the reason why wicked men are so hot in that which is evil, they gather arguments together; and hence it is that wicked men, when they have been in wicked company, come from it so hot in their resolutions to sin; why? because they have gathered a great deal together to inflame their hearts: and so should the saints, when together in holy communion and felowship, be gathering one from another, every one should afford something to lay (as it were) to kindle the fire. But how? Laying their light ends together, and not their dead ends.

Obs. 24. Our mercies to others should not be cold, but burning. Let us be merciful, as our heavenly Father is merciful; that is, not only wishing good to others, but let there be kindled mercies within us so ardent that we may not be able to confine them. I suppose many of you, especially of estates, have had many thoughts that you would do this and this for such good uses, and you see some reason why it should be so; yea, but now, have these arguments burnt in your hearts, so as to cause you to break forth into resolutions? Well, though I have had thoughts and inclinations to make use of my estate thus and thus, yet I have been kept off; but now they are kindled in my heart, and I am resolved upon it. Thus it was with God, and let it be so with you.

Ver. 9. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim: for I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee: and I will not enter into the city.

"I will not execute the fierceness," the burning, "of mine anger," הרין אפי

True, your sins, and arguments against you, did lie at my heart, and did even burn it; but I will not execute that; I will execute the kindling of my mercy, but not the kindling of mine anger. Mark the several phrases, "repentings are kindled" in the way of mercy, and wrath is kindled; there was burning wrath, and burning mercy, but that which prevails is, the burning mercy. I will not execute the burning of mine anger. Why? For "my repentings are kindled together."

But how was this true? Was not Israel carried into captivity, and continued there many years, and never yet returned again (as some think); and when they were carried into captivity, for three years together there was a siege at the city? and yet God saith here, "I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger."

That which before was said, will sufficiently answer this: "How shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?" that is, though God did suffer them to be carried away captive, and their enemies prevailed against them, yet he did not make them as Admah, nor set them as Zeboim; the fierceness of God's anger, the burning of the anger of God, was not out against them. And, even in their carrying into captivity, the Lord had respect to his elect ones, and to this very day he purposes to do them good: and so we shall find in the next verse, that there is a promise of their returning from their captivity; and, therefore, though they were for a long time to continue there, yet still God did "not execute the fierceness of his anger."

Sin indeed stirs up anger, and fierce anger, in God. The Septuagint translate the words thus, Ὁδὲ μὴ ποιήσω κατὰ τὴν ὀργὴν τοῦ θυμοῦ μου, I will not do according to the anger of my wrath; that is, in extremity, I will not do thus with you. There were mighty stirrings in God's heart, pleadings of justice and pleadings of mercy, but God's mercy overcomes, gets the day, as it were; mercy triumphs over justice.

Obs. 1. The stirrings of mercy in our hearts should rather prevail with us than the stirrings of wrath. When we have workings this way and that way, we should consider which is the most benign side. The arguments had need be very much stronger for wrath than for mercy: if the arguments have any equality, or nearly any equality, in them, certainly the arguments for mercy should prevail: they do so with God's heart; O, be you like God in this.

Obs. 2. Stirrings for God should rather prevail with us than temptations to sin. Have not you found it thus many times in yourselves? You have had stirrings in your hearts to certain duties, and at the same time temptations to certain sins; now I put it to your consciences, as in the name of God, cannot you tell how the temptations to sin have often got the day? You have been rather carried from God to your base, sinful lusts, and your conscience has been overcome; conscience has pulled, and the drawings of the Spirit have been very powerful, but yet temptations have been more powerful, and you have yielded: oh, be ashamed of this, that it should ever be said, that, at such a time, conscience and temptations strove together within you, and temptations overcame conscience.

Obs. 3. God's mercies do not free his people from all fruits of displeasure. "I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger." My brethren, this is not meant merely of the times of the law; for this anger of God upon them is to this very day. But yet it is not "fierceness of anger," like that of Admah and Zeboim: there are, doubtless, among them the elect ones of God at this day. God will not have this called "the fierceness of anger:" it is displeasure, it is captivity, long captivity; they are a reproach and a by-word to the world; and yet there has not fallen on them "fierceness of anger." Our discontented hearts are ready to call every little affliction "fierceness of anger:" Oh how fierce is God! if we suffer ever so little. Yet did we indeed but know what anger our sins deserve, we would learn not to call every affliction that is upon us, no, nor our greatest afflictions, "fierceness of anger."

Obs. 4. We should acknowledge mercy, though we suffer hard things. If yet we be not utterly, nor everlastingly, cast off, let us acknowledge mercy. It is a mercy that "my repentings are kindled." "I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger." Why? Because they were not as Admah and Zeboim.

Let us then all learn this, Whatsoever afflictions are this day upon us, though it may be we are ready each of us to think our own afflictions to be the greatest of all, yet learn thou, I say, to bless God that fire has not been rained from heaven to consume thee and thy family; for this might have been thy portion, this "fierceness of anger."

"I will not return to destroy Ephraim."

God here compares himself to a captain that comes with his soldiers to a town. I suppose many in this place may easily understand the meaning of this word, by what they have seen and felt themselves. Soldiers come to a town, pillage, and leave it; and so the poor people think, Soldiers have been here, and we hope we shall do well enough now, as the worst is over: but it may be, within a month or two after the same soldiers come again, and utterly ruin the place and strip them of all. But now saith God, "I will not return to destroy Ephraim;" that is, Though I lay my hand upon them, and afflict them, and take away many comforts from them, yet when I have done that, there I will leave them, I will not come back again with a purpose utterly to ruin them; this I might do, I might return upon them with one evil upon another, but I will not do so.

Obs. 5. Sinners should not be secure when some evil is upon them, and think now they know the worst. No, God may justly return upon them again and again. If thou turnest not to God under thy affliction, God may justly return upon thee to ruin thee. Indeed, if thy afflictions have been such as have caused thy heart to return to God, thou mayst then hope that God will not return upon thee; but if so be thou behavest thyself frowardly under thy afflictions, thou mayst justly expect the return of God.

Obs. 6. God is very gracious to his people when evil is upon them. He will not add and add sorrow till Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth," &c. Now here Moses refers to this, and lays hold upon it, as if he should say, O Lord, was not there a time that I was pleading with thee? and didst not thou promise to show me thy glory? and was it not "the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin." Why now, Lord, manifest thy glory; now, Lord, show thyself to be a glorious God. In doing what? Mark the 19th verse of that chapter of Numbers, "Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people:" such is God's glory, and such the manifestation of his power. One would think that the power of God should rather be manifested in the destruction of sinners; no, the power of God is manifested in mercy rather than in misery and destruction: and we find, that those who come nearest to God are the most loving, and gracious, and merciful; yea, if they do but come near to God as far as possibly natural men may, their conformity appears in their love, forbearance, meekness, and gentleness. Even the heathens could say, The greater any one is, the more placable is his anger; a generous mind is not easily moved. And so they compare the lion, and bears, and wolves together: The lion, said they, is a magnanimous creature, therefore it is enough to fall down before it; but for wolves and bears, they insult over the prostrate; so those who have the most magnanimous spirits have likewise patient, and forgiving, and pardoning spirits. This note is as cross to a carnal heart as it almost possibly can be, I mean, to one who gives way to the lusts of his passion, for he thinks himself only magnanimous when he can vent his anger; often, were it not for the dread of being accounted a fool, he would forbear his anger. Yet know this, anger is not thy honour; it makes thee base in the eyes of thy servants, and children, and wife; it makes them look upon thee and despise thee, when they see thee coming into thy house like a mad fool, and drunken, as it were, with thy passion.

6. If God were like man, sinners could not be borne. As if God should say, The truth is, your sins were such as, were not I God, it were impossible that I could bear: for so it is, though we think not of it; the evil of sin is so great, that if all the patience, in all the men that ever existed since the world began, were combined in one man, if he knew the great evil that there is in sin, he would destroy the world, he would not forbear, if his heart were but holy, as God is holy: "The Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee."

Obs. 7. It is a good way to exercise faith in God's mercy, to look upon God as God, as a Being beyond us, beyond any creature; for so this is therefore expressed, to the end that the people of God might exercise faith in beholding God as God. That is the way to help thee in thy faith: wouldst thou exercise faith upon God? look upon him as God, and do not conceive him to be as a man. It is true, to look upon him sometimes as a compassionate man is a little help, but that will not always suffice. Perhaps it would help a little some that are here to reflect thus: If thou hadst to deal with the most merciful man that ever lived upon the face of the earth, wouldst not thou hope then that thou mightest be saved if he had the disposal of thy eternal state? Suppose there were a judge of the most tender spirit in the world, and all the relentings that ever were in all men's hearts met in him; if this judge had the disposal of thy eternal state, thou wouldst hope for mercy: but would it not help thee to know thou hadst to deal with one infinitely above that judge? That judge were a cruel tyrant, a savage tiger, in comparison of this God. God is "God, and not man," he is infinitely above man in the ways of his mercy.

Many times by looking on God as ourselves we are first bold in sin, and afterwards sink down in despair in our sin. So in Psal. l. 21, "Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as thyself," saith God; that is, because I was patient and long-suffering towards thee, thou thoughtest I was like a man. A man, though he be a little offended, you think you may please him again; and so you thought I was like to yourselves, therefore you went on in your sins. This is one of the devil's stratagems: he first makes us look upon God like ourselves, and so we think that God has no greater hatred to sin than we have; but then, when we have once committed the sin, and the devil would tempt to despair, he makes us look to God as like to ourselves; that is thus, I find that I could not forgive such a one if he had so wronged me; and therefore from God they expect no mercy, regarding God as like to man, nay, like a corrupt man. Oh what a dishonour is this to God, that because thou thyself hast such a froward, perverse, cruel heart, that thou canst not forgive, thou therefore lookest upon God as if it were as hard for him to forgive as for thee! My brethren, the looking upon God as God, would help against many discouraging thoughts in poor sinners: as thus,

1. My sins are very great; men will forgive little offences, but God is "God, and not man," and therefore great mercies are little in comparison to him.

2. I have sinned against many offers of mercy; but God is "God, and not man," and God's mercy is such as brings in men that have refused the offers of mercy.

3. None is so sinful as I; but God is "God, and not man," and therefore he is above thee in the ways of his mercy: God has more mercy yet than ever he did manifest to any one creature in the world, and though I be the vilest of all sinners, yet let me look upon God as "God, and not man."

4. I am unworthy of any mercy from God. Indeed, if you had to deal with a man it might hinder; but God is "God, and not man," therefore it is not unworthiness that hinders mercy in God, mercy pleases God.

5. I am like to be of no use to God. True, if you were to deal with a man, he might not be pleased; but God stands in no need of you, or of any of his creatures, for he is, "God, and not man;" thou dost not honour God, as God, if thou dost not cast thy soul upon his mercy, as the mercy of God.

If I put this to thee, I hope the glory of it will be so great as will keep it from being abused. What! dost thou think thy condition is grievous? but dost thou think that such mercy as this which now I am naming would not serve the turn, that thou shouldst have such mercy as an infinite God should therefore manifest, to that end that he might show to men and angels to all eternity, what the power of his infinite mercy can do? Would not this mercy serve thy turn, such a mercy as is spoken of, Eph. ii. 4-7? I will name it again, abuse it at your peril: suppose thy condition so low, yet would not this serve thy turn, such mercy as an infinite God would show, to that end that he might make appear to men and angels to all eternity, what he is able to do in the infiniteness of his mercy? would not this serve thee, and help thee, and heal thee? Now this is tendered to thee in the gospel, even in Christ as an object of thy faith; and the very presenting of this is a work of the ministry of the gospel, that it might draw acts of faith, for it has a power to draw forth faith, yea, to beget faith; the very presenting such a thing as this is, has a quickening power in it. True, if you look upon God only as a merciful man, the glory is not such as that the shining of it upon the soul will add life: as now, the shining of the moon, or a hundred torches, will never beget life in a garden, but the shining of the sun will do it; so the apprehending of the mercy of God any other way but as God, as God in Christ, will never beget life in the soul. Look then on him in the infiniteness of his mercy, whose thoughts of mercy are beyond ours, as high as the heavens are above the earth; this is the way to beget faith. Therefore those who cannot believe take very ill courses for themselves, whilst they dwell only on such things as may discourage them, and think that this is pleasing to God: certainly the way to beget or raise faith in thy heart is, to look upon God as God in Christ.

Yea, but you will say, The truth is, that that you speak of, that God is "God, and not man," is rather a discouragement to my heart; it is God that I have sinned against, and not man: as in one sense it may encourage, so in another it discourages me: "Against thee, thee only have I sinned," saith David, Psal. li. And, indeed, this is the most piercing thought in a truly penitent heart, My sin is against God; I have lived so long without God, and in my sins have struck at God himself. Oh, wretch that I have been! I have been guilty of darkening the glory of the great God in the world. Now I will answer thee this in a word.

And is this that which aggravates thy sin in thy heart? Does this work upon thy heart most? Canst thou appeal to God, that of all the considerations of sin that ever thou hadst in thy life, nothing grieves thee so much, as that it is committed against God, because God is so glorious, so infinitely worthy of honour from all his creatures? Be of good comfort, and take encouragement from this point, and mark what I am saying; and with that I shall close all:

If the consideration of the glory of God above man thus aggravates thy sin to thy humiliation, then it will aggravate the mercy of God to thy consolation as well. If thou workest this thought upon thy heart, My sin is against "God, and not man," and therefore my heart is humbled; then the Lord would have thee to make use of the consideration of his glory as a God for thy comfort: God is "God, and not man," in the dispensations of his mercy.

"The Holy One in the midst of thee." God glories much in his holiness, and that in the midst of his people.

God is here said to be "the Holy One,"

To show that the anger he would let out should be unmixed with evil; that what considerations might be required to order and guide it should not be wanting. Men's angers are very unclean, there is much smoke and filthy stuff in the fire of their wrath. But in Exod. xv. 11, God is said to be "glorious in holiness;" and in Rev. xv. 7, God's vials of wrath are "golden vials."

Let us labour to be holy in our anger. This is a rare thing: if there be any corruption in man's heart it usually appears in his anger.

Obs. 8. God delights to show the glory of his holiness in mercy, and in pardoning rather than in avenging sin.

Obs. 9. God's faithfulness is a special part of the glory of his holiness.

Hence see how holiness will help our faith. And we should learn to manifest our holiness in our faithfulness. I am holy to make them holy, to sanctify them to myself.

"In the midst of thee." Casting the beams of his glory on every side of him.

But how "in the midst," when they were so vile, and cast off from being his people, a sink of idolatry and wickedness? "In the midst," in respect of some of his elect saints.

Obs. 10. God continues among a people for his elect's sake. The saints should consider of God, a holy God in the midst of them, and accordingly behave themselves. Lev. xxvi. 12, "I will walk among you, and will be your God, and ye shall be my people." And 2 Cor. vi. 16, speaks of a union still closer, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them."

Obs. 11. Men of place and government should be in the midst of those that are under them, carrying themselves holly; yea, though those subject to them should be froward, pettish, and sinful, yet they should carry themselves according to rule in all holiness, gravity, wisdom, and moderation.

Rivet, Ternovius, and some others, think that here is enallage numeri, a change of the number, holy, for holy ones, or saints: rendered so it would refer to the destruction of Sodom; there were no righteous, here are "the holy ones in the midst of thee."

Obs. 12. The saints are of great use where they live. They are the cause of mitigation of judgments.

"And I will not enter into the city."

Luther thus, God would signify himself to be merciful to scattered Israel among the Gentiles, ut tamen non redeant ad politiam Mosaicam, but so that they should not return to the Mosaical law.

But it is rather to be taken in reference to the manner of God's proceedings in the destruction of Sodom; after he had done conferring with Abraham, he entered into the city, and destroyed it by fire and brimstone.

Obs. 13. God many times stands at the gates of a city, ready to enter in and destroy it, but humiliation in prayer, and reformation, keep him out.

God has not yet entered thus in here. Oh! let not our sins cause a merciful God to go out, and a provoked God to enter in.

Ver. 10. They shall walk after the Lord: he shall roar like a lion: when he shall roar, then the children shall tremble from the west.

"They shall walk after the Lord."

They shall not walk after their own inventions any more, nor after the lusts of their own hearts, nor after the examples or counsels of men, but after the Lord; they shall see God before them, their hearts shall be drawn after him; as they shall see God in his various administrations, so they shall turn. Which way soever God leads them, though in paths they have not known before, and in which few others walk, yet "they shall walk after the Lord."

In difficult paths, though never so dangerous to outward appearance; yea, though God should lead them from their dearest comforts, their sweetest contents, and though it do not appear to them whither the way tends, what God means to do with them; yet, seeing God before them, they shall be willing to walk after him. They shall account the way in which God is, the best, the safest, and the most comfortable. "These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first-fruits unto God and to the Lamb," Rev. xiv. 4. "They shall walk" in a constant, steady course of obedience, "after the Lord."

It is the Lord, the blessed, glorious God, whom their souls love; whom they desire to honour; to whom they have given up souls, bodies, lives, liberties, names, estates, whatsoever they are, have, or are able to do. When Peter heard it was the Lord, he threw himself into the sea, that he might walk after him there. Thus the soul converted to God loves to walk after God.

"They shall walk after the Lord." This may be spoken of the church, as walking after the Lord in times of reformation, especially that famous "time of the restitution of all things," when God shall call home his people, the ten tribes, who yet are scattered up and down, wandering and groping in darkness. "They shall walk after the Lord;" the Lord shall be a Captain to them, leading them along as his redeemed ones, working by them glorious things in the earth, and bringing them through all opposition to places of rest, and fullness of all good. God shall appear in such visible administrations of his mighty power, that they shall say, Lo, this is our God, this is the Captain of the host of the Lord, yea, it is even the Lord himself; we will join together and follow him, whose wisdom, faithfulness, and courage is infinite; we will follow no other but him, and be in subordination to none else. The sight of such a Captain going before them shall put life, courage, and magnanimity into them, whatsoever they were before. Hence,

Obs. 1. It is the infinite goodness of the Lord, to be the Captain of his people.

Obs. 2. It is the honour, safety, happiness of the saints, to have God before them, to be walking after him.

"He shall roar like a lion."

If God appear thus it will make them fly from him. No, they shall, notwithstanding this, walk after him.

Obs. 3. The awful majesty of God, in his wonderful and dreadful works, causes the wicked, guilty conscience to fly from him; but the saints shall follow after, and cling to him. Isa. xxxiii. 14, 15, "The sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites. Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly." Acts v. 13, 14, "And of the rest durst no man join himself to them: but the people magnified them. And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women." Psal. xli. (Luther's Psalm) ver. 2, 3, "Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." Ver. 6, "The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted." But, ver. 7, "The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." Nahum i. 2, "God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries." Ver. 3, "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm." Ver. 5, 6, "The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein. Who can stand before his indignation? and who can abide in the fierceness of his anger? his fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him." Now mark ver. 7, "The Lord is good, a strong hold in the day of trouble; and he knoweth them that trust in him." Joel iii. 15, 16, "The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Hab. iii. 17, 18, "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, &c., "yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation."

Oh the blessing of a clean conscience! it looks on the terror of the law, and of God, with comfort. Where there is neighing of horses, beating of drums, rattling of pikes, roaring of cannons, yet if a friend be the general, we fear not. All the terror there is in God, is comfort to the saints; the wicked have the dark side of the cloud, the saints the bright. Deut. xxxiii. 2, "He came with ten thousands of saints: from his right hand went a fiery law for them." Ver. 4, "Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob." Neh. ix. 32, "Now therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who keepest covenant and mercy." Psal. xlvii. 1, 2, "O clap your hands, all ye people; shout unto God with the voice of triumph. For the Lord most high is terrible."

Be godly, and keep conscience clean, in these latter times; train up your children in ways of godliness.

"He shall roar like a lion." The roaring of the lion, Plutarch saith, invites the rest of the beasts, there is something for them.

But when was this? Many think, when the Babylonian monarchy was broken by Cyrus; then Belshazzar's knees beat together, and then the captivity returned, and divers of the ten tribes joined in the return. But this is spoken of the body of them; and if any such remarkable return had taken place, Ezra would not have left out their genealogies.

Others refer it to the times of the gospel, Heb. xii. 26, "Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven." The voice of the gospel, "Repent," and, "He that believeth shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," was a terrible voice. When secure minds (saith Luther) hear that salvation belongs to none but those that are baptized, and that believe in the name of Christ, they indeed tremble, and are solicitous concerning their future state. When Junius read the first chapter of the Gospel of John he was terrified.

But I take this to be meant rather of some notable work of reformation and calling in of these ten tribes to join with the church. The Lord will roar to terrify the hearts of their adversaries, that they shall not be able to hinder their return. Hence,

Obs. 4. When God's time is come for a thorough reformation in the world, he will make the earth tremble. Psal. cii. 16, "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." It has been his way in his appearing for his church: Psal. lxxvi. 7—9, "Thou, even thou, art to be feared: and who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry? Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven: the earth feared, and was still, when God arose to judgment, to save all the meek of the earth." Ver. 12, "He shall cut off the spirit of princes; he is terrible to the kings of the earth." Isa. xxxiv. 4, "All the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree." Ver. 5, "For my sword shall be bathed in heaven." Ver. 6, "The sword of the Lord is filled with blood, it is made fat with fatness." Ver. 7, "Their land shall be soaked with blood." Ver. 8, "For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion." Ezek. xvii. 10, "Shall it not utterly wither, when the east wind toucheth it?"

At the raising of Christ's kingdom, "Thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things," Psal. xlv. 4. "The kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens, and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb," Rev. vi. 15, 16. "There shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation: and at that time thy people shall be delivered," Dan. xii. 1. As when Egypt was smitten there were signs and prodigies, so now, in all places, admirable wonders in all the elements of the world; because,

1. The ungodly have been cruel against the saints: Psal. lxxiv. 4, "Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregations."

2. The wicked will be secure, yea, his own people and will stand in need of roaring to awaken them.

3. The adversary will be stout and proud: Confundetur omne jus, et leges peribunt, All right will be overturned, and laws perish.

4. The difficulties will be great, so that Christ asks if he "shall find faith on the earth" at his coming, faith that ever his work shall be brought about, Luke xviii. 8. There will be mighty changes of things. Hence,

Obs. 5. God can soon make mighty alterations. Despair not then, though wicked men strengthen themselves never so much. "Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible," Neh. iv. 14. "Thou shalt not be affrighted at them: for the Lord thy God is among you, a mighty God and terrible," Deut. vii. 21.

Obs. 6. We should learn to prepare for those times. "When he shall roar, then the children shall tremble from the west."

"The lion hath roared, who will not fear?" Amos iii. 8. There shall be mighty stirrings of heart; men's hearts shall shake within them, so that there shall be way made for people whose hearts are awakened to come into the church. The enemies shall be struck with such astonishment, that they shall not hinder; their violence and rage shall be abated. They shall say, as did once the Egyptians, Let us take heed what we do, the Lord fights for them.

And the hearts of those whom God intends to call shall be awakened, the slighthness and vanity of their spirits shall be taken away. The awe on their hearts shall make them fear; they shall be roused from their sluggishness; they shall make haste to come in to join with the people of God. Fear causes haste, so the word used here signifies, and it is so rendered by some. Men delay and trifle, till God strikes their hearts with fear. Spiritus Sanctus nescit tarda molimina, The Holy Ghost likes not lazy labouring. "Thy children shall make haste," Isa. xlix. 17.

"Then the children shall tremble from the west."

Those afar off, which were most unlikely. "The isles shall wait for his law," Isa. xlii. 4. The Mediterranean, the mid-land sea, is in the west. See Isa. xlix. 1, 12. Hence,

Obs. 7. There are like to be great stirrings in the western parts in the times referred to here by the prophet.

Ver. 11. They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria: and I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord.

"They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt;" being struck with fear they shall hasten, so the original may signify.

This some think was fulfilled when divers of the ten tribes joined with Judah in their return from captivity, for the monarchy of the Assyrians was subdued by the Persians, whose king was Cyrus. Therefore it is thought that the same liberty was given in Assyria for the ten tribes, as in Babylon for Judah. And not long after, Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, overcame the Egyptians, Herodotus, lib. 8, and Justin, lib. 10. And it is likely that he would be favourable to the ten tribes, as his father had been to Judah.

But Ezra, as was noted above, in likelihood would not then have omitted their genealogies. However, in the great restoration of things, this will be fulfilled. The Jews were strongly set to go to Egypt; now they shall as strongly desire to get out, to join with the churches; fly as a bird, not come as a snail; get over all difficulties; their elevated spirits raising them, they consider not earthly, drossy things. Now all their desire is to join with the saints, that they together with them may "walk after the Lord."

"And as a dove out of the land of Assyria."

1. Doves are sacred there, Euseb. Preparat. Evang. lib. 8. 5.

2. They are terrified with the least noise. Terretur minimo pene stridore columba.

3. Doves fly swiftly. "Oh that I had wings like a dove!" saith the psalmist, Psal. lv. 6.

4. They fly by flocks. "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" Isa. lx. 8.

5. It may be doves migrate from Assyria at certain times of the year, as several sorts of fowls do with us in their seasons.

"And I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord;" that is, I will provide lockers for them: he follows the former metaphor of doves.

God's people have been tossed up and down, they have had no abiding in their houses. But "I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord." Hence,

Obs. 1. God has his time to place his people in their own houses in rest, quietness, and safety; to deliver them from violence and wrong. "Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more," 2 Sam. vii. 10.

Obs. 2. It is a good work to be instrumental in providing, that those who live godly and are peaceable may abide quietly in their houses, and not be tossed up and down, because they cannot conform their belief or practice to others' standard. The tossing such up and down, though it may be from a zeal for Christ, yet Christ will never own.

Obs. 3. They that "walk after the Lord," shall be placed in their houses. They were willing to leave their houses that they might follow him, and now God places them in them.

Learn, then, to trust God with your houses, resolve to follow the Lord whithersoever he goes; he has a time to place his people in their houses, when others, who dared not trust God, shall wander in darkness.

Obs. 4. This must be the work of the Lord, it is only he can do it. "Saith the Lord." That mercy that comes beyond all means, it is the sweetest mercy. No matter what the means be, whether any or no, so that you have a word of God for the thing.

Ver. 12. Ephraim compasseth me about with lies, and the house of Israel with deceit: but Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints.

The Lord having manifested the bowels of his tender compassion towards Ephraim, the ten tribes, proceeds further to show what was that which stopped the way and course of his grace, of the grace that otherwise might have been let out unto them.

"Ephraim compasseth me about with lies, and the house of Israel with deceit." עֲבָרָה besets me round with lies; I am, in respect of the sin of Ephraim, (that is, of the governors,) and of the house of Israel, (that is, the people,) I am, in respect of their sins, as a man beset round, who would have egress, but when he goes one way, there he is stopped, and another way, he is stopped there too. God compares himself to such a man, as if, in going on in the ways of mercy, he is there stopped by some course of sin, and entering on another path, he is there stopped again.

"Ephraim compasseth me about with lies;" that is, with false worship, for that is a lie with false pretences; they put fair glosses upon things, but all are but lies; they have beset me with politic shifts of their own devising.

These did beset God, yea, and beset the prophet too, for so I find some turn it; they think it is spoken as in the person of the prophet, the prophet complaining that he was beset with lies; that they might, as far as they could, prejudice his ministry, and take off its power in their hearts, they beset him with lies, with false reports of this and the other thing. Upon which one has that note: A faithful divine, a preacher, is nothing else but, as it were, a centre to which all the lines of falsehood tend; it is a great plot of the devil to draw his lines, and to let them make the ministers of God (whom God uses as any instruments of good unto his people) to be as the centre of them all.

But I rather take it as spoken in the name and person of God. "Ephraim compasseth me about with lies;" that is, they not only seek to blind men, but they would (if it were possible) deceive me, saith God. And indeed, when men seek to blind their own consciences, what do they but seek to deceive God? In the very act of worship (saith God) they are false; they profess honour and service to God, but they lie unto him, even when they are worshipping him.

Obs. 1. Many in their prayers, in the solemn act of worship, beset God with lies. Oh how many come into the presence of God, and there profess to God to acknowledge his greatness, his glory, his majesty, his power, his sovereignty, his dominion over them, and profess a great deal of fear of the name of God! and yet God knows it is not in their hearts, it is but as a lie to God. When they are worshipping God, they acknowledge their sin, and judge themselves for their sin, as if they were very much humbled and troubled on account of it; but God knows that all this is but a lie, there is no such humiliation of their hearts before God as their expressions would seem to convey: especially when they are the mouth-pieces of others, they cry to God for grace, and would fain above all things in the world have his grace; but God knows it is but a lie, all their prayers are even a besetting God with lies.

O, consider how far any of you, especially in praying with others, have been guilty of this, which is so marked with condemnation. Psal. lxxviii. 36. "They did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues." The word פתרוהו translated "flattered," signifies deceived. They deceived him with their mouth.

Why, can God be deceived?

No; but they did what lay in them to deceive him; if it were possible for God to have been deceived they would have deceived him. No marvel though men deceive men as they do: many that are of upright hearts, wonder when they hear that men's spirits can be so false; no marvel, I say, when God himself complains of being deceived by them; that is, they are so false, and do so beset God with lies, that, if it were possible, he himself should be deceived.

Obs. 2. Many also beset the business and affairs that they manage with lies. That is, thus, they plot with themselves how they may bandsomely contrive to put together a goodly number of lies, that so they may beset men's understandings. There are such cunning attempts in the world to beset the understandings of men, that men shall not know what to say to things; and yet, whilst they cannot tell how to believe them, neither do they know what to say, things are so contrived. Deceitful men think with themselves, If such a thing shall be questioned, then I have such a shift to put it off; and if another thing shall be doubted of, then I have such a report, and such a fair pretence, to make it good. And thus they beset businesses with lies, and beset men's understandings.

"But Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints."

This of Judah's ruling with God, Luther, Meisner, and others think has reference to the story which you find in 2 Kings xviii., of Hezekiah's great reformation. Truly, if it be so, then it appears that this people had continued very long in besetting God and his prophet with lies, for then the prophet had been threescore years and ten a prophet to this people, and had been for that period showing to them their sin; for from the time of Hosea's prophecy to the beginning of Hezekiah's reign, it will appear to be above threescore and ten years, and still the prophet is complaining of this people, at that time when Judah did thus rule with God, that they still continued besetting God with lies. I would from this,

Obs. 3. When men are once engaged in shifts and lies, they grow pertinacious in them, there is little hope of their recovery. Then, let what will be said against them, let God's hand never so much appear, let the truths be never so clear before them, they go on pertinaciously when once they are engaged in such a course.

"Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints."

That is, Israel, the ten tribes, was not encouraged by her sister Judah's example, for Judah did otherwise; though the ten tribes did beset God with lies thus, their worship was all false, and nothing but a lie, yet Judah continued still in the true worship of God.

Obs. 4. Though examples of evil in others are no excuses, yet where there is no such temptation the sin is so much the greater. If indeed Israel could have said thus, You indeed complain of our false worship; who do otherwise? Does not Judah do so as well as we? do not they follow the same course? we took our example from them. No, Israel could not say so. This would not have wholly excused, but it might somewhat have extenuated, their guilt; evil examples do somewhat lessen, but not wholly excuse. Yet when there is no examples at all, but men take up evil of themselves, and are rather examples to others, this is a great aggravation of their sin. Again note, that,

Obs. 5. To continue in false worship when there is a right way held forth by others, aggravates the sin. If indeed we could say, We have been all our days brought up in this way, we knew no better, we saw none that held forth to us any other way; this might be some palliation. But they could not say so, for "Judah yet ruled with God;" Judah held forth the right way of worship according to the mind of God, and therefore the sin of Israel is here aggravated.

Obs. 6. It is a great commendation to continue in the true worship, when others fall off. "Judah yet ruleth with God." It was more to the commendations of Judah to continue in the true worship, after Israel had broken off; for in Israel were the ten tribes, more in number, and more flourishing as a kingdom a great deal than Judah; yet for Judah to hold on in the right worship of God, when so many fell off from it, and when a more flourishing kingdom than itself had continued so many years in false worship, this was a great commendation. Indeed there is a great temptation in this, when we see a multitude go another way; the devil prevails thereby much to draw men's hearts to that way; but the stronger the temptation is, the greater is the commendation of those who shall stand out. What though there be but a few, and you see others who walk contrary in seeming present prosperity, yet if thou canst hold on in the way of truth, in the way of God's worship according to his word, God looks upon this as a thing very pleasing to him; it is a very great commendation to those who do thus, and God takes it kindly from them: Judah does thus, whatsoever Israel does.

There were many evils, and those very gross, in Judah, but yet saith the prophet Hosea here, "Judah yet ruleth with God." Why? For the prophet Hosea was a prophet to Israel, he was not sent to Judah to inveigh against Judah, but to the ten tribes; and therefore, though there were many evils in Judah, he takes not so much notice of their evils, as of the evils of the ten tribes. Whence we may further

Obs. 7. We should be more severe with those that are nearest to us, when they dishonour God, than with others. As now, a minister is not so much to inveigh against those over whom God has not set him, but if there be any evil in those that belong to his charge, there he should deal more plainly; and so for others, you are not so much to meddle with others who do not concern you, as with your own family, those that are under your immediate charge. True, we should not see God dishonoured, but we should some way or other (as God calls us to it) testify for him; but the main thing that we should look to is, those that are under our charge: many are very indulgent towards those that are under their charge, and very busy and bitter against others.

"Judah yet ruleth with God." Jerome upon this place tells of a tradition that the Jews have here about Judah's rule, and it is this: When the people came out of Egypt, and Pharaoh pursued them, and the Red Sea was before them, and the mountains on either side, they were mightily terrified; yet God bade Moses to command them to go on. The people thought with themselves, Whither shall we go? and so were afraid. Now Judah had a spirit (say they) beyond the rest, and was the first tribe that ventured to go into the sea, and from thence obtained the principal place among the tribes. This is but their tradition.

But the meaning here is, that the kingdom of Judah yet continued according to God's mind in the house of David, and maintained the true worship, and so ruled with God. There are divers excellent notes further from hence:

Obs. 8. To enjoy but little with God, is better than much without God. As thus, The kingdom of Judah was but small in respect of the kingdom of Israel; yea, but "Judah ruleth with God." As here in a kingdom, so in an estate: hast thou a small estate? yea, but hast thou it with God? oh! it is a great deal better than to have a great estate and have much guiltiness with it, to have it without God. Israel maintained their rule by shifts; and that is a great evil. Though thou hast thy desires, yet if thou dost compass them, and still maintain them, by shifting courses, it is a sore and great evil, thou canst have little comfort in their enjoyment; for this is the meaning of the prophet, as if he should say, Israel ruleth, but how did they get and maintain their rule? It was in false, sinful ways. It may be thou hast thy will over thy brother; yea, but thou hast it in a sinful way: thou bleesest thyself in that thou hast thy will, but thou hast little cause, if thou knewest all. Israel did not rule "with God."

Luther in loc.

Luther, on the place, saith, Papists dare not venture to embrace the true doctrine, for fear their rule should be lost. So it is with many people, they are afraid of the loss of their rule, if they should entertain the true ways of God's worship; they think that the true ways of God's worship cannot consist with their rule and power, and therefore they had rather retain them, and let the true worship of God go. Thus it was with Israel.

Or thus: "Judah yet ruleth with God;" that is, Judah, continuing in a right way of worship, does so reform as he rules in an honourable condition; Judah rules with God. Judah, reforming as he does, "ruleth with God," is in an honourable condition. Here, further,

Obs. 9. To serve God is to reign. The kingdom that serves God reigns indeed; yea, that individual who serves God reigns. It is an honourable thing to serve God: the Lord Christ "has made us kings" unto his Father, so honourable is the service of God.

"Judah yet ruleth with God." The Vulgate understands ruling with God thus, Judah descends, or comes down, as a witness with God. And indeed the difference, though it may seem to be very great in English, yet in the Hebrew it consists in the points, not in the letters. Ribera maintains this reading, and suggests these two remarks on it:

Testis descendit cum Deo. Vulg.

ndbuc קד testis קד
à דר damnatus est
רר descendit רר

First, When others leave the true worship of God, Judah continues, and so witnesses for God. Whence,

Obs. 10. God has never been without some witnesses to his truth. And in evil times, when others do forsake God and his worship, then for people to be willing to venture, and appear any way to witness for God, is a very honourable thing. Oh! it is a blessed thing to be a witness to the truth; Therefore was I born, saith Christ, that "I might bear witness to the truth." Those that are faithful and upright in evil times are God's witnesses.

Secondly, He descends, that is, he is content to be in a lower condition, so that he may witness for God; though Israel be in a more flourishing condition, and we be kept low, it is no great matter so that we may be God's witnesses. Hence,

Obs. 11. A gracious heart shrinks not from humiliation which affords the opportunity of witnessing for God. I see, indeed, others in the world, they are brave, and have the countenance of the times, and have all things according to the desires of the flesh; but we are kept low. It is no matter, so that we may but witness for God: let others take the outward glory and bravery of the world, let us be witnesses with and for our God.

"And is faithful with the saints." He is faithful, that is, he continues in the right government God would have him, and in his true worship.

Obs. 12. To forsake the true worship and government God has appointed, is unfaithfulness; and cleaving to it, especially through much difficulty and suffering, is a special part of faithfulness. It is an evil not to be faithful with the state in civil affairs, but not to be faithful with God in matters of religion is a greater evil.

Obs. 13. God has a special eye to a state's faithfulness with him in point of worship. Though there may be otherwise many evils, yet if they be faithful to him in point of worship, God has a special regard to that.

Obs. 14. Faithfulness consists in a constant persisting in good. It is not faithfulness only to profess good, but to continue in our profession. Judah "is faithful with the saints." I find divers learned men take this to be an enallage of the number, and instead of "with the saints," read, with the Holy One; for we may find instances in Scripture where the plural number is used for the singular, as in Josh. xxiv. 19. כִּי-אֱלֹהִים קָדְשִׁים "for he is an holy God." The word translated "holy" there is in the plural number, as here, and yet it must be understood and read in the singular, "he is an holy God;" and so some read here, faithful with the holy God.

But to take it as you find it in your Bibles, "faithful with the saints;" that is, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with Moses, with the prophets, with the forefathers; with them he continues faithful.

Or, faithful with such as are sanctified, the true priests of God, that God had sanctified to himself; faithful with the sanctified ones. Whereas Jeroboam took "of the lowest of the people," and made them priests to God, Judah would have no other priests but the sanctified ones of God.

Or, lastly, faithful with the people of God. For all of Israel that were holy, that were godly, that were the saints, and were not detained by some special hand of God, went up from the ten tribes to Judah, to the true worship of God; now Judah entertained them, and used them well, and was faithful to them. But, on the contrary, Israel, the ten tribes, were unfaithful, by using the saints of God evilly that would worship God according to God's own way; they were cruel and oppressing, and unfaithful to them, but Judah was faithful towards such, embracing and encouraging them. For us to go on in faithfulness, though we have none to join with, is a commendation; and the ways of God are excellent, whether any or no do join with us in them. But it is a great encouragement to be faithful with the saints; that is, to go on in those ways in which we see the saints walk: and to join with the saints, with such as are the choice saints of God, greatly encourages and strengthens the people of God in their way. "Faithful with the saints." Oh! it is good to be with the saints, even with the scattered remnant: a great deal better is it than to be with abundance of the men of the world.

Obs. 15. We should look more at the example of a few saints, than at the examples of thousands of loose and carnal professors. Judah "is faithful with the saints." It is true, the example of no man is to be a rule; but when the most gracious and holy saints adopt certain ways, it gives them a sanction, and mightily encourages and confirms others in them.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1. Ephraim feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind: he daily increaseth lies and desolation; and they do make a covenant with the Assyrians, and oil is carried into Egypt.

"EPHRAIM feedeth on wind." We read, in chap. viii. 7 of this prophecy, that they had "sown the wind," and should "reap the whirlwind;" and now they feed according to what they sowed, and of what they reaped. They did sow the wind, and here they feed on wind.

Feeding on wind, is a proverbial speech, to note,

1. The following after vain, unprofitable things. When men please themselves in their own conceits and in their own counsels, and walk in ways that are, and will certainly be, unprofitable to them, they are said to feed on wind. When men think to please God with their own inventions, to escape danger by their own shifts, to prevail against the saints by their deep counsels and fetches, they feed upon wind; when men promise to themselves great matters by ways of their own, that are not God's, they feed upon wind: and for all this the prophet rebukes the ten tribes.

2. The swelling pride and elation of heart. You know, according to the food so will the body be; those that feed on wind must needs have hearts puffed up with conceitedness of themselves, and contempt of others that are not in the same way as themselves: they lie sucking imaginary content and sweetness in their own ways; they are full of themselves; wheresoever they come they must needs vent themselves, they are so full of their wind; they feed on wind, yet one prick of disappointment will quickly let out all the wind from such bladders, they are quickly amort and dead in the nest if they be disappointed.

3. Dependence on carnal, creature comfort. Evil men that live upon carnal, creature comforts, upon the applause of men, upon honours, they likewise feed on wind, and are puffed up for a while; but any prick of God's appearing against them lets out the windy stuff, and quickly they are dead. Any member of the body that is puffed up with wind seems to be greater than any other part, but it is not stronger; no, it is consequently the weaker: and so it is with the hearts of men, that are puffed up with windy conceits and with creature contentments, they have no strength by this inflation; though they seem stronger, yet when they are called either to do or to suffer for God, they then appear to be very weak, and therefore will change as the wind changes. Pliny, citing as his authority Democritus, who has written a whole book on the chameleon, observes of that animal, which is said to feed upon wind, That there is no creature in the world more fearful than the chameleon, and the reason that it is so changeable (for it will change into every kind of colour, according to that to which it is joined) is this very timidity of its nature engendered by its food. And truly, it is a very good description of men that feed upon wind; they seem big when they have no opposition, what will they not then do; they will do such and such great matters: but the truth is, none are of more fearful hearts than those who are puffed up with the wind of their own conceits; when God comes to cross them, or they are called to suffer in their ways, they will quickly turn to any colour, this or that; because they do but feed on wind, therefore is their might weakness, and they have no strength at all in them.

4. The turbulent, unquiet disposition of such. We know that the wind raises tempests and storms; and so men that are puffed up with the wind of their own conceits, are the men that raise such tempests and storms in the places where they live. My brethren, the saints have better food to feed upon, food that makes them more solid and more staid. While the men of the world feed on the wind of applause, on their own conceits, on their own vain counsels and plots, and upon the creature, and think to satisfy their cravings thereby; the saints feed on the mercy and all-sufficiency of God; they feed upon his word and promises, and upon the covenant of grace; they feed upon Jesus Christ, whose "flesh is meat indeed," and whose "blood is drink indeed," and so they come to have strength in them, for their food is food indeed. Others, feeding on the wind, are filled with their own devices, and hence it is that they cannot savour nor relish heavenly things; the breathings of the Spirit of God are not entertained by them, because they are filled with their own wind: but the saints are willing to empty themselves, and to receive into their souls the Holy Ghost, and the blessed things which the Holy Ghost brings; Christ comes in to sup with them, and they to sup with him, Rev. iii. 20; and thus are they nourished to eternal life, and fitted for any service or any suffering to which the Lord is pleased to call them: their food is different from the food of other men.

"And followeth after the east wind." This east wind, especially in those countries, is noted as a wind exceedingly hurtful to man and beast. We also have a proverb of the east wind; The east wind blows good neither to man nor beast; but more especially in that country. So we find in Gen. xli. 6, "And, behold, seven thin ears and blasted with the east wind sprung up after them." And in Ezek. xvii. 10, "Shall it not utterly wither, when the east wind toucheth it?" And in Job xv. 2, "Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind?" When you see men talk and utter vain things, they do but seek to fill their bellies with the east wind. The east wind was so hurtful because attended with a heat of the sun that made it dry and scorching in those countries; therefore the Septuagint translates this καίσιμα, the scorching wind; and the Vulgate renders it, æstus, heat.

Now you will say, What does the Holy Ghost mean here? It is to hold out a very excellent truth to us:

Obs. 1. Creature comforts will prove but wind. Those who seek to satisfy themselves with such, and to stay themselves on their own counsels and their own inventions, not only deceive themselves, and will be disappointed at last in their expectations, but they will find these their ways to be very pestilential, hurtful, and dangerous, they will find that they will undo them, and bring them to utter misery. Oh how many have undone themselves with their own counsels! Were men but merely disappointed of their vain hopes, there were a great evil in that; but if disappointment were the only consequent evil, it were not so much. But you must not escape so; you that will feed upon the wind, and bless yourselves in your own ways, you must expect to meet with wrath and misery; these ways whereby you may think to shift from danger will bring you into danger. Oh! how many on their sick-beds, and death-beds, have cried out in the bitterness and trouble of their souls, for following of their own conceits and counsels, and the ways of other men! they see now that they are undone, undone by those ways: Oh! we have fed upon the wind, and we find evil ways that pleased us then torment us now, we find them to bring anguish, sorrow, and trouble upon us.

Obs. 2. It is a grievous thing, when troubles come, to have nothing within us to bear us out but the wind. Suppose men meet with the rough east wind, or storms and tempests befall them, yet if they have had solid food, whereby they come to get good blood, and marrow, and spirits, they may be able to bear it; but when the body is empty and meets with tempests, oh, this is very grievous to the poor frame. So it is with many when they meet with afflictions; but the saints have such solidity within them as bears them out; but other men that are empty, that have fed upon the wind all their days, have nothing to bear them out in great afflictions, but their hearts sink down in horror and despair.

“He daily increaseth lies.” Ephraim, the ten tribes, all the day long increaseth lies, that is, he has new plots, and new devices, and new shifts for himself; he increaseth lies, new opinions and new reports; so we are to understand the word in its latitude. “He daily increaseth lies,” and that,

First, In matters of doctrine; there “he daily increaseth lies,” having once forsaken the truth. If the truth be once forsaken, men know not whither they shall go: Grant but one error, we are wont to say, and a thousand will follow, and they will multiply abundantly, especially some errors; there are some such breeding lies, that, if they be granted, there must be a great many others to maintain them. Never was there such an increase of false doctrine, of lies in that sense, as at this day. In Rev. xii. 15, when the dragon could not prevail against the woman, that is, the church, by bloody persecutions, then, saith the text, the dragon “cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood;” this was the policy of the devil, first labouring by violence to prevail against the church, but when he could not do that, then he “cast water out of his mouth like a flood;” that is, as interpreters observe, he laboured to undo the church by a deluge of error and heresies, when he could not ruin it by open violence. Truly this scripture is even fulfilled concerning us this very day: the Lord has been pleased to curb the dragon, and those that were his instruments in open and violent persecution, so that they cannot persecute the truths as they were wont to do; and now then this is the way of the devil, this dragon sends out of his mouth a flood of errors and heresies after the truth, after the church, labouring to swallow up all by this flood. And certainly we are in a great deal of danger at this day in this respect; there is a flood and deluge of all sorts almost of old errors, and many of them extremely dangerous, and men are serviceable to the dragon in this thing more than they are aware of. Oh that we could but see the subtlety of Satan in this continual increasing of lies! for these four or five years there has been an increase such as could never have been thought of; certainly if some of our forefathers that were holy and gracious should rise out of their graves, and see and hear such things as may be seen and heard in our days, they would stand amazed, and wonder how it were possible that ever England should be filled with such horrible opinions and customs as have prevailed in these latter times: so that now there lies the hope of the devil, by increase of such lies to eat out godliness and religion. This indeed seems to be the most hopeful design conceived by the devil in these latter times: men’s hearts are carnal, loose, and sensual, and therefore they are prepared to receive these lies; and hence they multiply apace. But yet let none multiply them more than they are, by putting among them some truths, by shutting in truths in the midst of them, to make them appear likewise to be lies, and to be taken as honest men are when by any accident they are gotten in the company of lewd people, they are apprehended upon suspicion, merely because they are in their company. This is one of the devil’s choicest devices, to shuffle in some truths among them, and because he could not have them suspected otherwise, they must be taken upon suspicion because they are there among them. Let not men gather these lies together to the end that they may oppose some truths thereby, but, as the prophet speaks, “What is the chaff to the wheat?” if men will speak of lies let them inveigh against them, and only against them, and make it appear that that is the work of their spirits, merely to oppose them, and not under such a pretence to make other things, which yet they cannot prove to be false, appear to be odious and monstrous, merely by shuffling them together among such horrible and damnable lies.

Secondly, Lies against the prophets, against the saints, and against the ways of God. And certainly there was never the like multiplying as there is at this day in this sense too; men carry their multiplying glasses along with them up and down. A lie at first is like a stone cast into the water: you know a stone when cast in makes a little circle, and then that another, and that another, every succeeding circle greater than the former; and so it is with many lies, at first they appear not so great, but they gain strength as they go, acquirunt vires eundo. There are many ways of multiplying and increasing lies.

1. By carrying about reports, and so making one lie generate many.

2. By misreporting of reports; that is, by putting reports into another dress, according to what men themselves apprehend; and that which is a truth when it comes to be examined nakedly, yet will, being put into another dress or arrangement, seem to be very false.

3. By adding to reports. Every man, according to his spirit, draws consequences, and when he has drawn them, he connects them with the report, as if they were part of the original, whereas they are but the comment.

4. By inventing new ones they come to increase and multiply; because such and such falsehoods will not do the feat, more shall then be added to them.

5. By maintaining lies by lies, as if men, being once engaged in a business, must defend themselves. If once they have misreported a thing, there is no help for it, but now it must be defended one way or other, somewhat must be done to establish it: as many times is the case with your servants; a servant has done a thing amiss; well, this servant seeks to cover it by a lie, and when once he has told one, he must tell a great many more to defend that one: and thus it is with men.

And truly, my brethren, seeing that this scripture does so by providence come in our way, let me speak thus much to you from it. It is one of the strangest things that ever occurred in the world, that there should be such strange reports of things that are matters of fact, yea, that one godly man, or company of men, should say one thing, and others, whom we think godly, should say quite contrary, and both in matters of fact: * I say, the consideration of this might indeed well make men stand amazed; for there is no sin that is more against the ingenuousness of a gracious heart, than a deliberate lie; to speak against a man's knowledge, and against a man's conscience, is one of the greatest sins against the ingenuousness of a gracious heart; and yet, even such as we think to be godly and gracious, issuing reports so contradictory to each other, and that about matters of fact, what shall we say to this?

To a friend who wrote to Austin about the allowability of telling an official lie, he answered, He must not tell a lie, no, not to save the whole world. Now what a difference is there in the hearts of men in these days! Truly, I do not know a greater temptation to atheism at this day than this is; for what will men think? There certain religious men speak thus, and others whom we account as religious speak quite contrary. Is there any religion in the world? We see so much contradicting one against another, surely one side much be false. It is this, I am verily persuaded, that is the cause of much atheism amongst us, and if God be not pleased to prevent one way or other, it will open a wide door to atheism in the nation. Some rejoice at these things, and nothing is more pleasing to them when they meet together; whereas they should be matter for our humiliation, we should mourn for them, to see how God is thus dishonoured, and what abundance of hurt is thereby like to come to souls. But now therefore, a little to quiet our hearts, that we may not be in danger of turning atheists by it, let us consider from whence comes it, that so many lies should be increased and multiplied.

1. Both sides may be right. They report according to their own apprehensions of things; and apprehending them in a different way, and on different principles, both of them may think they are in the truth, and yet one may contradict the other. For it is very much according to the principles of men's spirits in any thing, especially if a business has many things depending on it, and there are many circumstances to be laid together, to connect them as best suit their own apprehensions and principles. In such cases both parties may think they are in the truth, and contradict one another, and yet neither of them speak against their consciences: this (I say) may possibly occur even amongst good men.

2. Men do not always speak from their own knowledge, but are ready to take up the reports of those in whom they place confidence. When men see those whom they love of their side and way, they are very confident in their reports, and speak, not from being eye-witnesses themselves; and so they may come to contradict one another, and yet not do violence to their consciences: this is indeed the evil of giving too easy credit to reports. But though it be an evil, yet it comes not from a wilful violation of their consciences.

3. Sometimes when men report, they do not report all. Reports are cross one to another; yea, but did you hear all, or do you report all? It is a bad thing when a man will take one part of a thing and report it; another man may come and report the quite contrary; whereas if all were brought together and the whole series of things laid before them, there might appear such agreement in essentials as would unite both parties. Bring things to the original, and then you see how they agree: as now, sometimes in Scripture there are divers renderings; yea, but by bringing them all to the original, we come to see wherein their differences harmonize. And so with reports, bring them to the original, and you may help yourselves and others to see, when partial statements are rejected, a foundation for entire agreement.

4. Reports are contradictory, but that may arise rather from men's memories, than from any thing in the things themselves; I say, the contradiction may exist merely in the memory.

Let us learn then, my brethren,

First, To take heed of spreading reports to the dishonour of religion.

Secondly, To search into rather than report a matter; if you hear any thing which you think must surely be a lie, to go to the party, or get some that are acquainted with them to go to them, to see whether they can satisfy you in the thing. Many men stand and wonder at a report, whereas if they, or any friend for them, would but inquire into the matter, they might have such a plain history of the things related to them as would fully satisfy them.

Thirdly, To take heed of being inventive. Men still follow after new vanities; if they find not satisfaction in one, they are not moved thereby to seek the true God that they may have satisfaction, but seek for it in other things. Oh let us consider thus; I find no satisfaction in this; yea, but is it not because I forsake the Lord God, in whom there is all satisfaction? Let me repair to God, and in him I shall find all fullness. No, but they take another course; I have not satisfaction in this thing, then I will seek for it in something else: and so they go from one false way to another, and in this sense increase lies. I will have new devices to shift off truth. The consciences of men will not be put off with old shifts; they have satisfied their conscience a while with one device; yea, but it will be put off no longer with that, they must have another; and when conscience comes to apprehend the weakness of that, then another. Oh, take heed of being inventive for the satisfying of conscience. Thine inventions may prove judgments in the hand of God.

"And desolation."

When men embrace their own vain conceits, and hopes, and false ways, they think they have gotten a great catch; but the truth is, they embrace their own ruin; mark how they are joined together, "He daily increaseth lies and desolation," "desolation" is the fruit of "lies;" and moreover, desolation is increased by lies; the more sin the more desolation, you will perish the more dreadfully. "A false witness" (saith Prov. xix. 9,) "shall not be unpunished, and he that speaketh lies shall perish." But he that walks uprightly walks surely. Prov. xii. 12, "The lip of truth shall be established for ever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment;" it may bluster a while and deceive many; yea, but it is "but for a moment."

"And they do make a covenant with the Assyrians." That is, that they might have power to crush their brethren of Judah, they seek to make a covenant with the Assyrians, thinking to strengthen themselves thereby. You have found this charged upon them many times in this prophecy, in chap. x. particularly; their making a covenant with wicked men is repeated again and again, to show the heinousness of their sin, in forsaking God to join with the ungodly, and to teach us this lesson:

Obs. 3. When people are guilty of a sin, the prophets of God should beat upon it again and again. I shall not need to speak any further of this.

"And oil is carried into Egypt," that is, they carry oil for gifts, and merchandise. The land of Canaan abounded much in oil, while there was little or none in the land of Egypt, and therefore it was a great merchandise to carry oil from the land of Canaan into Egypt. So in Ezek. xxvii. 17, "Judah, and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants: they traded in thy market wheat of Minnith, and Pannag, and honey, and oil, and balm." But oil was (as it were) the staple commodity.

Now, my brethren, Egypt you know is a type of antichrist, and Canaan a type of the church. Egypt has no oil, no oil grows there; no, there are gall and wormwood, but there is no oil; but oil is in the land of Canaan. My brethren, what are we but almost like Egypt this day? We would be loth to return into Egypt to our former bondage, but we even turn ourselves to be as Egypt, we have little oil among us. What! is God bringing us to Canaan? how comes it to pass there is no more oil then? Oh! the oil that is among us (if there be any) is rather the oil of scorpions than any thing else; men's spirits, and men's pens and tongues, are even full of this oil, as if the ink made in these days was made of the oil of scorpions. Israel (the ten tribes) would send oil to Egypt, to gain the favour of Egypt; that they might have their wills over their brethren, they would be at a great deal of cost, and part with their oil. O my brethren, shall it be so with us in a spiritual sense; that we may have our wills over our brethren, shall we part with our oil? Why do not we say as the fig tree, "Shall we leave our sweetness to come and reign over you?" So, shall we leave our oil, that is, the suppleness, the gentleness, the tenderness of our spirits, shall we yield these, that we may prevail over our brethren? Oh how many were of supple, tender spirits, and loving one towards another! yet, out of a desire to prevail against their brethren, have parted with their oil, even with the tenderness and suppleness of their spirits. Remember, Egypt has no oil, oil is the produce of Canaan.

Ver. 2. The Lord hath also a controversy with Judah, and will punish Jacob according to his ways; according to his doings will he recompense him.

This verse I shall presently pass over. But the first part is very observable.

"The Lord hath also a controversy with Judah." Calvin saith of this, It is a wonderful thing. Did not God say, that "Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints;" and now saith, "The Lord hath also a controversy with Judah?"

I find some therefore would reconcile it by rendering it thus, "The Lord hath also a controversy for Judah;" but this seems a little strained: but if we read it as rendered in our version, "The Lord hath also a controversy with Judah," four reasons may be given why, after God had said that "Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints," he adds, He "hath also a controversy with Judah."

1. To show that God does not so look at the good of his people, but that he sees their evil too. You know those passages in Rev. ii., where, when God commands certain churches for doing thus and thus, he adds, "Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee," I do not so observe your good, as that your evil should escape me. My brethren, some there are, that if there be any evil in men, can see no good in them; this is wicked. But there are others, that if there be any good in them, can see no evil; this is too much indulgence, they err in both extremes.

2. Men are very apt to excuse their evil by their good. I mean thus, that such as embrace the true worship of God, are right there, they will have pure ordinances, and the worship of God conformable to the word; but because of that, though there be some loose-ness and negligence in their ways otherwise, they attempt to silence conscience; and think they are the true worshippers of God, and have the ordinances of God in their purity and power, and so think to swallow down all, much looseness, much carnality, much pride, much sensuality, much hypocrisy: because they retain the true worship of God, they seek to satisfy conscience. Oh! take heed of this; Judah retained the true worship of God, yet "the Lord hath also a controversy with Judah," and the Lord Jehovah may have a controversy against you also.

3. That Israel might neither think God or the prophet partial. The ten tribes might say, Does God threaten us? Is not Judah as bad as we? are there not evils among Judah as well as amongst us? are we only the sinful people? No, (saith the prophet,) I acknowledge there is much evil in Judah, and therefore "the Lord hath also a controversy with Judah," and Judah is not like to escape: delude not yourselves with the vain hope, that because others are bad, therefore you may escape; no, they are bad, and therefore God has a controversy against them. This may be a useful note to us; men are very ready to put off the evils which they are guilty of with this, I am not worse than others, I do such a thing amiss, and others do the same as well as I; and so they think to escape that way. O thou weak, vain man, why wilt thou deceive thy soul with this? Dost thou think that another man's evil will excuse thy sin? Thou art a vain man, and knowest not the way of God.

4. To show the ten tribes how much more must they expect the displeasure of God. If with Judah, who retains the true worship of God, yet, for some other evils, God has a controversy, then what will become of Israel, who has those same evils, and rejects the true worship of God too? As if the prophet should say, Your condition is far worse, therefore doth the Lord say, "The Lord hath also a controversy with Judah," that he might aggravate the evils of Israel: like that of Peter, "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" If so be that with the church which has the pure ordinances God is yet displeased for their sin, how much more will he be displeased with them who are corrupt in his worship! Therefore men should not bless themselves with such discourse as this, Why, others have evils as well as we. Yea, but if God will punish them for their evils who have fewer, and a great deal more good, than thou, how much more will he punish thee! Oh! if those that are the dear saints of God, that worship him in truth and sincerity, shall not escape scot-free for the evils among them; O, then, what will become of thee who art a wicked and vile wretch, and hast no good at all? If a Moses, that had done God so much service, yet for one sin of passion, in that he once spake unadvisedly with his lips, was shut out of the land of Canaan by the Lord, and commanded to speak no more to him of that matter; what will become of thee, who hast a passionate, froward spirit, of thee, who never hast nor wilt do God such service, what will become of thee? Oh, how mayst thou look to be shut out! This use you must make of the sins of others, and God's dealings with them. And saith he,

"And will punish Jacob according to his ways."

There are two questions necessary for the opening of this.

First, Why the ten tribes are called by the name of Jacob? we never read that they are called by the name of Isaac, and of Abraham.

Now the answer to this is very satisfactory, thus: The people of God are called in Scripture by the name of Jacob, and of Israel, Jacob's other name, rather than by the name of Abraham and Isaac, because they, though they were godly, and were the father and grandfather, yet in Abraham's family there was a wicked son as well as a good one; likewise from Isaac's loins there came Esau as well as Jacob; but from Jacob's loins there came none but were of God's church. Jacob's sons were the twelve patriarchs, and therefore the posterity is called by the name of Jacob, rather than that of Abraham or Isaac: "I said not to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain."

Secondly, Why is Jacob mentioned in this place?

Because the prophet intends presently, in the words that follow, to bring the example of Jacob to them before he was Israel, to aggravate their sin in order to their humiliation; and therefore here he names Jacob, to take away that vain plea of their hearts. Whereas they would say, Are not we the posterity of Jacob, have not we Jacob for our father? Well, (saith he,) I will punish Jacob; and I will show you presently, that you have no such cause to boast yourselves that you have Jacob to be your father. So, with most interpreters, I understand this.

"According to his doings will he recompense him." Of this part of the text I shall speak nothing, because in chap. iv. ver. 9, we had the very same words.

Ver. 3, 4. He took his brother by the heel in the womb, and by his strength he had power with God: yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed: he wept, and made supplication unto him: he found him in Beth-el, and there he spake with us.

This prophet inveighing against the sins of these ten tribes, and threatening judgments, in these words takes away the plea which he saw was in their hearts against what he had said; We are the children of Jacob, and why do you thus charge us, and threaten us in the name of God? was not Jacob our father? as in Christ's time they pleaded that Abraham was their father.

Now in these words the prophet takes away this plea: You may bless yourselves in that Jacob was your father, but it will do you little good, for you are a degenerate off-spring. True, God was very gracious to Jacob, and Jacob was very dear to God; it is otherwise with you, Jacob worshipped God after another manner than you do. The prophet therefore sets before this people here, in the words read, God's mercy to Jacob, and Jacob's graciousness in his behaviour toward God, that he might upbraid those children of Jacob who walked so unworthy of such a gracious father as Jacob was.

Now how this is set forth we shall speak to presently, only from the general scope of the passage we notice this one instruction:

Obs. It is a great reproach to wicked children, to hear of the graciousness of their parents. It should be a matter of much humiliation to them to hear of the relation that their parents had to God, and how zealously they worshipped him; children that have had gracious parents, should look upon it as a shame to them when at any time the graciousness of their parents is but mentioned before them. A king of Poland was wont to carry the picture of his father, of whom he had honourable esteem, in a plate of gold about his neck; and when he was about to do any matter of great importance, he would take this picture and kiss it, and use these words, God grant that I may now do nothing remissly, nothing unworthy of my father. O, you that have had gracious ancestors, think often of them, and when you are tempted to sin, reflect, Is not this unworthy of my ancestors? would they have done thus? Children should so walk as the virtues of their fathers should not die in them, but they should hold them forth. As Ambrose, in an oration on the commendations of Theodosius, saith, Though Theodosius be gone, yet surely, so long as his son lives, Theodosius will live among us. He meant thus, that the virtues of that excellent emperor would certainly live in his son, who was so hopeful. Oh! it is an excellent thing when the virtues of gracious parents live in their children; and it is a very evil thing when the parents are dead, yea, and their virtues are dead in respect of their children, nothing of them appears in them: they love to inherit their lands and estates, but it were far better to inherit their virtues and their godliness. But the people of Israel did not inherit the godliness of Jacob, and did not lay to heart the goodness of God towards their father Jacob, so that the prophet here now lays it all open before them, and to that end makes use, in the two verses which I have read to you, of three remarkable circumstances narrated of Jacob. They are recorded in Genesis, and there is in them much of the mind of God.

I. His taking his brother by the heel in the womb, Gen. xxv. 26.

II. His wrestling with the angel, Gen. xxxii. 24—32.

III. His interviews with God at Beth-el, Gen. xxviii. 10—22; xxxv. 9—15.

I. His taking his brother in the womb. "He took his brother by the heel in the womb." You must refer to Gen. xxv. 26, to know the mind of God in this; there you find that in the womb of Rebekah there was a striving between Jacob and Esau before they were born, and at their birth Jacob puts his hand out and takes his brother by the heel, from whence he had his name Jacob, which signifies a heel, and from thence a supplanter. And Esau obtained his name because he was hairy when born, because he was as it were a man already, a man made in the womb. Saith Luther, When Esau was born, and they saw him so hairy, they thought he was the man that would do very great and famous things in the world, and from thence he had his name Esau: now Jacob in his birth takes by the heel this very Esau, of whom such high expectations were entertained. A most wonderful history, saith Luther on the place, this of Jacob's thus taking his brother by the heel.

But what is the meaning of this? (you will say;) why does the prophet instance this? What is this to the ten tribes, that Jacob took his brother by the heel? what good would this do the people to whom Hosea was prophesying? and what did he aim at? Was this story to be a means to humble the people for their sins? how could it do it? Therefore we must know that the scope and meaning of this great work of God, in Jacob's taking "his brother by the heel in the womb," was to show,

1. The free election of God. Esau was the first-born, and so in an orderly course the birthright should have descended on him and on his posterity, for such was the custom, the blessing was wont to go along with the first-born, and with their posterity; (in which the first-born was a type of Christ, who is called, "The first-begotten of all creatures;" and the blessing upon the first-born was a type of the blessing that we have by Christ;) now, though this in an orderly way belonged to Esau, as being the first-born, yet Jacob's taking of him by the heel was a certain token from God that Jacob should supplant him, and that he should get from him the birthright, and so the blessing; and in that Jacob should thus get the blessing, though he were the younger, and this sign was given of it when he was in the womb, this showed the free election of God, that it was through God's mere free grace that Jacob had the blessing rather than Esau, and that consequently the posterity of Jacob were in a better condition than the posterity of Esau. It was only the free grace of God, not from any excellency in Jacob, any worthiness in him more than in Esau, for God thus pre-signified the good which he intended to Jacob, "the Habet nomen à faciendo; his ille vir qui præclare omnia faciet. Luth.

קַבֵּץ אֶת עֵקֶב אֶת יַעֲקֹב בְּרֵחַל בְּטֶמֶת הַבֶּטֶן וְעַל-יָדוֹ הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה אֶת-אֱלֹהִים children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil," Rom. ix. 11.

Though Esau was the elder and stronger, a hairy, active, stout man, and Jacob a plain man, yet Jacob is chosen, Esau is rejected; and God pre-signifies this by his taking his brother by the heel. Now in this sense it concerneth the people very much.

As if he should say, What! you are the posterity of Jacob, and not of Esau, and you glory in this; well, how comes it to pass so great privileges are attached to the posterity of Jacob rather than to the posterity of Esau; how comes this? Is it not from the free grace of God in choosing one rather than the other, and that in the very womb? As in Mal. i. 2, 3, "I have loved you, saith the Lord. Yet ye say, Wherein hast thou loved us? Was not Esau Jacob's brother?" saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau." In this I manifested my free love, even unto this people, that though Esau was Jacob's brother, and eldest brother, yet I loved Jacob and hated Esau. So in Rom. ix. 11—13, "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth; it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated." Now that this took place in the womb was to show God's free grace.

If any should say, But God foresaw that Jacob would be a better man than Esau;

I answer, If it were of foreseen works, there were no argument in this to prove God's free election; but the apostle makes it to be an argument to prove God's free election of Jacob rather than Esau, because he chose them in the womb.

Luther, on Gen. xxv., has an excellent discourse on this subject, concerning God's rejecting the pride, pomp, and vanity of the world, and choosing the things that are mean and contemptible in the eyes of the world; and it was an emblem of it, in that God would rather choose Jacob the "plain man," than Esau the hunter, and the hairy man; I say, this shadowed forth that the Lord intends to reject the brave things of the world, its gallantry, glory, and pomp, and will rather choose the mean and contemptible things of the world. Who can persuade (saith Luther on the place) the pope, and Charles the Fifth, the French king, and the like, that they, being great in the world, yet are contemptible in the eyes of God, and God has rather chosen despised and contemptible things than them? And that was the scope of the prophet, that they should consider of the free grace of God towards Jacob, and so be humbled. And we should hence,

Obs. 1. We are to acknowledge God's election of our forefathers, and all the good we enjoy by such a choice, to be a fruit of free grace. Others were before God as well as our forefathers; as now, when God brought the gospel first to England, other nations were before God as well as it, it was mere free grace that pitched upon them rather than others, and we enjoy the blessing of it to this day; let us not sin against this free grace of God showed to our ancestors.

Obs. 2. Those who enjoy great blessings, either temporal or spiritual, from God's mercy to their ancestors, are to consider and devoutly acknowledge the free grace of God. As now, such of you as are rich and great in the world, whence is it that your ancestors were more rich than others, and were not beggars as well as others? was it not free grace, the free, undeserved goodness of God? The ancestors of others were before God in "the same lump," Rom. ix. 21, and that God should pitch upon your ancestors to be honourable in the earth and rich, and you enjoy the benefit of it in this world, ascribe to his discriminating mercy. It may be, too, some elder brother, though honourable and rich, is rejected, and families rise from the younger brother rather than the elder; it was so here, Jacob that was the younger afterwards came to have the blessing, and Esau was rejected. Sometimes the posterity of the elder brother proves wicked; it was so here, religion flourished in the family of Jacob, and not in the family of Esau.

Look back to this, and see what cause you have to bless God, and how you are engaged to his free grace towards you in regard of your ancestors; as here, the prophet would have this people look back to the free grace of God to their father Jacob.

2. How eagerly Jacob desired the blessing. "He took his brother by the heel in the womb." That is, as if he should say, Your father Jacob was greedy of the blessing, greedy of the birthright; there was a secret instinct of God on the spirit of Jacob when he was in the very womb, which rendered him so desirous of the blessing of the birthright, that he would do what he could to get it from his brother. As if the prophet should say, Oh, but you that are his posterity are carnal, you do not regard the privilege of the birthright, nor the attendant blessing; being carnal, you care not which way the blessing goes, so that you may but live and have your ease and contentment to the flesh; oh, you are not like your father Jacob, who eagerly desired this blessing.

We are to make use of this for the humbling of our souls, thus: Some of you that have had your parents in your youth gracious and godly, and greedy after the things of God, how negligent have you been! Oh how negligent have I been! how careless is my spirit, and slight and vain! yea, though come to years, yet do I little regard that which my parents were eagerly desirous of when very young.

3. The prevailing of the people of God against the wicked at last. "He took his brother by the heel in the womb." God made Jacob a famous and notable type in this work, that certainly the saints, though they may seem to be low and mean for the present, yet shall they get advantage, ultimately, over the men of the world. The men of the world are set out by Esau; they ruffle abroad in the world, and are of fiery hot spirits, as Esau was, and they have great things in the world for a time, and the saints are under them, as Jacob was under Esau; but certainly the saints shall prevail against all the Edomites, all the Esaus, if I may so speak; there is a time coming in which they shall supplant them, and get the power over them, in which the godly shall prevail at length against all the wicked and ungodly in the world. You should consider it as if the prophet said to them, You are seeking to provide for yourselves in your sinful ways. Oh! if you did but consider, that the faithful, though they be persecuted for a time, and in a low condition, yet they shall get the power over all the great ones in the world, it would be otherwise with you than it is now. So the Scriptures tell us, that at length they shall have the dominion: Dan. vii. 18, "The saints of the most High shall take the kingdom;" and in ver. 21, "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them." But how long? Ver. 22, "Until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the most High;" and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." And ver. 27, "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High;" there is a time that it shall be given to them. And P'sal. xlix. 14, "The upright shall have dominion over them in the morning." This was typified in this notable work of God in Jacob's taking Esau by the heel to supplant him.

4. The providence of God, how it extends towards infants, even in the very womb. The very striving of children in the womb is not without providence; there was a mighty providence of God in this, to pre-signify the greatest things of God that are revealed in the Scripture. Now, though there be no such extraordinary and great things set forth by the ordinary stirrings of infants in the womb, yet certainly there is no stirring of the child in the womb, but it is with some providence of God, and God has his eye upon, and his hand in, the working even of the very child in the womb.

5. The secret ways of God in working upon infants. Though they have not the use of reason, yet, saith Luther here, there may be mighty workings of God even upon their spirits, in a secret way that we are not able to understand. And thereupon he exclaims against such as deny baptism to them, because they deem them not capable of any work of God upon them. The denying of baptism upon that ground, he calls a very odious and impious opinion; for, saith he, as it is with children, they have their nourishment in the womb in another manner than when they are born; so the work of God upon their spirits may be such as when they are in the womb, and when they are little ones, before they come to the use of reason, that may be far different to what the work of God is upon them when they come afterwards to have the use of reason.

6. That men who prove remarkable in their lives, have many times, in their very birth, notable presages of their future exploits. So Jacob here; "He took his brother by the heel in the womb." So Moses, by what occurred at his birth, by his strange and wonderful deliverance afterwards, and by his being brought into Pharaoh's court, gave a presage of what he would be; and so John Baptist gave early intimations of his important mission; and so other accounts tell us, that of men who have been famous for good or evil, there have been presages at their birth. Of Nero, who did such monstrous things, it is said that he was born with his heels forward. And of Dominicus, that great persecutor of the saints, that when his mother was with child, she dreamed that she had in her womb a wolf, with a firebrand in his mouth; and he even proved to be so, for he was one of the first that stirred up persecution against the saints by fire. Your papists turn it quite otherwise; I remember one of them interpreting this providence of God, in sending the mother of Dominicus (who was the father of the Dominicans) such a dream, saith it was to signify, that by the splendour of his holiness and doctrine he should inflame the whole world: experience, however, taught far otherwise. Now I note this only to show the vanity of men's spirits in interpreting ways of providence merely according to their own humours. And thus much for that remarkable circumstance recorded of Jacob, that "he took his brother by the heel in the womb." Now follows the next, and that is,

II. His wrestling with the angel. "And by his strength he had power with God."

This story refers to Gen. xxxii. In the preceding chapter you find that God, having bid Jacob return into the land of his fathers, and to his kindred, promised him that he would be with him in his journey; yet mark, though God had made him go this journey, and had promised that he would be with him in it, yet Jacob, for all that, meets with as hard things in the way as almost we can read, or hear, that any one ever experienced. He had an express command of God to go, and a promise that he would be with him in the journey; yet it would ask some time to show the many hard things which Jacob met withal in it; but, amongst others, this was a very sad one, that being to go by the land of Seir, the country of Edom, where his brother Esau lived, he sent messengers before him, not being altogether without some fear that the old grudge still remained in the heart of his brother, and that now, having an opportunity to satisfy his desire upon him, he might take advantage of it. As he feared, so he found it, for having sent messengers to his brother, they return again to him, and bring him word that his brother was coming against him with four hundred men; so manifesting, by the manner of his coming, that he did intend mischief against Jacob. And now, upon this, the heart of Jacob was much distressed; and so the text saith, Gen. xxxii. 7, "Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed;" vehemently afraid, and great straits were upon his spirit. Now, being in such great straits, Jacob seeks to provide for himself; he did not presently conclude and say, We are utterly undone, but he would see what could be done; so, though he knew the fury of his brother, yet, if it were possible but to save some part of his company, he would do it, and so he prudently divides them in the way that he conceived best for their safety. But though he dealt thus prudently, yet, that he trusted not to, but seeks unto the Lord; he would go to prayer in the great strait and extremity he was in. So in ver. 24, "And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day;" which cannot be interpreted otherwise than that he was waiting upon God to know his mind, and to seek God. And when he was alone, there comes out one in the form of a man, wrestling against him as though he likewise intended to destroy him; and this was no other than God himself, the Lord Jesus Christ. That it was Christ appearing in human shape, and not an angel, is clear from ver. 5, where he is called Jehovah, God of hosts; and you find, in Gen. xxxii. 30, that "Jacob called the name of the place Peniel; for," saith he, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved." God comes and appears against him as an enemy, even at that time in which this holy man Jacob was in such great straits; and yet Jacob, though God did thus appear against him, did not sink in his heart, but stirred up all the strength that he had, and wrestles even with God himself, thus appearing like an enemy, and "had power" at length, "and prevailed." One would have thought that there had been enough to have sunk Jacob's spirit, the distress that he was in at that time, his brother coming with four hundred men ready to destroy him, he left alone, one coming out and wrestling with him; yet, "by his strength he had power with God, and prevailed." This is as remarkable a relation as any we have in the Old Testament.

"He had power with the angel," that is, with God, when he came and wrestled with him in a time of so great extremity. I beseech you here to

Obs. 3. It is God's way sometimes with his best and dearest saints, in their greatest dangers, and in their greatest afflictions and troubles, to seem to come forth as their enemy. When God came and wrestled with Jacob, and seemed to be as an enemy to him, was the time of the greatest extremity that one would think it possible for a man to be in, you cannot apprehend greater distresses, or greater cause for distress, than Jacob had at this time; a poor man with a few women and children and cattle, and his brother who owed him a grudge, and had sought his death, coming with four hundred men in an hostile manner, and he "left alone," yet at this time God appears like an enemy to him; this was sad, a very heavy condition indeed. As God did with Jacob, so with Christ himself; God never so appeared outwardly against Christ, as when his disciples left him, just in the night when he was to be betrayed, then he was in an agony, and sweat drops of water and blood; yea, and when he was in the hands of his enemies, and lift up to the cross, and made a derision of to all the world, yet then he cries, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Forsaken at that time in so great distress! Jacob in this was even a type of God's forsaking Christ in times of such great distress. And so we find in Job, when he was in his great distresses, yet "the terrors of the Almighty" were upon him: and Heman, with divers others whom we might name. This is a point of very great concernment to us. O, be not discouraged, ye people of God, if at any time ye be brought into a condition like Jacob's. His story is of very great concernment to you; and like's ways towards him shadowing forth what they are like to be to other saints afterwards, even to the end of the world, namely this; That the most eminent and most precious saints of God must not think to be excused even from this condition, that when they are brought into the greatest outward afflictions that possibly can be imagined, God may not even at that time appear against them like an enemy. Oh! this is the saddest condition conceivable, to one who has any acquaintance with God. Many poor servants of God in affliction will say, As for these afflictions, they are heavy indeed upon me, my estate gone, or husband gone, or wife gone, and my friends leave me in this condition; yea, and it may be the hand of God is upon me in sickness, and so one trouble after another: but though these things are heavy, had I but the light of the face of God upon me it would be nothing to me; had I but those comforts which once I enjoyed in the assurance of God's love, all would not be much to me; but now, when all these outward comforts are gone, I see God appearing like an enemy to me so as he never did before. Does God deal thus with any of his people? am I not a reprobate? For God is wont, when his people are in affliction, to appear with the light of his face to comfort and encourage them; but he has not done so to me: even at this time I find God more terrible to my soul than I have ever yet found him, and therefore surely I am but a cast-away. I make no question but some of you may know the meaning of such temptations as these in the time of your afflictions, or if you have not known the meaning of them hitherto, you may hereafter; and you that have known, or hereafter shall be brought to know, what these things mean, O, treasure up this scripture, it will be worth a world to you; for the devil will mightily strengthen himself with this, What, are not you a cast-away? Surely God has rejected you, else he would never appear against you in your afflictions if he had any love to you.

Answer, I say, the temptation thus:

I have read in the book of God, and heard that even thus God dealt with my father Jacob, who was so precious to him.

Yea, but was not he in some way of sin?

No, he was in the way in which God bade him go, and yet even then, in his so great distress, God wrestled with him, never wrestled more with him than then, and seemed even then, at such a time as that was, to come against him like an enemy. Oh! treasure up this, that your hearts may not sink in despair, when the greatest afflictions and spiritual deserts meet together.

"By his strength he had power with God."

It appears that when God came thus against him to wrestle with him, God intended no hurt to him, it was but to stir up his strength, and to prepare him for great deliverance, and for choice mercies; God at this very time did intend to Jacob as great a mercy as ever he gave to any of the children of men in this world, and that was this, That he should have strength to prevail with God, that he should have his name changed and be called Israel, a prince prevailing with God, and so be honourable to the end of the world, and be set up as a type to strengthen the faith and to comfort the desponding hearts of all future saints; I say, it was as great a mercy as ever any mere child of man had in this world, and that at the very time when Jacob was in almost the greatest conceivable depth of affliction. Therefore here,

Obs. 4. God sometimes brings the deepest affliction when he intends the greatest mercy. Do not therefore conclude, Never any was so afflicted as I have been: why, Jacob might have said so, and yet God had never greater thoughts of mercy towards him than he had then. Therefore remember this again, when tempted to think, Never any was so afflicted as I have been: grant it, yet it may be there is mercy intended for you at this time, such as never yet was granted to any of the children of men before; it is possible it may be so, it was so with Jacob, and therefore let not your faith flag.

"By his strength he had power with God." In this his great distress he does not lie down as a man discouraged, but he stirs up what strength he had, and falls a wrestling with this man, even with God, thus appearing against him as an enemy. Oh! thus should the seed of Jacob do, you that are the seed of Jacob, for so specially praying Christians in time of distress are called. "I said not to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain," Isa. xlv. 19. They are not called the seed of Abraham, but of Jacob; because Jacob was so eminent in praying in such great extremity, you that are the seed of Jacob should do so. Every little opposition that comes upon a sluggish heart, upon one of low and mean principles, presently damps his spirit, makes him yield and bows him down, and he is ready to say, All is gone. Oh! art thou of the seed of Jacob? The seed of Jacob should never think their condition to be so sad, but there may be recovery. Is it a great affliction that is upon me? am I in great distress? let me so much the more stir up my strength. When Alexander was in a great danger he exclaimed, Now there is a danger fit for the mind of Alexander. So, does God bring into great straits? now there is a strait fit for a gracious heart, for one that is partaker of the Divine nature to encounter: stir up therefore what strength thou hast; do not say, I shall never be able to overcome this difficulty; do not say so, for you are not in greater straits than Jacob was at this time, and yet mark, Jacob had power, and stirs up his power. It may be you have such strength as will do more than you are aware of; the grace of God is mighty in the hearts of his saints. Have you never been enabled to do more than ever you thought you should have been? Jacob stirs up his strength, he does not lie down sullen and discouraged, as is usual for Christians to do; if God does but afflict them, and especially if he draws but the light of his face a little from them, presently they lie down discouraged, and will not be comforted. Oh! thou dost not show thyself to be of "the seed of Jacob," thou hast not the spirit of thy father Jacob in thee.

"By his strength he had power with God."

"Strength? what strength? you will say.

He had very great bodily strength, he wrestled partly with bodily strength; as in Gen. xxix. 8, 10, you find that Jacob was a very strong man of his body, for the stone of the well which the shepherds were fain to meet together to roll away, Jacob took and rolled away presently: but certainly he had strength beyond his ordinary bodily strength at this time; God raised a bodily strength beyond whatever he had, and likely beyond whatever man had before. God increased Samson's bodily strength to a great pitch; and the power of God was seen in that, and may be seen much in the elevating of nature in a creature; as the Scripture saith, the body that "is sown in weakness, is raised in power," 1 Cor. xv. 43. Luther saith, That men's bodies shall be raised to such strength, that they shall be able to toss mountains as a man tosses a ball. And Anselm has an expression of like import, That the saints shall be so strong in the world to come, that if they will they can shake the earth at their pleasure. Surely much bodily strength was here to wrestle with an angel. You know the power of an angel; one in one night could slay above fourscore thousand men; and yet here Jacob himself wrestles with an angel; that is, with the Messenger, the Angel of the new covenant, the Son of God, the Second Person in the Trinity. But especially Jacob's spiritual strength, his soul-wrestling, was great; the wrestling of faith within him was at that time very great, it was the irresistible might of man's weakness, when made strong τῆ ἐνέργειᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, by the in-working of God.

Obs. 1. When God strives against his servants, he gives them correspondent strength. Here Jacob was in great extremity, and God comes and wrestles against him, but God gives him strength proportionable to his wrestling. O, take this for thy comfort and encouragement. Many times thou art ready to reason thus, Alas, I am not able to endure a little affliction, what shall I do if I meet with a greater affliction? certainly then I should sink. O, be not discouraged with such unbelieving thoughts, for though thou art weak, and it is as much as ever thou canst do to stand under thy present burden; know assuredly, if greater burdens come, there will come greater strength too: there was answerable strength put into Jacob to wrestle with those difficulties to which he was called. God will not suffer us to be tempted beyond our strength.

"By his strength." What! Jacob's strength? Mark, the strength that God puts into us, though it be God's own, yet when we have it, and work by it, God accounts it as ours; it is called Jacob's strength, though the truth is it was God's strength; God himself wrestling with him gives him strength, and yet he will account it Jacob's own strength. Hence, further,

Obs. 5. It is a great honour to manifest much strength in wrestling with God in prayer. In this was the honour of Jacob, with his strength he prevailed with God. We should not come with weak and empty prayers, but we should put forth strength; if a Christian has any strength in the world for any thing, he should have it in prayer. According to the strength of the fire, the bullet ascends; so according to what strength we put forth in prayer, so is our prevalence. This strength of Jacob was a type of the spiritual strength which God gives his saints when they have to deal with him: and we find in the New Testament mention of very great strength that the saints have by the grace of God. In Eph. iii. 16, "That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man." Mark what expressions are here, That they might "be strengthened," be strengthened "with might," and "with might by his Spirit," the Spirit of God, and "in the inner man;" and all this "according to the riches of his glory." Such strength a Christian may attain to; I say, a Christian may here in this world attain to such strength; there is might added to strength, and the Spirit of God to enable him to that might, and that in the inner man, and that according to the riches of God's glory. Surely the strength is great that is by the Spirit of God, but such strength as shall manifest the glory of the Spirit of God, yea, such strength as shall manifest the riches of the glory of the Spirit of God, this is the strength attainable for Christians, even here in this world: this is the strength which the apostle prays for the Ephesians. O, let us be ashamed of our weaknesses, seeing such strength is to be had. Jesus Christ is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, he has strength, and of his fulness we may come to receive grace for grace. O, let us not be satisfied with faint desires and wishes, when Jesus Christ is tendered to us as the fountain of strength.

Now I appeal to you Christians, Do you walk so that your strength manifests that such riches of the glory of God dwell in you? There is another scripture, "Strengthened," saith Col. i. 11, "with all might, according to his glorious power." Mark, "with all might, according to his glorious power." Thus Christians should seek to be strengthened with all might, according to the glorious power of God. To what? "Unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness." "Unto all patience." It may be, you have strength to bear some afflictions, and have some patience; but are you strengthened with "all might?" and are you strengthened according to the glorious power of God, unto "all patience?" And it may be, for a time you seem to have some patience; but hath patience had her perfect work in you? and is it to all "long-suffering?" Though the affliction continue a great while, will you patiently hold out to "long-suffering," and that "with joyfulness?" This is the glory of Christians, to have strength with God, the glorious power of God strengthening them "with all might," "unto all patience and long-suffering," and that "with joyfulness." "By his strength he had power with God, and prevailed;" he was as a prince with God: as in Gen. xxxii. 28, "For as a prince hast thou power with God;" so here, whereas it is said in your books, "he had power with God," the words ישר את-אלהים may be as well translated, he was a prince with God; and then it is repeated, "yea, he had power over the angel," ישר את-מלאך ויבא he was a prince against the angel, and so prevailed.

Obs. 6. The way to prevail with men is, to prevail with God. Esau came against Jacob to destroy him, and he was afraid, but God gave him a certain evidence that he should prevail; Thou hast prevailed with me, saith he, and there is no fear of prevailing with all the men of the world, now thou hast prevailed with God. This indeed, and especially in these times, were a very useful topic to enlarge upon; that the way to prevail with men is, to prevail with God. What are all the powers of men? they are all at the disposal of God; the work is done when thou hast but prevailed with God. Thou hearest of great dangers that there are abroad in the world, but do thou get alone in thy closet, and fall a wrestling with God, and continue wrestling till thou dost feel thy faith wrestling with God, then thou mayst come down and conclude the work is done: none shall ever prevail against those who have so much interest with God; these may live joyfully in the world, never need fear the power and the rage of wicked men, they have that within them that helps them to prevail with God, and certainly man cannot prevail against them. Our rough brethren have come out against us, as here Esau, this rough brother of Jacob, came out against him, and yet Jacob, prevailing with God, prevailed against Esau. And blessed be God, that when our rough brethren have come enraged against us, there have been some amongst us who have prevailed with God, and by prevailing with God have prevailed over them, and against them. But though we are delivered from these rough brethren, yet we have rough ones of another kind still, that are against us. Oh, but let us carry ourselves blamelessly and inoffensively towards them, who yet behave themselves roughly and furiously against us, and so seek to prevail with them by a constant carriage of innocence and blamelessness of life before them, and thereby convince them, if it be possible, of all their mistakes. But above all, let us seek to prevail with God, and then God may turn their hearts, yea, the hearts of our roughest and most furious brethren, whose mouths are so opened, and whose pens are so plied against us; let us, I say, prevail with God, that so at length they may come and fall upon our necks as Esau did, and give us the right hand of fellowship: such things are not impossible. Let us not be troubled more than God would have us, but seek God, and wrestle with him: it is in vain to stand wrestling with them, giving ill word for ill word, and pen for pen, that is not the way; but wrestle with God, and walk convincingly before them, and so you may turn the hearts of your rough brethren, and that in a little time. Surely it is not more impossible to soder the spirits of brethren that seem not to be at so great a distance and so imbittered one against another as were Esau and Jacob, it is not more impossible for God now to soder them, than it was for God to soder the spirits of those brethren, that their meeting should be one of peace.

In this prevailing of Jacob against Esau we have a type of the church's prevailing against all the ungodly: though the enemies may be strong and furious, certainly the people of God shall prevail. As before in Jacob's taking Esau by the heel, there was a type that the people of God shall supplant all the wicked; so Jacob's prevailing at this time, presignifies that certainly the churches shall prevail; let men do what they will, and be as bitter as they will, the Jacobs shall prevail at length.

"Yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed." If you look into the story you shall find that he did prevail, but it was after he had wrestled a great while. Constancy in wrestling with God will overcome at length, though we do not prevail at first, as Jacob did not, but was wrestling all night, and day broke, and then he prevailed. O, be not discouraged though you prevail not at first. Oh! I have been seeking God thus long, and have not prevailed. But go on still, you know not but that may be done in one hour that has not been done a long time before.

Mark further, Jacob after he was lame prevailed. Jacob had been wrestling all night, and got nothing; then the hollow of his thigh was touched and he became lame: now surely he will be overcome. Shall he prevail now? he that could not prevail in the midst of vigour and strength is not like to prevail now. But then Jacob "had power over the angel, and prevailed." Oh, this is very useful and seasonable for us.

Obs. 7. The time for the church to prevail is when she is most weak: when most unlikely to prevail, when she is lame, then is the time for her to prevail. We are ready to think, Oh, if we could not effect it when we had so much strength, is it like to be done now when our strength is so impaired? Now by this Jacob came to be more humbled when his thigh was touched, so that he was lame. God uses to damp means, and to bring even the sentence of death as an introduction to the greatest mercies.

Further, Though Jacob had a strong adversary against him, and he wrestled long with him, and he had become lame, yet, continuing wrestling, he grew more resolute towards the latter end; for you never read of Jacob being so peremptory before, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." The hollow of Jacob's thigh having been touched is one thing very demonstrative of the sad condition he was in; but this likewise should have been noticed, that the angel would have been gone, God would have been gone and have left him in that affliction, but then Jacob's spirit grew up more with a greater resolution than he had before, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." It seems that Jacob now more clearly than before discerned that he was God. This should be our way in our dealings with God, that when God brings us into the lowest condition, and seems as if he would leave us, we should stir up our spirits then, and be more resolute and strong than before. Oh! it is time now for the heart to bestir itself, when God is ready to go away. Do not say, God will be gone, and therefore sink down sullenly; it is time for thee then to stir up all that thou hast, and to aet faith more then: as if Jacob should say, I will try yet one fall more, I will not yield the cause yet, certainly I must not perish: true, all things seem against me, as if I should be destroyed, but it must not be; faith begins to stir; has not God bid me come here? have I not his word? did not God say, he would do me good in this journey? and though it is true, the providence of God seems to work against me, yet the word of God works for me, and I will try whether shall prevail, God's word, or God's providence. Thus Jacob wrestles: "I will not let thee go;" as if he should say, I have the word for what I do, and God has bound himself by covenant, and so, though heaven and earth meet together, although I see my brother coming against me, and God departing from me, and all threatening ruin, yet I will believe still that there is mercy for me. This was Jacob's last turn, (as I may so say,) the trying as it were the last fall in this his wrestling, in opposing the word that he had with the work of God towards him. And here we would especially,

Obs. 8. It is our duty in every situation not to lay so much weight upon any work of God as upon the word of God. Let us build upon the word rather than fear the works, for it has been the usual way of God when he has given out a word, that his works have seemed to go quite cross, as not only in our father Jacob, but even in our father Abraham. What was the word of God to Abraham? There were two promises made by God to Abraham: 1. That he would bring him into a land that flowed with milk and honey. And, 2. That he would make his seed as the stars in the firmament. Well, here was God's word, but how was God's work? The very next thing that you hear of Abraham was, that after he had left all his friends, and had come into Canaan, he was ready to starve presently: now the word is, Thou shalt be brought into a land flowing with milk and honey; and as soon as ever he comes into that land he was ready to starve. Here is a land indeed!

2. That his seed should be as the stars of heaven. Abraham was twenty-five years after this before he had a child. He grew old, and also his wife. Well, at length he had one, and God commands him to sacrifice that one. What a work is here! how quite contrary to the word! Well, Isaac was saved; forty years elapse before he married; here are sixty-five years gone from the promise, and there is but one of his seed that must be as the stars of heaven. At length Isaac married, and he was twenty years without a child; here are eighty-five years and but only one birth from him; yea, and after that it appears that Jacob was above fourscore years before he married and had any children; thus there are between eight and nine score years gone, and but only Isaac and Jacob. How does the work of God here seem to contradict his word! It is the way of God, and therefore let us never trouble ourselves about God's works; he came indeed afterwards with his works and fulfilled his word to the uttermost, but for the present they seemed to be against it. O, lay up this as a lesson, you will have use for it many and many a time. It follows,

Obs. 9. Prevailing at last will recompense all our strivings. "And prevailed." Jacob was fully recompensed; he speaks of it as a recompence of Jacob after his striving; it was a hard wrestling, but he prevailed at length. And so it will be with all the people of God; let them go on and wrestle, and though things be hard for the present, when mercy comes it will pay for all. Thou wilt hereafter see no cause of repenting that thou continuedst wrestling with God; O, thou wilt see cause to bless God. Blessed be God that kept up my heart all this while: God knows that many times it was ready to sink, but if I had left off, what had become of me? I had lost the mercy that I now find; but I continued through God's mercy, and now he is come at length. Prevailing recompenses all our labour and trouble in seeking.

Well, he prevailed; but what is this to this people of Israel? Thus; this was to show their base degeneracy, as if he should say, Oh, of what a brave spirit was your father Jacob! but you are a base people, you subject yourselves to heathens, to idols: your father would not have subjected himself to any creature in the world, yea, he would wrestle with God himself when he had his word for it; but Jacob's posterity can crouch to the humours of men in the worship of God, and do any thing to save their skin: you are unworthy to be counted his posterity. Jacob's posterity indeed should be prevailers above the world's temptations. What! shall we yield to a base lust, when Jacob would not yield to the Almighty, but prevailed with him? are we of the seed of Jacob now? Oh, we are of low, mean spirits, led aside of every vanity, and overcome with every difficulty. But how did he prevail? in what way did he put forth this his strength? It follows;

"He wept, and made supplication unto him."

This weeping of Jacob is not recorded in the history of Genesis, nor, except here, in all the book of God. His supplication is recorded, but not his weeping; therefore his weeping was conveyed by tradition, or otherwise by revelation. There are many ridiculous conceits of the Jews and some old writers about this; they say it was the angel that wept, and prayed Jacob to let him alone. But to take it generally, as our divines do, that Jacob wept, and made supplication, and so prevailed with God; Jacob's heart was so pressed with his condition, that it caused tears to gush forth from him; and no marvel though tears came from him, for his heart could not but be full, when he came to think thus with himself: What! after I have served such a hard service under Laban my uncle, and God bade me come away from him, which I took to be such a great and merciful deliverance from God, yet how soon was I in danger of my life, even my uncle Laban pursuing me, but God delivered me there; and must I now fall into the hand of my brother? is the day come for him now to have his rage upon me? I see little other likelihood; his strength is great, and God himself appears against me, and I have been wrestling a great while, and I can get nothing from God, but that it is likely here I must die and perish; yea, and that God should leave me thus as he does, that God should appear a greater enemy to me than my brother Esau, and lame me! oh, now, is not this a sign that God intends to destroy me? yea, God would be gone too when I am in such a strait. All this makes him weep. As when a poor child is in straits and is crying to the mother, she beats it, and leaves it in its difficulties; can you then blame the child though it cry? So it was here; Jacob was in straits, and was seeking God, and God beats and afflicts him, and would be gone; oh, this does press tears out of the eyes of Jacob; What will become of me now? As if Jacob should have said, Were I to perish alone it were not so much, but my wives perish, and how can mine eyes endure to see their destruction? yea, it may be they will be ravished before mine eyes by these rude soldiers. These kind of workings in Jacob spirit you cannot but conceive must draw tears; he wept before the angel, considering this his sore distressed condition.

And on the other side, the reasonings of his faith would make him weep too, when he considered, Yea, but surely I am in the way of God, though I be in a great deal of danger; I have the promise and covenant of God with me; I have to deal with the holy, blessed and gracious God in all my ways; who knows but that my extremity may be God's opportunity? The heart of my brother is certainly in the hand of God, and all creatures are in God's hands too. Now the actings of faith, as well as those of fear and trouble, would make one weep; and it were well if we could weep on both sides. Sometimes you roll in your thoughts all the aggravations of your afflictions, and they make you weep: now, can you roll in your thoughts the aggravations of God's goodness and mercy, and can they make you weep? The end why God brought Jacob into this condition, to fall a weeping before the angel, was, that he might humble him, and break his heart, before he gave him deliverance; for it was one of the greatest honours (as we intimated before) that God conferred on Jacob, or ever on any man; therefore God would bring him very low before he would raise him so high, and make him fall a weeping, as well as praying, before he should have the mercy. Oh, this is God's way; he will bring men very low, to humble them before they shall have mercy; therefore when men's hearts are high and lofty, stout and hard, they are not in a way of mercy from God; but when men's hearts begin to break, thaw, and melt, and are tender, then they are on the threshold of mercy, as here. So we find it often in Scripture, that God, intending mercy, first breaks the heart and melts it by mourning and sorrowing: as Josiah, you know that was his condition, his heart melted when he heard the law, and God sends presently a promise of mercy to him. And in Jeremiah, the Lord promises his people, that he will bring them with weeping, and with supplications; that shall be their way to Zion.

Obs. 10. Heart-breaking, with tears before God, becomes the most generous and magnanimous spirit. It is an excellent thing to see a man of a brave spirit, strong and full of courage in service for God, yet melting, tender, and soft in his dealings with God. If you should see now a great captain or general, brave and magnanimous when abroad in the field about any difficult work, but when before God in prayer, weeping like a child, mourning and lamenting, and his heart breaking as soon as a child's; the manly, undaunted courage, and the broken-hearted, child-like simplicity, would extort respect. Spirits of such a mould are excellent, spirits that can turn according to what God calls them to, this way or that, can be stout and hardy in a work that demands stoutness, and can be soft, tender, and yielding where such qualities are required. Thus was our father Jacob. Oh, to have tender-hearted captains and generals, to have courageous, yet broken-hearted, spirits, to mix the work of grace thus, is most excellent, and it becomes the most brave and prudent spirit in the world, not only to fall down to prayer, but to weep before the Lord. Some men think it too low a thing to fall a weeping in prayer, as if it were womanish and childish; oh, it is an argument that thy heart is carnal and base, to think that it arises from want of understanding; I say, the thought is evil, and originates in the much corruption of thy heart. No man ever shed more tears in the presence of God than David, that brave and prudent captain. But to go far higher, I will set before you the example of Jesus Christ; Heb. v. 7, saith, "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications," how? "with strong crying and tears." Even Jesus Christ, the Son of God, God blessed for ever, he that was equal with the Father, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, he that had all strength and power, and had all the treasures of wisdom hid in him, and in whom the fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily, yet when he had to deal with the Father, he offers up "prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears." Does it become the Captain of our salvation in his seeking of God to weep? know then, it is not unbecoming any man or woman. Are you of the seed of Jacob? then, when you would prevail with God, labour to work your hearts even so as to express your affections, outwardly labour to do it in prayer, it will help to break thy heart. As a broken heart will cause outward expressions, so outward expressions will be a further cause to break the heart. And work thy heart by all arguments thou canst to come to that tenderness and softness, that thou mayst be like the Captain of thy salvation. When thou art crying to God, cry even with tears before him; and when thy heart is so broken with tears, then exercise thy faith upon the prayer of Jesus Christ. Now it is through the Spirit of Jesus Christ that my heart thus breaks, but I do not rest upon these; God forbid that I should rest upon my enlargements, upon my breakings of heart; no, but I will rest upon the breakings of Jesus Christ, who in the days of his flesh did send up mighty cries with tears unto God, and prevailed.

Obs. 11. Prayer is the great prevailing ordinance with God. "He made supplication." It has been the great engine that has carried things on in the world. When, in Rev. viii. 4, 5, "the prayers of the saints" were offered up, "there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." Prayers of the saints can move heaven and earth; they can prevail with the God of heaven and earth. The praying legion was called the thundering legion. And Luther saith Bombardo nostro. of prayers, They are our guns, our cannons; our prayers can prevail more than cannons. The saints have always put their great strength in prayer. Psal. cix. 4, is a very observable Scripture, "For my love they are my adversaries." But what then? But I pray. In your books it is, "but I give myself unto prayer." The words "give myself" you may observe printed in another distinct character, (which is to note that they are not in the original, but added by the translators, and in that they dealt faithfully,) but if you read it as in the Hebrew, "For my love they are my adversaries;" but I pray: as if he should say, That is my refuge, I account prayer my great help; they are my adversaries, and rail upon me, but I will not rail upon them again; when they oppose me I will not oppose them again. But I pray; I will pray to my God, and I believe that I have help enough there to resist all mine enemies. Jacob prevailed over the angel by supplication. It is a good sign of a gracious heart to lay the weight of business upon prayer. But I will not enter into this commonplace of the excellency, or power, of prayer and supplication, but only this, It is not every prayer that will prevail so with God.

What prayer will then?

Such a prayer as Jacob's was, in Gen. xxxii. 9—12. In it there are many excellent ingredients.

1. Faith in the covenant of God. "And Jacob said, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac." Upon this faith in the covenant the strength of any prayer most depends. Indeed to have strong expressions and affections in prayer is good; but strength of faith in the covenant of God is the greatest strength of prayer, and it was with this strength that Jacob prevailed. "O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac;" as if he should say, O thou God, that hast entered into covenant with my father Abraham and Isaac, remember thy covenant, O God, I rest upon it, upon the covenant of grace which thou hast made with them; for so certainly that with Abraham and Isaac was the same, for it is said, that "the sign of circumcision was a seal of the righteousness of faith," Rom. iv. 11. "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," Gen. xxii. 18. There was the covenant of grace. Now, O Lord God, it is the covenant of grace that I rest upon in these my straits. When you are in any strait, and go to God in prayer, if you can have recourse to the covenant of grace, and act your faith upon God's covenant with you, oh! that will be a strong prayer. When there are but words in prayer, they vanish as the wind, but when there is much faith in prayer, that makes it to prevail; "the prayer of faith," that is prevalent, saith the apostle James, chap. v. 15.

2. His appeal to God, that he was in the way in which he had set him. He could appeal thus to God; "Thou which sighest unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred." Why, Lord, am I out of my way? Am I not in the way which thou hast set me? I met with difficulties in my way, but, Lord, thou saidst to me, "Return unto thy country;" thou biddest me return. That is an excellent ingredient in prayer, and adds much strength, when the soul in prayer can come to God and say, O Lord, this and that difficulty has befallen me, but, Lord, I am in the way thou hast set me, I am doing thy work, I am not out of my way. For any to be out of the way which God has set them in will mightily damp their hearts in prayer. And it is a mighty encouragement to prayer, and carries it on with mighty strength, when the soul can appeal to God, Lord, whatsoever straits I meet withal, yet I am in thy way.

3. The pleading of a particular promise: "And I will deal well with thee." God made a promise to Jacob in particular, that he would deal well with him in his journey that he went. And though it is true, the great strength is in the great promise, the covenant of grace; yet it adds much strength likewise to use particular promises that concern the very business we are about; and it is a very good thing, when we go about a business that has difficulty in it, to search the word, and to see what promises there are that more particularly concern the business we go about.

4. A deep sense of his own unworthiness. Ver. 10, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast showed unto thy servant." The soul prevails when it comes with humility before God in prayer, and is truly sensible of its unworthiness of any mercy. Lord, I am not worthy of the least crumb of bread, but rather worthy to be cast out from thy presence for ever: it is an easy matter for persons to have such words in their mouths, but to have this indeed in their hearts in prayer, adds very much strength to prayer.

5. The acknowledgment of the mercy that he had received, and of the truth of God in fulfilling promises. Both add much strength to prayer, to take notice of what God has done for us, to observe how he has, in great measure, fulfilled his word for us. When we are praying, we many times are sensible only of what we would have, but not of what we receive; and the vehemency of our desires after what we would have, takes away our apprehensions, and hinders our acknowledgment of the mercies we have had already. But when thou comest to prayer, whatsoever thy state be, though in never such great straits, yet acknowledge what thou hast already, be willing to praise God in thy lowest condition.

6. Remembrance of former meanness. "For with my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands;" that is a further expression of his humility, and God's further mercy.

7. A thorough conviction of the importance of what he prays for. "Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau: for I fear him, lest he will come and smite me, and the mother with the children." Lord, I do not utter words without feeling, for, Lord, as I am crying to thee for help against my brother, I do apprehend my great extremity; Lord, I fear him, lest he come and smite me, with the mother and the children.

When we come to prayer, we must not have words, fine and puffed up, but with little in them, but there must be as much sense of the thing that we pray for, as the words that we speak do seem to import and carry with them: many times we have great words and little sense, and that makes our prayers so empty.

8. Strong arguments. Though it is true, that what we can say to God cannot move God, yet it may move our own hearts; and God would have us to use strong arguments in prayer. "And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude," ver. 12. As if he should say, Lord, how will thy promise be fulfilled? Didst thou not say that my seed should be as the sand of the sea? Now if the mother and children be cut off, what will become of thy promise?

God is so indulgent as to suffer us to plead our cause with him. And these pleading prayers are strong prayers; he wept, and made supplication, so he prevailed with God. Now, labour you (if you be of the seed of Jacob) to pray as your father Jacob did. But so much shall suffice for that second history, about Jacob's prevailing with the angel.

III. His interviews with God at Beth-el. "He found him in Beth-el, and there he spake with us."

The words in the original are, בית-אל ימצאו ויש ידבר, כינני קיני he will find us in Beth-el, and there he spake with us. As if it were an encouraging word of the angel to Jacob, that God would find him in Beth-el; and indeed the words would bear such an interpretation, but, as the learned know, the future is often used for the preter tense in the Hebrew, and it is more agreeable to the context to read them as you have them in your Bibles, "He found him in Beth-el, and there he spake with us;" that is, he found Jacob in Beth-el, and spake to Jacob, and in speaking to Jacob he spake to us all.

Now for the opening of this history, and showing how it suits with the scope of the prophet in this place. We read in Scripture of two meetings which God and Jacob had at Beth-el, and this text in Hosea seems to refer to them both.

1. When for fear of danger he fled from his brother, when his brother had mischievous thoughts against him, after he got the blessing from him, Gen. xxviii. 10.

2. When God appeared to him after he came out of Padan-aram, Gen. xxxv. 9—15.

1. He finds him in Beth-el, Gen. xxviii. 10; yea, indeed, for as Jacob lay asleep with a stone under his head, he saw a vision of angels ascending and descending from heaven, and God speaking excellent things unto him. Hence, Obs. 12. God finds his people many times when they little think of him. He comes to his people in ways of mercy when they scarce dream of it: Jacob was but in a dream at this time, and yet God came in very wonderful ways of mercy towards him.

Oh how often has God found us in this way! how often may many of you say, that the Lord has come unexpectedly to you in ways of mercy, which you could never have expected. Oh, when unexpected mercies come, we should consider that God has found us; our sins might have found us, whereas the mercies of God have found us out.

2. The other time that God found Jacob was, Gen. xxxv. 9—15, when he was in great distress, after his daughter Dinah had been defiled, and his sons Simeon and Levi had committed that great outrage against the Shechemites, so great as to fall on the city, and slay all the males. Upon that Jacob and all his family were in great danger of being destroyed, for the act was so foul, that it could not but make all the people (as Jacob thought) to abhor him, and "to gather themselves together against him, and to slay him," Gen. xxxiv. 30. The distress of Jacob was doubtless very great; his daughter defiled by one uncircumcised, his two sons committing such an outrage, and himself and his house in danger of being destroyed utterly by them; for who would have thought but that all the inhabitants of the land should have risen against him, and have cut him off? Now the next thing that we hear of, God meets with him at Beth-el, and speaks very gracious things to him there; and he did not only speak to him, but there "he spake with us."

That is, God meeting with Jacob in Beth-el, that which he spake to him there concerned us as well as it concerned Jacob. An expression to the same purpose we have in Psal. lxxvi. 6. "He turned the sea into dry land: they went through the flood on foot: there did we rejoice in him:" for indeed the mercy of God towards the Israelites, which at that time did rejoice them, was a matter of rejoicing for us. Whatsoever is written, is written for our learning, it is as if God spake to us. That which God spake to Abraham, I am God all-sufficient; walk before me, and be upright; he spake that to us, he spake that to thee and me. That which God spake to Joshua, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," Josh. i. 5, that the apostle, to the Hebrews, applies to the Christians at that time, Heb. xiii. 5; that he spake to us, he spake it to thee and me, if we be believers. That which God spake to the distressed and afflicted ones in Psal. cii. 17, "He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer;" that he spake to us, for in ver. 18 it is said, "This shall be written for the generation to come." And that which God spake to Jacob at these two several times in Beth-el, is written for the generations to come, is written for us. Well then, what was it? what was the special thing which God spake to Jacob when he found him at Beth-el? and what was that to us? I will show you many things; there are nine or ten notable things to be observed by us, which God spake to us at Beth-el.

Obs. 13. The foundation of the comfort of the saints is in the covenant of God. "There he spake with us." When he appeared to Jacob, what said he to him? "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac," Gen. xxviii. 13. Jacob was flying for his life then, and this was to comfort him in his danger. "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac;" then he spake this to us, that the foundation of the saints' comforts in the times of their distresses, is the covenant of grace which God has made with them, and their fathers before them.

Obs. 14. The seed of Jacob are the inheritors of the land of Canaan; for so he told him, "The land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed." Now this concerns us, that the seed of Jacob shall inherit the land of Canaan, that was typified by it. There are some who think that yet there shall be an inheritance of the land of Canaan by the faithful seed of Jacob, but, however, this certainly "he spake to us," that all the seed of Jacob are the inheritors of the land of Canaan one way or other in the literal, or in the typical sense.

Obs. 15. Mercies promised should be believed, even when there is great unlikelihood of their fulfilment. So he spake to us there. He tells Jacob there, when poor and solitary with his staff, and no provision but a stone for his pillow, he tells him then that his promise shall be made good, and his seed become so great as to inherit the land of Canaan. How unlikely was all this at such a time! but God would have him to exercise his faith upon the promise even then, when there was such a great unlikelihood of its accomplishment.

Obs. 16. The multiplying of the church is a great blessing; for, saith he, thy seed shall be thus and thus, as the sand of the sea shore; I will increase my church abundantly from thy loins.

Obs. 17. Saints, even the strongest, have need of renewing of promises. God renews the same promise to him that was made before to Abraham, that his seed should be great; but the truth is, that the promise, though as certain as before, yet had been a long time.

Obs. 18. The blessing which comes to the world, comes by the promised Seed. He tells him, that in his Seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed: the great blessing of the world is by the promised Seed, by Jesus Christ.

Obs. 19. It was in God's heart, thousands of years ago, to do good to us Gentiles; though at that time we were as dogs, yet it was in God's heart to bless us. Oh, this is a comfortable speech to us, it concerns us Gentiles in a more special manner than it did them to whom Hosea at this time prophesied.

The presence and protection of God are the only encouragement of the saints in their ways. So in ver. 15, saith God, "Behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest;" this he spake to us, this the saints should make high account of.

Obs. 20. God is still working towards the fulfilling of promises; for so he tells him, "I will not leave thee until I have done all that which I have spoken to thee of;" though you cannot see how my administrations towards you do any way work for the fulfilling of my promise, yet know I will not leave you till I have fulfilled all my promises.

Obs. 21. The mercy and faithfulness of God are constant. However things may go with us here for a while, yet the mercy of God continues, the line of God's mercy is not cut asunder, but his faithfulness carries it on till all the good that he has promised, or that faith can believe, is granted to us; for so he tells Jacob there, "I will not leave thee, until I have done all that which I have spoken to thee of." All this God "spake with us," the first time of his meeting with Jacob in Beth-el.

Now the second time that he met with Jacob in Beth-el, is spoken of, Gen. xxxv. 10, and there see what God "spake with us." God changes Jacob's name to Israel, confirms his promise and covenant to him again as before, remembers his wrestling, and his prevailing with him: and in that God tells us he remembers our fervent prayers; after they are gone, his heart is yet upon them. A general view of all he spoke to us there, would lead us to observe,

Obs. 22. The saints have need of the confirmation of mercies, especially of the covenant.

Obs. 23. God's presenting himself to the soul as God Almighty, is a great help to faith. We find in Scripture that God very seldom, when he speaks of his almighty power, speaks of his willingness to do good; for that God would have his people take for granted, it is implied in the covenant which he made with them at first. "I am God Almighty," saith he here; thou hast had experience of my almighty power in turning the heart of thy brother: and now thou art in a great danger; because thou art few in number, thou art afraid of the people of the land; but "I am God Almighty;" there is little power in thee, but in me power dwells. The consideration of God's almighty power, is that which should help the saints in the midst of all their straits and afflictions.

When Jacob was afraid of being cut off because he was few in number, now God presents himself as God Almighty, and blesses him now with fruitfulness, and tells him he will multiply him to "a nation and a company of nations," "and kings shall come out of thy loins." In all this we have an excellent lesson that God speaks to us.

Obs. 24. God delights to revive his people in their fears with suitable mercies. Jacob was never in greater fears than on those two occasions; yet now the Lord comes at this time of his great straits, and tells him of multiplying him to many nations, and that kings should come out of his loins; at that time when he was afraid that the nations should come and destroy all that belonged to him, God tells him that kings should come out of his loins. Oh, the Lord delights to revive his people in their fears, and that with suitable mercies!

Oh, it should teach us to be tender-hearted towards the saints that are in fears and troubles, and to labour to comfort our brethren with seasonable and suitable mercies! And especially after great conflicts that is observable; for Jacob had been wrestling with God not long before, and after these great conflicts God comes with the manifestation of great mercies. This God spake to us there, that we should not be discouraged, though God bring us into great conflicts; because after those times are the seasons for God to speak to us things the most comfortable, and the most encouraging. There God "spake with us." Thus you see the third story opened to you, and its useful import, I know scarce a scripture fuller than these two verses.

And the reason why the prophet brings this third story to upbraid this people is, as if he should say thus:

First, Your father Jacob worshipped the true God in Beth-el; you worship the calf in Beth-el (for you know that in Dan and Beth-el the calves were set up). Are you the children of Jacob? did Jacob worship an idol in Beth-el? No, God found him in Beth-el, and God spake with him there; but you worship a calf in Beth-el.

Secondly, God made gracious promises to your father Jacob in Beth-el; you slight them, you regard them not, you go to shifting courses for yourselves, and dare not rely upon promises as your father Jacob did.

Thirdly, You pollute the place which God had made his house, that place where there were such gracious manifestations of God you pollute. It is an aggravation of sin, to sin in those places where God has showed much mercy.

And then, lastly, You are gone from the covenant which your father Jacob made with God at Beth-el. Your father Jacob (as God renewed his covenant) entered into covenant himself with God at Beth-el, and saith, that the Lord should be his God; but have not you forsaken that covenant? You do not stand to the covenant which your father Jacob made at Beth-el.

Ver. 5. Even the Lord God of hosts; the Lord is his memorial.

He that appeared to your father Jacob was no other than the Lord of hosts, Jehovah, and Jehovah is his memorial.

Your father Jacob conversed with God, he had great power with the great God, the Lord of hosts, Jehovah. You forsake this God, you see no such excellency in him, you rather turn to idols.

"The Lord God of hosts." But how does the prophet make use of this title of God, "The Lord God of hosts?"

It is in reference to those hosts of God that appeared to Jacob a little before he met with his brother Esau, when, after having wrestled with God, and having his name changed, the text saith, "The angels of God met him. And when Jacob saw them, he said, This is God's host," Gen. xxxii. 1, 2. This refers to that place. The hosts of God appeared to Jacob just upon this time of his wrestling, and the text saith there, "he called the name of that place Mahanaim," that is, two hosts, or two camps. Saith Hosea, The Lord of hosts is his name; as if he should say, It is the same Lord that was the Lord of hosts that appeared to Jacob your father a little before his wrestling; it is the same God, he remains the same God still, and your sin is against that God, even against the Lord God of hosts.

Now for this title, "The Lord God of hosts." That which you see this morning, may remind you a little of it, yet I shall not speak much of it now, because you that have been auditors here, and others too, may know, that even in this place I have preached on that glorious name of God, the Lord of hosts, and likewise some years since published my exposition on it,* because God did then appear to England in that title, the Lord of hosts, more fully than in former times. Therefore I endeavoured to open it as I was able unto you, to show what glory of God was in that name, that we in this land might especially learn to sanctify it; and since that time the Lord has given us more occasion to sanctify that name of his than formerly; indeed this title, Lord of hosts, as well as Jehovah, is the memorial of God, and should be to the posterity that remains; we should tell the posterity after how the Lord has manifested himself as the Lord of hosts amongst us. If ever God appeared in the glory of this title in any country or nation, he has done it here: it is from the Lord of hosts that our armies have so prevailed; one that has but half an eye (as we are wont to say) can see it. Had God wrought our victory by a company of old, brave, gallant soldiers, and by mighty armies, then the glory of God as the Lord of hosts had been eclipsed in some measure; but whereas such great things have been done, as scarce any history can tell us of, since Joshua's time, here, in this very kingdom, within these twelve months, and that by the weakest, the feeblest instruments, how will the Lord of hosts be in "his memorial," if these transactions be set out to the life, lustre, and verity of them! children yet unborn will learn to magnify God by this name of his. That such things should be done by an army so contemptible in the eye of flesh and blood as this our army was, none other surely than the Lord of hosts appeared for us.

And in that God has manifested himself for his own people so much, I will give you one scripture which I do not remember I made use of then, to show you what the hosts of God are besides the sun, moon, and stars, and the works of creation in general. Besides all these, God has two special armies, the saints and the angels; these I may call Mahanaim, the two hosts of God. Respecting the angels, I shall not need to give you Scripture: but with regard to the people of God, that they are called "the hosts of the Lord" in way of distinction from all other of the hosts of God, is manifest from Exod. xii. 41, where the people of Israel going forth from Egypt, the text saith, "And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt." What were they but God's people? the church is called there "the hosts of the Lord." God's own people God glories in as his hosts in way of distinction from all other people. And so in Cant. vi. 4, the church of God is said to be "terrible as an army with banners." And through God's mercy the Lord has manifested what great things he can do by such an host, by an army that has had so many of his chosen ones among them; they have been the hosts that God, the Lord of hosts, has taken so much delight to be the Captain of, and to go forth withal. But thus much for that name, "the Lord of hosts;" what use the prophet makes of that name we shall speak to presently, how it is a doctrinal point that he builds his exhortation upon, "Therefore return unto the Lord."

"The Lord is his memorial:" Jehovah is his memorial.

This name Jehovah is a name in which God glories

* The glorious Name of the Lord of Hosts: the title of a book of the author's, being one of the first in defence of the wars on the parliament's side.

much, for indeed it is the name of God's being, which expresses that more fully than any other name of God; this, and that name of God, "I am that I am," which comes from the same root, and is in effect the same with this name Jehovah; I say, God glories in this above all his names; and therefore in Deut. xxviii. 58, "That thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name," Jehovah, thy God; in your books it is, "The Lord thy God," but in the original, Jehovah, thy God. God looks upon this name as his glorious and his fearful name, and would have people to take heed that they look to this, that they "fear this glorious and fearful name, Jehovah thy God." This name the Jews keep a mighty stir about, and think they find great mysteries in it; they have such superstitious reverence for it, that they will not so much as pronounce it; they call it the ineffable name; and if it be written, they think it is a very wicked thing to tread upon the paper which contains it. But it is very observable here how cross the superstition of men is to God; they in reverence to God will not so much as mention this name, because, they say, it is a name in which God so much glories: and yet mark here, my text saith, this name is God's "memorial." God would have this name mentioned above any of his names, it is the name by which he would be remembered to all generations. So in Exod. iii. 15, you find, that God speaking of this his name, Jehovah, Jehovah Elohim, Jehovah in covenant, saith, that he would be known by it to all generations: "This is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations." It might indeed well be wished that the very word Jehovah had been retained in your English version (Lord printed in capitals always indicates its presence in the original). There is much then in this name:

First, it sets forth the glory of God more than any name, because above all names it shows that God has a being from himself, in which much of the glory of God consists; this is proper to God: and indeed from this one principle, that God is from himself, we come to understand almost all things that can be known of God by any light of nature, by any natural understanding, unaided by Divine revelation. The knowledge of God in Christ is above both, being matter of pure revelation; but the knowledge of God as Adam at first knew him, and as the creature can know him by any natural light, derives its greatest strength from this principle, That God has his being from himself: and from this follows,

1. That he is the First Being of all things.
2. That he is the Supreme Being, he is above all.
3. That he is an Eternal Being, he can have no beginning, because it is from himself.
4. That he is an Infinite Being, that there are no bounds at all to his being: for whatever is bounded, is bounded by something without it; but God being from himself, and having no cause, can have nothing to limit and bound his being.
5. That there is all being in God; whatever has any being, it must be either that that is the first, or from the first: he is an Absolute Being of himself, having it from himself, and therefore all being is eminently contained in God himself.
6. That whatsoever is in God, is God himself; from this name Jehovah, he is an Absolute Being, nothing but himself: this is the difference between God and any creature. Whatsoever is in the creature, is not the being of the creature. A man has wisdom; now the wisdom of a man is one, and the essence of the man is another, thing; but it is not so with God, whatsoever you can say of God, is God; the wisdom of God, is God; the mercy of God, is God; the justice of God, is God himself; and so all the attributes. We often conceive of the attributes as if they were distinct from the being; when we say, God is wise, as if God were one thing, and wisdom were another; but certainly if we would apprehend God as in himself, we cannot apprehend him so; as if his wisdom were one thing, and God another; or his mercy one thing, and God another: so that the truth is, nothing can properly be predicated of God, because when a thing is predicated there is a difference between the subject and the predicate, but there is no such distinction with respect to God; but whatsoever can be said of God, is God himself; and much of the glory of God appears in this one thing, in this, I say, that all that is in God is God himself. The understanding God thus, helps us to see God in his glory as much as any way whatsoever; few people however apprehend this, but look upon God as a creature, and so think God is some excellent thing that has so many excellencies in him: but to understand it aright, we should know that all that is said of God is God himself, and therefore all but one being in God; wisdom, mercy, justice, power, life, holiness, and faithfulness appear many diverse things to us, but in God all are but one excellency. As now, the beams of the sun appear diverse to us, they shine through a blue glass, and there is a blue reflection, and a green glass, and then it is green, and a red glass, and then it is red, but yet all constitute but one beam. So the infinite, first, absolute Being of all, appearing in his several workings and in his several administrations, seems to be several; but they all form but one being that is in himself: such is the signification of the name Jehovah.

7. All the being of the creature depends upon God, is from God originally, and so depends upon God every moment. Every time you hear the name Jehovah you should be put in mind of this, that as all creatures had what they had from God at first, so they do absolutely depend upon God every moment for their being, and for their every good.

8. God being thus Jehovah, will give a being to all his promises, and to all his threatenings. And therefore when he appeared to Moses, to tell him that he would fulfil the promise made to his people, to bring them out of Egypt, he tells him that though he had appeared to Abraham by the name El-shaddai, God-all-sufficient, yet he had not appeared to him by the name Jehovah; which is as much as if he should say, Yea, indeed, when I spake to Abraham, I made a promise to him, that I would give him such a land, and thus and thus, but I did not give a being to the promises; but now I come to make way for the fulfilling of this promise, now I appear to be Jehovah: thus Jehovah is God's "memorial," that is, every time you read the name Jehovah, or hear that name Jehovah, then you should meditate on these things, and contemplate God as Jehovah in all these different aspects. And thus for the opening of these two names. The observations from them are,

Obs. 1. Though God be never so strong and terrible in himself, never so great and glorious, yet faith has strength to wrestle with him. Jacob had power with God. God! what God? The Lord of hosts, Jehovah, the great and glorious God. And yet Jacob wrestles with this Lord of hosts, God-Jehovah, and prevails with him.

So that hence Christians should learn to raise up their spirits when they have to deal with God. If God has given them faith, they should be daunted neither by God's terror nor his greatness. Thou dost sometimes look upon God as the great Creator of heaven and earth, the great Lord of hosts, the infinite Jehovah, and the lustre of his glory seems to amaze thee; be not afraid. O thou believing soul, if thou art a seed of Jacob, notwithstanding all the terribleness, and all the glory, that there is in God, and the infinite distance that there is between him and us, which his name Jehovah sets out unto us, yet thou mayst wrestle with this God, even with this God, and prevail. Many poor Christians are much daunted and discouraged with the sight of the greatness of God; but this text is a very great help to silence the apprehension of such. Indeed it is for ungodly men, to whom God is an enemy, to be daunted with the apprehension of the greatness of God; but to the seed of Jacob, even when Jacob prevailed it was with this God, that is, the Lord of hosts, whose memorial is Jehovah.

Obs. 2. The greatness and glory of God in these his names is a great aggravation of sin. Oh, the Lord is infinitely terrible, he is the Lord of hosts, Jehovah, and yet you wretched creatures have departed from, and sinned against, this God. Oh, it is a fearful aggravation of men's sin, that their sin is against such a God, the Lord of hosts, whose name is Jehovah; nothing can humble the soul of a sinner more effectually than the sight of the Lord in his glorious attributes. When thou comest to know with what a God thou hast to deal, this will make thee see the greatness of thy sin. Therefore the prophet sets God in his glory before this people, that they should come to see their great sin, and that there should be a stop given to the course of their hearts, which were running on in the ways of unrighteousness.

Obs. 3. God is the same to us as he was to our forefathers, if we forsake him not. He was thus to your father Jacob, the Lord of hosts, Jehovah; and his memorial is still the Lord of hosts, and Jehovah, and therefore you might have this God to appear the Lord of hosts for your good as well as he did to your forefathers, and you might have God appear to be Jehovah for you as well as he did to Jacob, if you forsake him not. O wretches! that you should forsake this God, whom you might have to be the Lord of hosts and Jehovah to you.

O, let us learn this, when we read in Scripture, or hear from our forefathers, how God has appeared heretofore for his saints, for our forefathers, to reflect, God is the same God still, and we may come to have as much good from this God as ever any had since the world began; there is no shortening of his power, and no darkening of his glory, but with whatsoever power God has wrought, in whatsoever glory he has appeared, in former times, he may manifest the same for us now. It is a mighty argument for people to keep close to God and be faithful with him even because of this.

Obs. 4. There is no need of images to keep God's remembrance. The glorious titles of God and his attributes, and the manifestation of himself in his works, is the best memorial of God; that is our way, the way of man to make to himself memorials. God has made himself "a memorial." When you read in the word this glorious title of God, Jehovah, it is a better memorial of God than all the images in the world are, and we may better sanctify God's name, and have our hearts better wrought upon, by such titles of God, than by all kind of images whatsoever.

Obs. 5. God manifests his glory, that he may be remembered from generation to generation. "The Lord God of hosts; Jehovah is his memorial;" as if he should say, God then manifested himself as Jehovah, and he would be remembered in other ages to be so; what God does to his people in one age, he not only expects to have his name sanctified for that present, but he would have it laid up from age to age, and would be honoured in all generations from those great manifestations of himself in some one age.

My brethren, oh that we had hearts to do this! Oh that we could make this God his memorial! that we could lay up what God has manifested of himself in this age, for the benefit of another age! I hope God will one way or other provide means for the recording of the famous things that God has done in this age, that it may be a memorial to the posterity afterwards; for certainly our age cannot give God the glory that is due unto his name for what he has done; we had need labour to continue it to posterity, that the ages to come may remember what God has done to give glory to him; it is his memorial.

Obs. 6. This name of Jehovah, the memorial of God, affords matter for a very useful meditation. You that say you cannot meditate, your meditations are barren; would you help yourselves in meditation to have a holy memorial of God, think much of the name Jehovah, remember what has been hinted to you from that name, and what is contained in it.

Ver. 6. Therefore turn thou to thy God: keep mercy and judgment, and wait on thy God continually.

"Therefore." Here comes the application now; the two preceding verses contain the doctrine, this is the use, "Therefore turn thou to thy God;" so that this "therefore" has reference to all that the prophet had said concerning Jacob, and to these titles of God; as if he should say thus:

I. You had such a gracious father that did thus prevail with God, to whom God did so appear, "therefore turn thou to thy God."

II. God is "the Lord of hosts," therefore turn to him.

III. "Jehovah is his memorial," therefore turn to him.

I. The reference it has to their father Jacob affords us this note:

Obs. 1. The consideration of our godly forefathers is a great argument to turn us to God. O you children who have had parents that were wrestlers with God, are you wicked now? Consider what parents you had, and turn you therefore to God. In 2 Tim. i. 3, "I thank God," saith St. Paul, "whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience." Oh! it is a great comfort to a man or woman if they can say thus, "I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience;" my forefathers served God, my grandfather, or grandmother, or father, or mother, was godly; and I thank God even from them that I serve God: God is "my God," and "my father's God," Exod. xv. 2.

II. The consideration of God as "the Lord of hosts," is a mighty motive to cause us to turn to God. Wilt thou go on in ways of enmity against the Lord of hosts, the Lord of hosts, who has angels and all creatures to fight for him? Wilt thou, a poor worm, stand out against this God? Thou that goest on in a way of wickedness, know thou fightest against the great Lord of hosts. What were it for a drunken fellow to come and think to oppose but such an army as goes out of the city at this time? but for a poor wretched worm to think to stand against the infinite God, the Lord of hosts! oh! it were infinite boldness and presumption, and desperate madness; therefore turn to the Lord. All the while thou art going on in ways of wickedness, thou art fighting against the Lord of hosts.

And, on the other side, if thou hadst but a heart to turn to the Lord, oh how joyful would this title be to thee, that that God which is thy God, is the Lord of hosts, is the Lord of all the hosts in the world! We are not afraid now to see soldiers, and to hear the beating of drums, and shooting of guns, when we know that all are our friends; but if we should have heard the beating of drums, and neighing of horses, and the guns of our enemies, that would have struck fear. So one that hath turned to God, need not fear any army, any creatures; why? all is commanded by God their Father. Oh the joy, peace, and security that a heart may have which is turned to God! In Acts xxvii. 23, 24, Paul saith, "There stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, saying, Fear not, Paul." Mark, There stood before me the angel of God. Did not that terrify him? "The angel," that is but one of the members of the hosts of God; any one angel has a great deal of terror in him sometimes, for there is much of the glory of God in angels, and we know that their appearing has struck terror into many men. But now, saith Paul, the angel said, "Fear not;" if it be the angel of God, "whose I am, and whom I serve," then I need not fear; yea, let God muster up all his hosts, and appear to one that has turned to him, if he can say thus, "Whose I am, and whom I serve," these hosts will say, "Fear not." Therefore turn to the Lord, because he is the Lord of hosts.

III. God is Jehovah, therefore should we turn to him. There is a great deal of force in this name to cause sinners to turn to him, for this name Jehovah has as much terror in it to a guilty, ungodly soul, as any thing we read of in all the book of God. I say, put all together that we read in the book of God, yet if we did but thoroughly understand the name Jehovah, we should see as much terror in it to a guilty conscience, and a sinful soul that goes on in the ways of wickedness, as almost all that is mentioned of God that might be terrible. As thus,

Jehovah. If he be Jehovah, he has power over every thing that has a being to torment thee with it, for he has all being in himself, all being is from him, and he disposes of all: therefore whatsoever thing has any being in it, this God has the power over it, to make use of it to torment thee withal. Do but consider what power some little creature, if it be in some part of a man's body, has to produce torment; a little gravel in the kidneys, or stone in the bladder, poor and weak in itself, but being in that place, what torture does it bring! Now if they have such power to torment thee, then what power have all things in the earth, and the infinite God that has all essence, and all being, and can dispose of all things as he pleases, to bring pain, misery, and torment to a sinner! It is a very humbling consideration to a sinner.

And, on the other side, if there be any power in any thing that has a being to bring any comfort, it is all in God, for God has all in him eminently. As now, one creature has power to torment in one way, another in another way; and so one creature has power to comfort us one way, another another; but all this is eminently in God. The gravel torments one way, the gouty humour in the veins torments another way, and fire and the sword torment after another manner, and burning fever, fire without and fire within, and the stinging of serpents, all torment after different manners; now all power of all things is in God eminently, in him is the quintessence of all things, and therefore the power of God is able to bring all sorts of torments at one time in one thing. As now, suppose several herbs of several virtues, if these herbs were all distilled into one water, then a drop of that has the virtue and efficacy, it may be, of forty several herbs; so now, (if I may so compare,) God has all kind of power in himself, and is able to put forth in one instant all the power and efficacy that there is in all creatures in heaven and earth, either to torment or to comfort us. If one herb has one sweetness, and a second another, and the third another, how sweet will be the distillation of them all together. Now all sweetnesses being in God eminently, oh what comfort is there in God to the soul! Thus, either way, the name Jehovah affords full matter for meditation, either to bumble us for sin by the dreadfulness of his wrath, or to comfort and encourage us by the reflection that there is all being in God eminently, and that all depend absolutely upon him; therefore turn to God, because he is Jehovah.

Obs. 1. The excellency of the saints is an argument to turn us to God. When both together, the excellency of Jacob and the excellency of God, this is set as an argument to turn to the Lord. Turn to me.

But they might say, Do not we turn to God? we do serve God. Thence further,

Obs. 2. We depart from God in the midst of our services when we perform them not in God's way. They did worship God after a fashion, but God did not account that worshipping of him, but departing from him: therefore turn to God.

"Turn thou."

That is, every one of you; do not stand objecting and cavilling against what I say, but turn to God every one of you. "Turn thou to thy God." Thou art Israel, thou art the posterity of that great prevailer with God, therefore turn thou to God. The note of observation from hence, which, if you lay it to heart, you will find it of very great use, is this:

Obs. 3. Every one should consider what peculiar arguments there are that concern him in particular to turn to God. "Therefore turn thou to thy God." There is a great deal more reason why thou shouldst turn to God than others.

Oh that every one of us here in this place would but in our meditations labour to recall all those particular arguments that concern ourselves, that might turn us to God! Do not take it in the general, Turn to God because he is your Creator, turn to God that you may be saved: this concerns all. But consider what special reasons thou hast, as thus: Consider what special manifestations of God have been vouchsafed to thee; what special offers of grace have been made to thee; what special workings of the Holy Ghost there have been upon thy heart; what special illuminations of God's Spirit there have been within thee; consider what special dangers thou hast been in; what special vows and covenants thou hast made to God, and yet hast departed from him afterwards: consider what special engagements thou hast had: these are but hints to lead you to lay to heart all the arguments that may concern you especially to turn to thy God. "Therefore turn thou to thy God." Do not thou look upon others, and think thus, I do as others do: yea, but thou hast more reason to turn to God than others, there are more arguments to persuade thy heart than others, "Therefore turn thou to thy God." And this is a great mercy of God towards any, when he darts powerfully those special considerations and arguments that concern their souls to turn to God: we come to hear the word, and to hear the nature of repentance, and the motives to repentance, but that generally concerns all, and does not much move our heart; but at another time it pleases God to suggest something out of the word that concerns us in particular, and this affects our hearts more powerfully than all the rest. As if a man be asleep, though there be a great noise, perhaps it does not awaken him, but let one call him by his name, and speak particularly to him, and that will awaken him when a greater noise will not do it: so, though there be general reasons for turning to God, they do not so much prevail with people, as when God speaks to us by name, and saith, Turn thou to God. There are these special arguments why thou shouldst turn to God rather than others. Many times you will say, If ever any were bound to God, then I am: then turn thou to God because thou art more engaged than others.

"To thy God."

That is, though you have departed from him, yet he has not so wholly cast you off, but he may yet be thy God. From whence,

Obs. 4. The sight of any relation to God, or hope of mercy from him, is a special means to draw the heart to turn to him. He may yet be thy God, God has not left thee; O thou wretched, sinful soul, who knows but that he may be thy God, and thy God to all eternity? Thou mightest have been past hearing of any possibility of God's being thy God, and therefore turn to God, turn to thy God.

"Keep mercy and judgment."

Want of mercy, in the 14th chapter of this prophecy, was charged upon this people, that there was no mercy in the land. And so in divers other places, want of justice. Now, "turn thou to thy God; keep mercy and judgment." From the context,

Obs. 5. In our turnings to God, we must reform our special sins. It is not enough for any to turn to God, and leave some gross sins; but is there any sin more special than another, that you have lived in before your turning to God? reform in that sin above all. None can ever have any sure argument that their repentance is true, though they have left many sins, if they have not left their special sins. There is some special sin that thou hast lived in, what sayest thou to that?

Obs. 6. It is nothing for people to reform in God's worship, except they reform also in the duties of the second table. The duties of the second table, mercy and judgment; "Turn thou to thy God; keep mercy and judgment." Many seem to be forward in duties of instituted worship, which is very good; we are to honour God, God is jealous in that business; but now, together with that, if we be not conscientious in the duties of the second table, of mercy and judgment too, it is nothing; all will vanish and come to nothing except thou livest righteously and mercifully with men also, as well as worship God aright; do not think to put off thy conscience with the duties of worship, except thou dost "keep mercy and judgment." This we would observe generally; but more particularly,

Obs. 7. A heart truly turning to God, must needs be very merciful to men. God expects that from all who turn to him, that upon thy turning to God, thy bowels should yearn towards thy brethren, and turn to them in love, and in mercy, and meekness, and gentleness, and forgiveness. For when thou turnest to God, is it not the mercy of God that draws thy heart? If it be not that, thy turning is not right; never any turned to God rightly but their hearts were taken with God's mercy; and can thy heart be taken with God's mercy, and thou not merciful to thy brethren? Many professors of religion think little of this, but I find the Scripture makes as much of this as of any thing but faith itself, faith in the covenant of grace. These three things the Scripture holds forth, and urges very much upon men, faith, mercy, and unity. The two latter are thought to be of little or no moment with men, but certainly the Lord Christ lays much upon mercy towards men, that all that are his members should be of merciful and of uniting dispositions one towards another. Oh, it is mercy in which the Scripture makes religion to consist: James i. 27, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction." And in James ii. 13, "Mercy rejoiceth against judgment." This will help us in the time of straits, and in the season of danger, that we have been merciful towards our brethren, for so I understand the words, "Mercy rejoiceth against," or over, "judgment:" not that God's mercy is more than his judgment, and that, though a sinner has deserved judgment, yet God's mercy will prevail, and triumph over it; but I take the text to refer to mercy in man, and not mercy in God, that is, thus; When man has had a merciful heart towards others, towards his brethren, that then if he should live to meet with affliction, live to a time of judgment, times of common calamity, common dangers, that mercy which he has exercised towards his brethren in the time of his prosperity will cause his soul to triumph in the midst of all dangers. In the time of affliction mercy rejoices over judgment: Let judgment come, let afflictions come in the world, let there be never such hard times among the nations, yet I have a testimony to my conscience, the Lord has given me a merciful heart towards my brethren that are in misery, and I that am but a poor creature, who have but a drop of mercy to that God whose mercy is infinite as the ocean of mercy, will not that God be merciful to me much more? Keep mercy therefore, you that turn to God, be of merciful dispositions towards your brethren. Oh! this is wanting among many professors of religion, they are of cruel and harsh dispositions, rigid, sour, and severe towards others, they care not what becomes of them. O, be merciful to your brethren; you that are turned to God, show it in this, that you keep mercy.

That is, righteous judgment among men. Thou canst not turn to God from thy unrighteousness, and to a righteous God, and yet still not be righteous towards men. Many texts of Scripture I might have shown you, that commend this grace of righteousness; and it is made the great promise to the church in its glorious state, that righteousness shall prevail there, that her people shall be a righteous people.

But further, “and judgment.” Not only judgment in doing no man any wrong, and righteousness in dealing; but a manifestation of thy hatred against sin, by the execution of judgment.

Obs. 8. Where there is a true turning to God, there must be righteousness among men. Certainly, if turned from thy unrighteousness towards a righteous God, then thou wilt be turned likewise from thy unrighteousness towards thy fellow men.

Obs. 9. Those who are in authority must manifest their hatred against sin, by the execution of judgment. Though in thine own cause thou mayst forbear, yea, thou shouldst be merciful; but when public manifestation of hatred against sin requires justice, then there is no place for sparing; when God calls thee, in any public place, to manifest hatred against sin, then (I say) thou mayst not think of sparing.

But you will say, Oh, I must pity, and show mercy.

Well, if you would be merciful, be merciful in your own cause. Many will plead for indulgence to malefactors, yet in their own business they have no indulgence to those who offend them. It becometh a judge to be very pitiful when he is wronged himself, but it becometh him to be very righteous and just when the public calls him.

Obs. 10. Mercy is first, and judgment afterwards. “Keep mercy and judgment.” The Scripture makes a difference between our respect to mercy and judgment: thus, Micah vi. 8, “What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?” A pre-eminence must be given to mercy, mercy must not only be shown, but loved; justice must be done.
